TRANSLATORS' NOTE

1. What follows is a complete translation of the seminar that Jacques Lacan gave in the course of a year's teaching within the training programme of the Société Française de Psychanalyse. The French text was prepared by Jacques-Alain Miller in consultation with Jacques Lacan, from the transcriptions of the seminar. Certain minor errors in the text have been corrected in the translation, and will be incorporated in later editions of the French text. All notes are supplied by John Forrester (who also compiled the index), in order to clarify questions of translation and supply limited bibliographical information.
2. We have aimed at an exact translation. This involves, however, finding appropriate colloquial English to correspond to a text which is both informal and complex – a rendition of Lacan's spoken French. The translation aims at being both informal and literary, corresponding as faithfully as possible with the original text.
3. As we needed to pay additional attention to the German background of many psychoanalytic concepts, in many passages the requirements of three languages had to be taken into account. There has been considerable debate in French analytic circles about the translation of Freud's works, in large part stimulated by these seminars of Lacan's, which, until the early 1960's, were advertised as 'Commentaries on the texts of Freud'. In recent years the admirable English edition of Freud prepared by James Strachey has also been the subject of discussion and criticism in the English-language world. Anticipating the decision of the next Freud translators, we have made one decision which follows the French translations of Freud at the expense of Strachey's: where 'investir, investi, investissement' appears in the French text, corresponding to the German 'besetzen, besetzt, Besetzung', we have translated this by 'invest, invested, investment', instead of 'cathect, cathected, cathexis'. We have also translated 'pulsion', corresponding to 'Trieb', by 'drive' and 'instinct', corresponding to 'Instinkt', by 'instinct'; this decision is hardly controversial. Both of these decisions accord with Schneiderman's practice.[1] Other decisions are pointed out in the notes.

4. We have paid considerable attention to the practices of previous translators of Lacan, in particular Anthony Wilden,[2] Alan Sheridan,[3] Stuart Schneiderman and Jacqueline Rose,[4] in the hope that some consistency in the English rendition of Lacan can be achieved. This Seminar, together with Seminar II, which is being published simultaneously, was worked on by both translators so as to produce uniformity in both terminology and style. In attempting to follow our predecessors, we came to the conclusion that it was often more accurate to render one single French term by a variety of English terms. This was made all the more necessary in view of the fact that Lacan's 'technical' vocabulary was, throughout his life, always tentative and decidedly in flux. Nonetheless, the translations of the following terms have, or have acquired, such importance in discussion of Lacan's work that it may be useful to point them out, together with certain differences between our translation and that of other Lacan translators.

FRENCH TERM	PREVIOUS TRANSLATORS	THIS TRANSLATION
parole	Word (Wilden)	speech
signification	signification (Sheridan) meaning (Schneiderman)	signification or significance
sens	sense (Schneiderman) meaning (Sheridan)	meaning
signifier		to mean or to signify
travail		labour or work

5. In the original text, words in a language other than French were printed in italics. We have followed this practice, indicating in notes which words in the original appeared in English. An exception to this rule is made for the terms 'ego' and 'moi'. Both these terms are translated in this text by 'ego'; when italicized, it is 'ego' in the French; when it is in roman face, the original word is 'moi'.

OVERTURE TO THE SEMINAR

The master breaks the silence with anything – with a sarcastic remark, with a kick-start.

That is how a buddhist master conducts his search for meaning, according to the technique of zen. It behoves the students to find out for themselves the answer to their own questions. The master does not teach ex cathedra a ready made science; he supplies an answer when the students are on the verge of finding it.

This kind of teaching is a refusal of any system. It uncovers a thought in motion – nonetheless vulnerable to systematisation, since it necessarily possesses a dogmatic aspect. Freud's thought is the most perennially open to revision. It is a mistake to reduce it to a collection of hackneyed phrases. Each of his ideas possesses a vitality of its own. That is precisely what one calls the dialectic.

Certain of these ideas were, at a given moment, indispensable to Freud, because they supplied an answer to a question that he had formulated previously, in other terms. Hence one only gains a sense of their value by relocating them in their context.

But it is not enough to do some history, the history of thought, and to say that Freud lived in a scientistic century. Rather, with The Interpretation of Dreams, something of a different essence, of a concrete psychological density, is reintroduced, namely, meaning.

From the scientistic point of view, Freud appeared at this point to revert to the most archaic thinking – reading something in dreams. He later returns to causal explanations. But when one interprets a dream, one is always up to one's neck in meaning. What is at issue is the subjectivity of the subject, in his desires, in his relation to his environment, to others, to life itself.

Our task, here, is to reintroduce the register of meaning, a register that must itself be reintegrated on its own level.

Brücke, Ludwig, Helmholtz, Du Bois-Reymond had instituted a kind of pledged faith – everything reduces down to physical forces, those of attraction and repulsion. Once one takes these as premises, there's no reason to go beyond them. If Freud did go beyond them, it is because he also took on others. He dared to attach importance to what was happening to him, to the antinomies of his childhood, to his neurotic problems, to his dreams. That is why Freud is for us all a man beset, like anyone else is, by all the contingencies – death, woman, father.

This represents a return to origins, and barely warrants being called science. What holds good in the art of the expert cook, who knows how to joint a bird, to disjoint it with as little resistance as possible, is also true for psychoanalysis. We know that there is a method of conceptualisation proper to each structure. But since this leads to complications, one prefers to cling to a monistic notion of a deduction of the world. That's how one goes astray.

One has to realise that we do our dissecting with concepts, not with a knife. Concepts have their specific order in reality. They do not emerge out of human experience – if they did, they would be well made. The first appelations arise out of words themselves, they are instruments for delineating things. Hence every science remains in darkness for a long time, entangled in language.

At first there is language, already formed, which we use as we would a very poor instrument. From time to time, reversals occur – from phlogiston to oxygen, for instance. Lavoisier introduces the right concept, oxygen, at the same time as his phlogistic. The root of the difficulty is that you can only introduce symbols, mathematical or otherwise, by using everyday language, since you have, after all, to explain what you are going to do with them. You are then at a certain level of human exchange, the level of healer in this instance. So is Freud, despite his denial. But, as Jones has demonstrated, he imposed upon himself right from the beginning the discipline of not dabbling in the speculation to which his nature inclined him. He submitted himself to the discipline of the facts, of the laboratory. He distanced himself from the wrong language.

Let us now turn to the notion of the subject. When one brings it in, one brings in oneself. The man speaking to you is a man like any other – he makes use of the wrong language. Oneself is then at issue.

Thus, Freud knew, from the beginning, that he would only make progress in the analysis of the neuroses if he analysed himself.

The growing importance attributed today to counter-transference means that it is a recognised fact that in analysis the patient is not alone. There are two of us – and not only two.

Phenomenologically, the analytic situation is a structure, that is to say that it is only through that that certain phenomena are isolable, separable. It is another structure, that of subjectivity, which gives human beings the idea that they are comprehensible to themselves.

Hence being neurotic can help one become a good psychoanalyst, and at the beginning, it helped Freud. Like Monsieur Jordain with his prose,[1] we make sense, nonsense, we misunderstand. But the lines of structure still had to be found there. Jung as well, to his own amazement, rediscovers, in the symbols of dreams and religions, certain archetypes, proper to the human race. This is also a structure – but differing from the analytic structure.

Freud introduced the determinism proper to this structure. Hence the ambiguity that is to be found throughout his corpus. For example, is a dream desire or the recognition of desire? Or, again, the ego is on the one hand like an empty egg, differentiated at its surface through contact with the world of perception, but it is also, each time we encounter it, that which says no or me, I, which says one, which speaks about others, which expresses itself in different registers.

We are going to employ the techniques of an art of dialogue. Like the good cook, we have to know what joints, what resistances, we will encounter.

The super-ego is a law deprived of meaning, but one which nevertheless only sustains itself by language. If I say you turn to the right, it's to allow the other to bring his language into line with mine. I think of what goes through his head when I speak to him. This attempt to find an agreement constitutes the communication specific to language. This you is so fundamental that it arises before consciousness. Censorship, for example, which is intentional, nevertheless comes into action before consciousness, functioning with vigilance. You is not a signal, but a reference to the other – it is order and love.

In the same way, the ego-ideal is an organism of defence established by the ego in order to extend the subject's satisfaction. But it is also the function that depresses most, in the psychiatric meaning of the term.

The id is not reducible to a pure and objective given, to the drives of the subject. An analysis never leads to specifying a given quantity of aggressivity or erotism. The point to which analysis leads, the end point of the dialectic of existential recognition, is – You are this. In practice this ideal is never reached.

The ideal of analysis is not complete self mastery, the absence of passion. It is to render the subject capable of sustaining the analytic dialogue, to speak neither too early, nor too late. Such is the aim of a training analysis.

The introduction of an order of determinations into human existence, into the domain of meaning, is what we call reason. Freud's discovery is the rediscovery, on fallow ground, of reason.

Introduction to the commentaries on Freud's Papers on Technique

THE SEMINAR CONFUSION IN ANALYSIS
HISTORY IS NOT THE PAST
THEORIES OF THE EGO

I would very much like to start off this new year, for which I offer you my best wishes, by telling you – The fun is over!

Last term you had little else to do but listen to me. I declare that this term now starting, I trust, I hope, I venture to hope that I too will hear from you a bit.

It's actually the law, and tradition, of the seminar that those who participate in it bring more to it than a purely personal effort – a contribution through effective communication. This can only come from those involved in the work in the most direct manner, from those for whom these seminars on texts take on their full meaning, from those who are involved in a variety of capacities in our practice. All this does not exclude your obtaining from me answers that I will be in a position to give you.

It would be particularly appreciated if everyone were to give, according to his or her resources, his or her utmost, in contributing to this new phase of the seminar. Your utmost consists in not replying with a long face, saying it just so happens that this week you are particularly heavily burdened, when I call upon one or other of you and consign a specific segment of our common task to him or her.

I am talking here to those who are part of the psychoanalytic group that we represent. I would like you to realise that if it is constituted as such, as an autonomous group, it is for a task that for each of us brings with it nothing less than the future – the meaning of everything which we do and will have to do for the rest of our lives. If you are not coming to put into question everything you do, I don't see why you're here. Why would those who do not sense the meaning of this task remain tied to us, rather than joining up with some sort of bureaucracy or other?

These reflections are particularly pertinent, to my way of thinking, just when we are going to tackle what are commonly called Freud's Papers on Technique.

Papers on Technique is a term that a certain tradition has already fixed upon. During Freud's lifetime, a small octavo volume was published with the title Zur Technik der Psychoanalyse und zur Metapsychologie, which brought together a certain number of Freud's writings dating from 1904 to 1919, whose title, presentation, contents indicated that they dealt with psychoanalytic method.

The motivation and justification for this format is that there are good grounds for cautioning an inexperienced practitioner who would like to embark upon analysis, so that he might avoid a certain number of confusions regarding the practice of the method, and also regarding its essence.

There are passages in these writings which are extremely important for understanding the progress that the development of practice has seen over these years. What one sees gradually appearing there are notions fundamental to the mode of operation of the analytic therapy, the notion of resistance and the function of transference, the mode of operation and of intervention in the transference, and even, up to a certain point, the essential role of the transference neurosis. There's no need, then, to underline any further the quite special interest this little collection of writings possesses.

To be sure, this way of bringing them together is not entirely satisfactory, and the term Papers on Technique is perhaps not what gives it its unity. They possess no less of a unity for all that. The whole attests to a stage in the development of Freud's thought. We will study it from this perspective.

There is an intermediary step here. It follows on from the initial development of what someone, an analyst who does not always have a way with words, but who on this occasion made a rather fortunate, even beautiful, find, has called Freud's seminal experience. It antedates the elaboration of the structural theory.[1]

The beginnings of this intermediary step should be placed between 1904 and 1909.

The article on the psychoanalytic method appeared in 1904;[2] some say that this is where the word psychoanalysis first appears – which isn't true, since Freud had used it well before, but what matters is that it is there used in a formal manner, in the very title of the article. 1909 – the date of the lectures at Clark University, Freud's journey to America, accompanied by his son, Jung.

If we pick up the thread again in the year 1920, we find the theory of the agencies, the structural, or again the metapsychological theory, as Freud called it. That is another theoretical development which he bequeathed to us out of his experience and his discovery.

As you see, the so-called papers on technique are spread between these two advances. It is what gives them their meaning. It is a mistake to think that they owe their unity to the fact that Freud discusses technique in them.

[1] The structural theory is the shorthand term for Freud's theory of the ego, id and super-ego, introduced with The Ego and the Id (1923b).

[2] 'Freud's psycho-analytic procedure' (1904a) GW V 3–10; Stud Erg 101–6; SE VII 249–54.

In a certain sense, Freud never ceased discussing technique. I only have to remind you of the Studien über Hysterie, which is nothing other than one long account of the discovery of the analytic technique. That is where we witness it in the making, and that is what makes these studies priceless. If we wanted to give a complete and systematic account of the development of Freud's technique, we would have to start with them. I have not taken up the Studien über Hysterie for the simple reason that they are not easily accessible, since not all of you read German, nor even English – to be sure, there are more reasons than just those of expediency leading me to choose instead the Papers on Technique.

The Interpretation of Dreams is itself always, endlessly, about technique. If we put to one side what he wrote on mythological, anthropological and cultural topics, hardly any of Freud's work fails to tell us something about technique. I do not need to emphasise that an article like 'Analysis terminable and interminable', which appeared around 1934, is one of the most important on technique.

I would now like to stress what in my opinion is the best frame of mind in which to conduct our commentary on these papers this term. This is a matter that should be settled today.

If we are under the impression that we are here to stand back in admiration of the Freudian texts and marvel at them, we will certainly be well satisfied.

The freshness and vivacity of these papers is not surpassed by any of Freud's other writings. At times his personality is revealed in them in so direct a manner that one cannot fail to remark it. The simplicity and frankness of tone are in and of themselves a kind of education.

More specifically, the ease with which the question of practical rules to be observed is dealt with shows us the extent to which they were, for Freud, an instrument, in the sense that one says one has a hammer firmly in hand. Firmly held by this hand of mine, he says in short, and this is how I am accustomed to holding it. Others may possibly prefer a marginally different instrument, which sits better in their hand. You will come across passages that will tell you that far more clearly than I do in this metaphorical way.

So the codification of rules of technique is dealt with in these papers with a freedom which in and of itself might well be a sufficient education, and even on a first reading bears fruit and yields its reward. There is nothing more wholesome and liberating. And nothing demonstrates more clearly that the real issue lies elsewhere.

But that's not all. In the manner in which Freud communicates to us what we could call the paths of the truth of his thought, there is a quite different aspect, to be discovered in those passages which may perhaps appear of secondary importance, but which are nonetheless quite perceptible. It is the long-suffering side of his personality, the feeling he has of the necessity of authority, which in his case is not without a certain fundamental depreciation of what anyone who has something to communicate or teach can expect from those who listen to and follow him. In many a place we come across a measure of profound contempt for the manner in which these things are made use of and understood. As you will see, I even believe that one finds in him a very specific disparagement of the human raw material made available to him by the society in which he lived. Undoubtedly this is what allows us to catch a glimpse of why Freud, in contrast to what happens in his writings, mobilised the full weight of his authority so as to assure, so he believed, the future of analysis. He both excluded all manner of doctrinal dissensions – quite real dissensions – which emerged, and at the same time was quite imperious as to what could be organised around him as the means for the transmission of his teaching.

All this is only a glimpse of what this reading reveals of the historical aspects of Freud's activity and presence. Are we going to restrict ourselves to this level? Certainly not, if only because it would be quite ineffectual, despite the interest, the stimulation, the amusement and relaxation that we might expect from it.

It is always in relation to the question, what do we do when we do analysis? that up to now I have offered this commentary of Freud. The scrutiny of these short papers will be undertaken in the same spirit. Hence my starting point is the current state of technique – what is said, written and done concerning analytic technique.

I don't know if most of you – I hope at least some – are fully aware of the following fact. When – I am referring to the present, 1954, this brand new year – we examine now the manner in which the diverse practitioners of analysis think, express, conceive of their technique, we conclude that things have come to such a pass that it would not be an exaggeration to call it the most radical confusion. I can tell you that right now, amongst those who are analysts, and who think – which already limits the field – there isn't perhaps a single one who, deep down, has the same conception as any other of his contemporaries or peers as to what one does, what one aims to do, what one achieves, what is going on in analysis.

It has even got to the point where we could amuse ourselves with the little game of comparing the most extreme conceptions – we would see that they arrive at formulations which are strictly contradictory. Without even seeking out those who cherish paradoxes – anyhow, there aren't that many of them. The question is of such import that the various theoreticians tackle it with no inclination to whimsicality, and humour, in general, is excluded from their laborious pontifications on therapeutic results, their forms, their procedures and the means by which one obtains them. They content themselves with hanging on to a balustrade, to a guard-rail offered by some corner or another of Freud's theoretical system. This alone gives each of them the guarantee that he is still communicating with those who are his fellow-analysts and colleagues. The Freudian language acts as the go-between by which a channel of communication is kept open between practitioners who hold to manifestly different conceptions of their therapeutic activity, and, what is more, of the general form of this interhuman relation called psychoanalysis.

When I say interhuman relation, you can already see that I am describing things the way they are today. Indeed, the elaboration of the notion of the relation between analyst and analysand is the path taken by contemporary analytic doctrines in trying to rediscover a firm basis for the realities of that experience. Certainly it represents the most fertile line of thought traced out since Freud's death. Balint calls it a two-body psychology[3] – a term which, in fact, is not his, but which he borrowed from the late Rickman, one of the rare souls to have had a modicum of theoretical originality in analytic circles since Freud's death.[4] Around this formula one may quite easily align all studies on object-relations, on the importance of counter-transference, and on a certain set of related terms, amongst which fantasy stands in the foreground. The imaginary inter-reaction between analysand and analyst is thus something we shall have to take into consideration.

Does this mean that this is the way to locate our problem precisely? On the one hand, yes. On the other, no.

It is very worthwhile to stimulate research of this character in as much as it highlights the originality of what is at stake when compared to a one-body psychology,[5] the conventional constructive psychology. But is it sufficient to say that we are dealing with a relation between two individuals? It is in this way that we are brought to recognise the impasses into which theories of technique are currently led.

I am not in a position to say more to you about this for the moment – even though, as those who are old hands in this seminar know, you are obviously aware that there is no two-body psychology[5] without the intervention of a third element. If, as we must, we take speech as the central feature of our perspective, then it is within a three- rather than two-term relation that we have to formulate the analytic experience in its totality.

Balint's phrase is 'two-person psychology'.

[5] English in the original.

Which doesn't mean to say that we cannot express fragments, pieces and tail-ends of it in other registers. In that way you can grasp the kind of obstacles the theoreticians have come up against. It's really very easy to understand – if the foundation of the inter-analytic relation is truly something that we are obliged to represent as being triadic, there are a number of different ways of choosing two elements from out of this triad. You can put the accent on one or other of the three dyadic relations that are set up within it. As you will see, this furnishes a practical means of classifying a certain number of theoretical elaborations concerning technique that have been proposed.

All this may appear to you at the moment to be a little abstract, and I want to do my best to tell you something a bit more concrete, to bring you into this discussion.

I am going to remind you quickly of Freud's seminal experience which I mentioned earlier on, since in fact that is what was partly the object of our lectures of last term, totally centred as they were on the notion that the complete reconstitution of the subject's history is the element that is essential, constitutive and structural for analytic progress.

I believe that I have demonstrated that that is where Freud started from. What is at issue for him is the understanding of an individual case. That is what gives each of the five great case-histories their value. The three that we have already looked at, pondered over and worked on together in previous years show you just that. Freud's progress, the discoveries he made, lies in the way he considers the singularity of a case.

Consider it in its singularity, what does that mean? That means essentially that, for him, the interest, the essence, the basis, the dimension proper to analysis is the reintegration by the subject of his history right up to the furthermost perceptible limits, that is to say into a dimension that goes well beyond the limits of the individual. To lay the foundations, deduce it, demonstrate it employing a thousand subtleties in Freud's texts, is what we have accomplished together over the last few years.

What reveals this dimension is the accent that Freud puts in each case on those points that it is essential to overcome by means of the technique and which are what I will call the bearings [situations] of the history. Does this amount to placing the accent on the past, as it may appear at first sight? I showed you that it is not as simple as that. History is not the past. History is the past in so far as it is historicised in the present – historicised in the present because it was lived in the past.

The path of restitution of the subject's history takes the form of a quest for the restitution of the past. We should consider this restitution as the butt to be aimed at by the recourses of technique.

Throughout Freud's works, in which, as I have told you, technical suggestions are to be found at every turn, you will discover that the restitution of the past retained its prominent position in his preoccupations right to the end. That is why the very questions which are opened up by Freud's discovery are raised by this restitution of the past, and they turn out to be none other than the questions which up to now have been avoided, skirted round, in analysis I mean, namely those which bear on the function of time in the realisation of the human subject.

When we return to the origin of the Freudian experience – when I say origin, I do not mean historical origin but point-source – one realises that this is what has always kept analysis alive, despite the profoundly different garbs it has been given. Again and again, Freud emphasises the restitution of the past, even when, with the conception of the three agencies – you will see that one can even talk of four – he gives a considerable extension to the structural point of view, favouring thereby a certain orientation which will increasingly focus on the analytic relation in the present, on the here and now of the session, between the four walls of analysis.

To back up what I am telling you, all I need do is cite an article he published in 1934, Konstruktionen in der Analyse, in which what is at issue, again and as ever, is the reconstruction of the subject's history.[6] You won't find a more characteristic instance of the persistence of this point of view in all of Freud's work. In this article, it is something like a final insistence on this pivotal theme. We have here something like the distilled essence, the point, the last word on what has been at stake all along, in a work as central as the Wolfman – what value does the subject's reconstructed past have?

One could say that Freud touches there – though one senses it in many other places in his corpus – on a notion that was emerging in the course of our discussions last term, and which is roughly the following – the fact that the subject relives, comes to remember, in the intuitive sense of the word, the formative events of his existence, is not in itself so very important. What matters is what he reconstructs of it.

On this point, there are some striking turns of phrase. After all, Freud writes, Träume, dreams, sind auch erinnern, are also a way of remembering.[7] He even goes so far as to say that screen-memories themselves are, after all, an adequate representative of what is at issue.[8] To be sure, in their manifest form as memories, they certainly are not, but if we work on them sufficiently they render up to us the equivalent of what we are looking for.

Can you see where this is all leading to? It leads, within Freud's own conception, to an idea that what is involved is a reading, a qualified and skilled translation of the cryptogram representing what the subject is conscious of at the moment – what am I going to say now? of himself? no, not only of himself – of himself and of everything else, that is to say of the whole of his system.

As I told you just a moment ago, the restitution of the subject's wholeness appears in the guise of a restoration of the past. But the stress is always placed more on the side of reconstruction than on that of reliving, in the sense we have grown used to calling affective. The precise reliving – that the subject remembers something as truly belonging to him, as having truly been lived through, with which he communicates, and which he adopts – we have the most explicit indication in Freud's writings that that is not what is essential. What is essential is reconstruction, the term he employs right up until the end.

There is something truly remarkable here, which would be paradoxical if we gained access to it without having an awareness of the meaning it may take on in the register of speech, which I am trying here to highlight as being necessary to the understanding of our experience. I would say – when all is said and done, it is less a matter of remembering than of rewriting history.

I tell you what there is in Freud. That doesn't imply that he was right; but this thread is continuous, permanently subjacent to his thought's development. He never abandoned something which can only be put in the way I've found of saying it – rewriting history – a formula which allows one to put in perspective the various directions that he gives apropos of little details in the narratives within analysis.

To the Freudian conception that I am expounding to you, I could counterpose completely different conceptions of the analytic experience.

Certain authors maintain that analysis is a sort of homeopathic discharge by the subject of his fantasised understanding of the world. In their view, this fantasised understanding should, little by little, within the day-to-day experience taking place in the consulting-room, boil down, transform itself, and achieve a new equilibrium within a given relation to the real. What is emphasised here, as you see, in clear contrast to Freud, is the transformation of the fantasised relation in the course of a relation which one calls, without further ado, real.

Certainly one can formulate these matters in a more open fashion, sufficiently nuanced to accommodate the plurality of the expression, as has been done by someone to whom I have already referred here, who has written on technique. None of which, in the end, stops it from coming back to that. Some peculiar repercussions thereby result, which we will be in a position to point to when we come to our commentary on the Freudian texts.

How did the practice that Freud initiated get transformed into a manipulation of the analyst analysand relationship in the sense that I have just outlined? That's the fundamental question that we will be encountering in the course of the study we are undertaking.

The ideas that Freud introduced in the period immediately after that of the Papers on Technique, namely those of the three agencies, were greeted, employed, and dealt with in such a way as to result in this transformation. Of the three, the ego took on the greatest importance. Since then all subsequent development of analytic technique has revolved around the conception of the ego, and that is where we must locate the source of all the difficulties arising out of the theoretical elaboration on this development in practice.

There is, without doubt, a world of difference between what we actually do in this sort of den where the patient talks to us and where, from time to time, we talk to him – and the theoretical account that we give of it. Even in Freud, where the gap is infinitely more narrow, we have the impression that some distance remains.

I am certainly not the only one to have asked myself the question – what was Freud really doing? Bergler asked this question in plain black and white, and answers that we don't really know much, apart from what Freud himself allowed us to see when he himself set down, also in plain black and white, the fruits of certain of his experiences, namely his five great case-histories. They are the best introduction we have to the manner in which Freud behaved. But it really does seem as if the character of this experience cannot be reproduced in its concrete reality. For one very simple reason, on which I have already insisted – the singularity of the analytic experience, when it comes to Freud.

It really was Freud who opened up this path of experience. This in itself gave him an absolutely unique perspective, as his dialogue with the patient demonstrates. As one can sense all the time, the patient is for him only a sort of prop, or question, or sometimes even a check, along the path that he, Freud, took alone. Hence, the drama, in the true sense of the word, of his quest. The drama which, in each of the cases he gave us, ends in failure.

Throughout his life, Freud followed the paths that he opened up in the course of this experience, attaining in the end something that one could call a promised land. One cannot say, however, that he entered into it. You need only read what can be considered to be his testament, 'Analysis terminable and interminable', in order to see that if there was one thing that he was aware of, it was that he hadn't entered into it, into the promised land. This article isn't recommended reading for all and sundry, for anyone who knows how to read – luckily there are not that many people who do know how to read – it is a difficult one to digest if you happen to be an analyst – if you aren't an analyst, you don't give a toss.

Those who find themselves in a position to follow Freud are confronted with the question as to how the paths we inherit were adopted, reapprehended, and rethought through. So, we cannot do anything else but gather together what we will contribute to it under the heading of a critique, a critique of analytic technique.

Technique is, and can only be, of any value to the extent that we understand wherein lies the fundamental question for the analyst who adopts it. Well then, we should note first of all that we hear the ego spoken of as the ally of the analyst, and not only the ally, but the sole source of knowledge. The only thing we know of is the ego, that's the way it is usually put. Anna Freud, Fenichel, nearly all those who have written about analysis since 1920, say it over and over again – We speak only to the ego, we are in communication with the ego alone, everything is channelled via the ego.

On the other hand, in contrast, every advance made by this ego psychology can be summed up as follows – the ego is structured exactly like a symptom. At the heart of the subject, it is only a privileged symptom, the human symptom par excellence, the mental illness of man.

To translate the analytic ego in this quick and shorthand manner is at best to sum up what emerges from a straightforward reading of Anna Freud's book, The Ego and the Mechanisms of Defence. One cannot avoid being struck by the fact that the ego is constructed and is to be located within the subject as a whole, just as a symptom. Nothing differentiates the one from the other. No objection can be made to this quite dazzling argument. No less dazzling is the fact that things have got so confused that the catalogue of defence mechanisms which make up the ego is as heterogeneous a list as one could conceive of. Anna Freud herself underscores this very clearly – to bring repression closer to notions such as the turning of the drive against its object, or the inversion of its aims, is to put side by side elements which are in no respect homogeneous.

Given the point where we still find ourselves, perhaps we cannot do any better now. But we can still highlight the profound ambiguity of the conception analysts entertain of the ego – which is the only thing to which one has access, despite also being only another hindrance, a failure [acte manqué], a slip.

At the start of his chapters on analytic interpretation, Fenichel speaks of the ego as everyone does, and feels the need to say that it plays the essential role of being a function by which the subject learns the meaning of words. So, from the very start, then, Fenichel is at the heart of the matter. Everything is there. The issue is knowing whether the meaning of the ego exceeds the self [moi].

If this function is a function of the ego, everything that follows in Fenichel's account is incomprehensible, and, besides, he doesn't press the point. I say that it is a slip of the pen, since it isn't pursued, and everything that goes on from there amounts to saying the opposite, and leads him to the conclusion that, in the end, the id and the ego amount to exactly the same thing, which isn't about to clarify matters. But, I repeat, either the subsequent argument is unthinkable or it is not true that the ego is the function through which the subject learns the meaning of words.

This ego, what is it? What is the subject caught up in, which is, beyond the meaning of words, a completely different matter – language, whose role is formative, quite fundamental in his history. With respect to Freud's Papers on Technique we will have to ask ourselves these questions, which will take us a long way – but only on condition that, it is first of all in relation to each of our experiences.

It will also be incumbent upon us, when we try to engage in discussions taking as our starting point the present state of theory and technique, to ask ourselves what was already implicit in what Freud brought us. What, perhaps, already inclined him towards those formulae to which we are now led in our practices? What constraints might there be in the manner in which we are led to look at things? Or, in what sense does something that has happened since amount to being a development, a more rigorous systematisation which corresponds better to reality? This is the register within which our commentary will take on its meaning.

I would like to give you a still clearer sense of how I envisage this seminar.

At the end of the last few lectures I delivered to you, you had a taste of a reading of what can be called the psychoanalytic myth. The direction of this reading is not so much that of criticism as of gauging the reality which confronted it, and to which it offers its mythical reply.

Well, the problem is more restricted, but also much more pressing, where technique is concerned.

Indeed, the scrutiny that we will have to engage in of everything pertaining to our technique falls within the purview of our own discipline. If we have to differentiate the actions and the behaviour of the subject from what he says to us about them in the session, I would say that our actual behaviour in the analytic session is just as far from the theoretical account that we give of it.

But this is only a first truth, which only has significance in so far as it may be reversed, and at the same time mean – just as close. The fundamental absurdity of interhuman behaviour can only be comprehended in the light of this system – as Melanie Klein so happily called it, not knowing, as usual, what she was saying – called the human ego, namely that set of defences, of denials [négations], of dams, of inhibitions, of fundamental fantasies which orient and direct the subject. Well then, the theoretical conception we have of our technique, even if it doesn't coincide exactly with what we are doing, doesn't structure any the less, or motivate any the less, the least of our interventions with the said patients.

And that is precisely what is so serious. Because we have effectively allowed ourselves – in the sense, revealed to us by analysis, in which we allow ourselves things, without knowing it – to bring our ego into play in the analysis. Since it is argued that one is trying to bring about the patient's readaptation to the real, one really ought to find out if it is the analyst's ego which offers the measure of the real.

To be sure, it isn't enough to have a definite conception of the ego for our ego to come into play like a bull in the china shop of our relation to the patient. But a certain way of conceiving of the function of the ego in analysis does have some relation to a certain practice of analysis that we might well call inauspicious.

I am only opening up the question. It is our task to resolve it. The totality of each of our world systems – I am referring to the concrete system which doesn't have to be already spelled out for it to be there, which does not pertain to the order of the unconscious, but which acts in the manner in which we express ourselves in daily life, in the smallest spontaneous detail of our discourse – is that something which must in actual fact, yea or nay, be employed in analysis as the yardstick?

I think I have opened up the question sufficiently for you now to see the point of what we can do together.

Mannoni, will you get together with one of your neighbours, Anzieu for instance, to study the notion of resistance in those of Freud's writings available to you under the title On Psychoanalytic Technique, published by Presses Universitaires?[9] Don't overlook the concluding lectures of the Introductory Lectures. Will two others, Perrier and Granoff for instance, collaborate on the same topic? Then we will see how to proceed. We will let ourselves be guided by experience itself.

Preliminary comments on the problem of resistance

ANALYSIS THE FIRST TIME

ANALYSIS OF ANALYSIS

Following O. Mannoni's presentation.

We should offer our heartiest thanks to Mannoni who has given us a most happy prologue to the resumption of the seminar's dialogue. Nonetheless, he has distinctly phenomenological leanings, and I don't think that the solution has quite the form that he leads us to believe – as he himself has sensed. But it is useful to have framed the question as he has, by speaking of an interpersonal mechanism, although the word 'mechanism' can only be an approximation at this juncture.

Interruption in the course of D. Anzieu's presentation.

Freud explains, apropos of Lucy R., that he had recourse to pressure of the hands when he could only obtain partial hypnosis. Later on, he says that he stopped worrying about this, and even renounced seeking an answer from the subject to the question, in accordance with the classical method, are you asleep?, since he had had the unpleasant experience of receiving the reply, no, I am not at all asleep – which put him in a rather embarrassing position.[1] He recounts in a naive and charming manner that he was obliged to tell the subject that he was not talking about quite the same sort of sleep as that to which the other's reply pertained, and that the latter must, nonetheless, have been a little bit asleep. Within the limits of the most perfect ambiguity, he quite clearly states that all this put him in a most embarrassing position, which only came to an end the day he no longer cared one way or the other.

[1] Studies on Hysteria (1895d) GW I 165–6; SE II 108–9.

But he retained the pressure of hands, either on the forehead or on either side of the head, and at the same time he asked the patient to concentrate upon the cause of the symptom. That was an intermediary stage between dialogue and hypnosis. The symptoms were dealt with one by one, in themselves, tackled directly like so many formal problems. In Freud's hands, the patient was assured that the memories which were going to come forth were the most relevant ones, that all he had to do was trust in that. And Freud added the detail that it would be at the moment when he removed his hands – mimicking the lifting of the barrier – that the patient would be completely aware, and would only have to take hold of what came into his mind in order to be certain of being on the right track.

It is quite remarkable that this method proved itself perfectly effective, for the cases which Freud tells us of. Indeed, the case of Lucy R., which is so elegant, was entirely solved, with an effortlessness which has all the beauty of works by primitives. You'll find happy chance, a benevolent divine conjunction, in everything new that is discovered. In contrast, with Anna O. we find the hard labour of working-through[2] possessing all the animation and density of the most modern analytic cases, despite the method that was used – the whole series of events, the whole history, is relived and re-worked several times. It required work of extended scope, lasting almost a year. In the case of Lucy R., things happened much more quickly, and with an elegance that turns it into something quite striking. Undoubtedly we aren't truly able to see where the mainsprings lie, on account of its being too compressed, but, even so, it is of enormous use. This woman had what one could call olfactory hallucinations, hysterical symptoms, and their signification was detected, with locations and dates, in an altogether happy manner. On this occasion, Freud reveals all the minutiae of his way of working.

Idem.

I have already emphasised the uniquely privileged character of the cases which Freud dealt with, on account of the special character of his technique. What that was, we can only guess at on the basis of a number of rules which he has given us, and which have been faithfully applied. As the best authors, and those who knew Freud, have admitted, one cannot gain a complete conception of the way in which he applied the technique.

I must emphasise the fact that Freud progressed on a course of research which is not characterised by the same style as other scientific research. Its domain is that of the truth of the subject. The quest for truth is not entirely reducible to the objective, and objectifying, quest of ordinary scientific method. What is at stake is the realisation of the truth of the subject, like a dimension peculiar to it which must be detached in its distinctiveness [originalité] in relation to the very notion of reality – I have emphasised this in all of this year's lectures.

Freud was taken up in the quest for a truth which engaged him totally, including there his own self, and hence also his presence with respect to the patient in his function, let us say, of therapist – even though the term is completely inadequate as a description of his attitude. As Freud himself said, this engagement gave an absolutely unique character to his relations with his patients.

To be sure, analysis as a science is always a science of the particular. The coming to fruition of an analysis is always a unique case, even if these unique cases lend themselves all the same to some generality, since there is more than one analyst. But with Freud the analytic experience represents uniqueness carried to its limit, from the fact that he was in the process of building and verifying analysis itself. We cannot obliterate the fact that it was the first time that an analysis was undertaken. Doubtless the method is derived from it, but it is only method for other people. Freud, for his part, did not apply a method. If we overlook the unique and inaugural character of his endeavour, we will be committing a serious error.

Analysis is an experience of the particular. The very first experience of this particular thus takes on an even more peculiar value. If we do not emphasise the difference between this first time and everything that has followed since, we, who are interested not so much in this truth as in the construction of the access roads to this truth, will never be able to grasp the meaning of certain sentences, certain texts, which come into view in Freud's oeuvre, and subsequently take on, in other contexts, a completely different meaning, even though one might consider them to be stencilled one on top of the other.

The interest of these commentaries on the Freudian texts allows us to follow out in detail those questions which – as you will see, as you already see today – have a considerable importance. They are numerous and insidious – strictly speaking the sort of questions that each and everyone of us is careful to avoid, relying instead on a jingle, a formula which is schematic, abbreviated and vivid.

D. Anzieu cites a passage from the Studies on Hysteria, (SE II 287–9). Interruption.

What's striking about the passage that you refer to is that it takes off from the pseudo-anatomical metaphor called to mind whenever Freud talks about verbal images wandering up and down the nerve fibres. Here, what is stratified around the pathogenic nucleus calls to mind a bundle of papers, a score with several registers. These metaphors overpoweringly tend to suggest the materialisation of speech, not the mythical materialisation of the neurologists, but a concrete materialisation – speech begins to flow in the leaves of a printed manuscript. The metaphor of the blank page, of the palimpsest, is also taken up on another occasion.[3] It has since appeared under the pen of more than one analyst.

Here we come upon the idea of several longitudinal strata, that is to say of several threads of discourse. One may imagine them as rendered material in the text in the form of literally concrete bundles. There is a stream of parallel words, and these broaden out at a certain moment to encompass this famous pathogenic nucleus which itself is also a story, they move away from it in order to include it and join up a little further on.

The phenomenon of resistance is to be located precisely at this point. There are two directions, one longitudinal and one radial. Resistance acts in the radial direction, when one wants to get closer to the threads which lie at the heart of the bundle. It is the result of an attempt to move from the external registers towards the centre. From the repressed nucleus a positive repulsive force is exerted, and when one strives to reach the threads of the discourse which are closest to it, you feel resistance. Freud even goes so far as to write, not in the Studies, but in a later text, published under the title Métapsychologie that the strength of the resistance is inversely proportional to one's distance from the repressed centre.[4]

I am not sure if this is the exact wording, but it is very striking. It makes manifest the materialisation of resistance acquired in the course of experience, and precisely, as Mannoni put it just now, in the subject's discourse. In order to know where it is happening [où ça se passe], what the material, biological foundation is, Freud quite straightforwardly takes the discourse to be a reality in its own right, a reality which is there, a sheaf, a bundle of proofs as one also calls it, a bundle of juxtaposed discourses which overlap, follow on from each other, forming a dimension, a layer, a dossier.

The notion of a material support of speech, singled out as such, was not yet available to Freud. Today, he would have taken the succession of phonemes which make up a part of the subject's discourse as the basis for his metaphor. He would say that one encounters greater and greater resistance the closer the subject comes to a discourse which would be the ultimate one, the right one, but one which he absolutely refuses.

[4] 'Repression' (1915d) GW X 251; Stud III 110; SE XIV 149. At the time Lacan spoke, the article was to be found in French in Métapsychologie, trans. M. Bonaparte and A. Berman, Paris: Gallinard, 1940, pp. 67–90.

In the attempt at synthesis that you are making, what has not perhaps been highlighted is the question which however is in the foreground, where resistance is concerned – the question concerning the relations of the unconscious and the conscious. Is resistance a phenomenon which occurs only in analysis? Or is it something we can talk about when the subject goes about his business outside of analysis, and even before he enters into it, or after he has left it? Does resistance continue to have a meaning outside of analysis?

There is a discussion of resistance in the analysis of dreams, to which neither of you have referred, and which nevertheless constitutes the implicit hypothesis behind some of the problems both of you have raised, since Freud there asks himself about the inaccessible nature of the unconscious.[5] The ideas of resistance are extremely old. And right from the start, from Freud's initial researches, resistance is linked to the idea of the ego. But when one reads some startling sentences in the text of the Studies, where it is not just a question of the ego as such, but of the ego as representing the ideational mass, one realises that the notion of the ego already foreshadows for Freud all the problems that it now presents for us. I would almost say that it is a notion with retroactive effect. It even seems, from reading these early pieces in the light of what has developed since around the ego, that the most recent formulations mask, rather than reveal.

One cannot but see in this phrase, the ideational mass,[6] something very close to a formula that I could have given you, namely that the counter-transference is nothing other than the function of the analyst's ego, what I have called the sum total of the analyst's prejudices. Thus, one discovers in the patient a whole organisation of certainties, beliefs, of coordinates, of references, which constitute in the strictest sense what Freud right from the beginning called an ideational system, which we can in an abbreviated manner here call the system.

Does resistance stem only from that? When, at the limit of this domain of speech which is exactly the ideational mass of the ego, I portrayed for you the sum of silence after which another speech again makes its appearance, that speech which is to be reconquered in the unconscious since it is that part of the subject separated from his history – is that resistance? Is it, yea or nay, purely and simply the ego's organisation which, in and of itself, constitutes resistance? Is this what makes it difficult to gain access to the contents of the unconscious in the radial dimension – to use Freud's term? That is a very simple question, too simple, insoluble as such.

Fortunately, in the first thirty years of this century, analytic technique made sufficient progress, has been through enough experimental phases to distinguish its own questions. As you see, it boils down to this – which as I told you will be the model of our quest – we must assume that the evolution, the ups and downs of the analytic experience teach us something concerning the very nature of this experience, in so far as it is also a human experience, masked from itself. That is applying to analysis itself the schema that it has taught us. After all, isn't it itself a roundabout way of having access to the unconscious? It also raises to the second degree the problem that is set for us by neurosis. I am only making a claim for this now, you'll see it demonstrated as we examine it.

[5] See GW II/III 527–30; Stud II 500–3; SE V 522–5.

What do I want? – if not to get out of this genuine impasse, mental and practical, in which analysis has now ended up. You see that I push what I say quite far – it is incumbent on us to submit even analysis to the operational schema that it has taught us and which consists in reading enough in the different phases of its theoretico-technical development to advance further towards the reconquest of the authentic reality of the unconscious by the subject.

This method will require us to go well beyond the simple formal catalogue of procedures or of conceptual categories. Submitting analysis to an examination which is itself analytic is a step which will reveal its fertility in relation to technique, as fertile as it has already revealed itself in relation to Freud's clinical writings.

Interventions in the course of the discussion.

Psychoanalytic writings swarm with improprieties of method. These are difficult themes to deal with, to verbalise, without giving the verb a subject, in addition we are always reading that the ego emits the signal of anxiety, handles the life instinct, death instinct – one no longer knows where the switch board, the signalman, the pointer is. All of this is quite improper. We are continually finding Maxwell's little demons making an appearance in analytic writing, possessing foresight, intelligence . . . The annoying thing is that analysts do not have a clear idea of the nature of these demons.

We're here to discover what the evocation of the notion of the ego means from one end to the other of Freud's work. It's impossible to understand what this notion represents as it began to emerge with the work of the 1920s, with the studies on the psychology of groups and Das Ich und das Es, if one starts by drowning everything in a sum total, under the pretext that what is involved is the apprehension of a certain aspect of the psyche. That's not at all what the ego is in Freud's work. It has a functional role, linked to technical necessities.

The triumvirate who work in New York, Hartmann, Loewenstein and Kris, in its current attempt to elaborate a psychology of the ego, is always asking itself – what was Freud trying to get at in his last theory of the ego? Has anyone up to now really drawn out all the technical implications from it? I am not interpreting, I am only repeating what can be found in Hartmann's two or three most recent articles. In the Psychoanalytic Quarterly for 1951, you'll find three articles by Loewenstein, Kris and Hartmann on this topic, which are worth reading. It can't be said that they lead to a fully satisfying formulation, but they are looking in that direction, and propose theoretical principles which have very important technical applications, which according to them have not been noticed. It is very interesting to follow the development of this work in a series of articles we have seen appear over several years, especially since the end of the war. I believe that what has happened there is a very significant failure, one which has to be very instructive for us.

In any case, there is a world of difference between the ego as discussed in the Studies, the ideational mass, container of ideations, and the final theory of the ego, such as it had been wrought by Freud himself from 1920 on, which is still a problem for us. Between the two lies the central field we are in the process of studying.

How did this final theory of the ego get to see the light of day? It is the apex of Freud's theoretical elaboration, an extremely original and novel theory. Yet, under Hartmann's pen, it seems as if it strove with all its might to merge once again with classical psychology.

Both of these things are true. This theory, Kris writes, brings psychoanalysis within general psychology, and, at the same time, constitutes an unprecedented innovation. A paradox that we will highlight here, whether we carry on with the technical papers up to the holidays, or tackle the same problem in Schreber's writings.

In Bergman's article, Germinal Cell, the germinal cell of analytic observations is taken to be the notion of a rediscovery and restitution of the past. He refers to the Studien über Hysterie in order to show how, right up to the end of his work, right up the final expressions of his thought, Freud always kept this notion of the past in the foreground, in a thousand forms, and above all in the form of reconstruction. In this article, the experience of resistance is therefore in no way considered as central.

M. Hyppolite is alluding to the fact that Freud's anatomical researches can be viewed as successes, and have been recognised as such. In contrast, when he set himself to work at the physiological level, he seems to have shown a certain lack of interest. That is one of the reasons why he didn't recognise the importance of the discovery of cocaine. His physiological research was feeble, because it stuck fast to therapeutics. Freud concerned himself with the use of cocaine as an analgesic, and left to one side its anaesthetic value.

Here we are reminding ourselves of a trait of Freud's personality. Certainly we can ask ourselves if he was, as Z* was saying, keeping himself for a more glorious destiny. But to go so far as to say that turning towards psychopathology was for him a compensation is, I believe, a bit excessive. If one reads the works published under the title The Origins of Psycho-analysis and the rediscovered early manuscript in which the theory of the psychic apparatus figures, one realises that he was following the line of contemporary theoretical elaboration of the mechanistic functioning of the nervous apparatus – besides, everyone recognised it.

One shouldn't really be surprised therefore that electrical metaphors are mixed up in it. But nor should you forget that the electric current was experimented with for the first time in the area of nerve conduction, without anyone knowing what the implications would be.

Z*: I believe that, from the clinical point of view, the notion of resistance clearly represents an experience that we all encounter at some time or another with almost all the patients in our practices – he is resisting and it makes me furious.

Sorry? What's that?

Z*: I mean that extremely unpleasant experience when you say to yourself – he was on the point of discovering, he could have discovered himself, he knows it without knowing that he knows it, all he has to do is take the trouble to look up, and this damn idiot, this cretin, all those aggressive and hostile words that leap to mind, doesn't do it. And the temptation that one feels to push him, to compel him, . . .

Don't get too excited about it.

M. Hyppolite: The only thing that allows the analyst to be intelligent, is when this resistance makes the analysand look like an idiot. It promotes heightened self-esteem.

All the same, the trap of counter-transference, since we have to to call it that, is more insidious than this first plane.

Z*: For direct power over human beings, Freud substitutes the indirect and more palatable power that science gives over nature. We see here again the mechanism of intellectualisation, understand nature and by that very fact subdue her to oneself, the classical formula of determinism, which allusively refers back to Freud's authoritarian character, which punctuates the whole of his history, particularly in his relations with heretics as much as with his disciples.

I ought to say that if I do speak in this manner, I stopped short of making it the key to the Freudian discovery.

Z*: I don't think I'm making it the key either, but it is an interesting point to highlight. In this resistance, Freud's hypersensitivity to the subject's resistance is not unconnected to his own character.

What allows you to speak of Freud's hypersensitivity?

Z*: The fact that he, and not Breuer, nor Charcot, nor anyone else, discovered it. After all, it happened to him, because he felt it more keenly, and he accounted for what he had experienced.

You believe that the fact of bringing out a function like resistance indicates a specific intolerance in the subject to whatever resists him? Isn't it, on the contrary, knowing how to conquer it, how to go elsewhere and well beyond, which allowed Freud to turn it into one of the mainsprings of the therapy, a factor which one can render objective, nameable and manageable? You think that Freud was more authoritarian than Charcot? – whereas Freud, in so far as he could, renounced suggestion so as to let the subject integrate what the resistances separated him from. In other words, are those who fail to recognise [méconnaissent] resistance less authoritarian, or is it the person who recognises it for what it is? I am rather inclined to believe that someone who, in hypnotism, attempts to make an object of the subject, his thing, to make him as supple as a glove so as to give him any form that he chooses, so as to take from him what he wants, is, more so than Freud, driven by a need to dominate and exercise his power. In contrast, Freud seems respectful of what is generally known as the object's resistance.

Z*: Certainly.

I believe that one must be extremely careful here. We cannot make use of our technique so importunately. When I talk about analysing Freud's work, it's so as to venture into it with unqualified analytic prudence. One shouldn't make a character trait into a constant of the personality, still less a characteristic of the subject. On this topic, you'll find some very hasty things from Jones's pen, but things which are nonetheless more subtly put than what you have said. To think that Freud's career was a compensation for his desire for power, even for his clearcut megalomania, of which moreover one may find traces in remarks he made, I think that's. . . . Freud's drama, from the moment when he discovers his path, cannot be summarised like that. We have after all learned enough through analysis not to feel ourselves obliged to identify the Freud who dreams of world-domination with the Freud who reveals a new truth. It doesn't seem to me to arise out of the same cupido, if not of the same libido.

M. Hyppolite: Even so, it seems to me – without accepting in their totality the formulations of Z and the conclusions he draws from them – that, in Charcot's domination through hypnosis, it was only a matter of domination over someone reduced to an object, of the possession of a being no longer master of himself. Whereas in the Freudian domination, it is the vanquishing of a subject, a being who still has self-awareness. Hence there is a stronger will for domination in the domination of the resistance to be conquered than in the simple and straightforward suppression of this* resistance – without being able to draw from that the conclusion that Freud wanted to dominate the world.

Is domination really what is at stake in Freud's experience? I always have reservations about lots of things which aren't specified in his way of going about things. His interventionism, in particular, I find surprising, if we compare it to some of the technical principles to which we now grant importance. But you'll find in this interventionism no satisfaction being gained from having won a victory over the patient's consciousness, in contradiction to what Hyppolite says, less, certainly, than in the modern techniques, which put all the emphasis on the resistances. In Freud we find a more nuanced attitude, that's to say, more humane.

He doesn't always define what is now called interpretation of defence, which is not, perhaps, the best way of putting it. But when all is said and done, interpretation of contents has for Freud the role of interpretation of defence.

You're right to allude to this, Z*. That is because that's for you. I will try and show you in what way the danger of a forcing of the subject through the analyst's intervention emerges. It's much more out in the open in so-called modern techniques – as one says in talking about analysis the way one talks about chess – than it ever was in Freud. And I don't believe that the theoretical promulgation of the notion of resistance can be used as a pretext for making this accusation against Freud, an accusation which goes radically against the liberating effect of his work and of his therapeutic activity.

I am not putting your opinions on trial, Z*. For this is well and truly your opinion. Certainly, one should show a spirit of scrutiny, of criticism, with respect to the founding works, but, in this form, it can only serve to increase the mystery, and not at all to throw light on it.

Resistance and the defences

MARGARET LITTLE'S TESTIMONY

FROM EGO TO EGO

REALITY AND FANTASY OF THE TRAUMA

HISTORY, THE LIVED AND THE RELIVED

Let us first congratulate Mannoni and Anzieu on their reports, which have the merit of showing us the controversial aspects of the question we are dealing with. As is appropriate to minds well-educated, but only recently initiated into, if not the application of analysis, at least its practice, there was in their reports something quite sharp, even polemical, which is always of value in revealing the problem's vividness.

A very delicate question has been raised, all the more delicate since, as I pointed out in my interruptions, it is very much a present concern for some of us.

A reproach has implicitly been levelled at Freud, as to his authoritarianism, alleged to be constitutive of his method from the beginning. That is paradoxical. If anything constitutes the originality of the analytic treatment, it is rather to have perceived at the beginning, right from the start, the problematical relation of the subject to himself. The real find, the discovery, in the sense I explained to you at the beginning of this year, is to have conjoined this relation with the meaning of symptoms.

It is the subject's refusal of this meaning that poses a problem for him. This meaning must not be revealed to him, it must be assumed by him. In this respect, psychoanalysis is a technique which respects the person – in the sense in which we understand it today, having realised that it had its price – not only respects it, but cannot function without respecting it. It would thus be paradoxical to place in the foreground the idea that analytical technique has as its aim to break down the subject's resistance. Which isn't to say that the problem doesn't ever arise.

Indeed, aren't we aware these days that an analyst doesn't make a single move in the treatment without teaching his students to be always asking themselves, in relation to the patient, the question – What defence has he come up with now?

This isn't really a policeman's approach, in the sense that it involves looking for something hidden – that term should rather be reserved for the suspect phases of analysis in its archaic periods. Rather, they are always trying to find out what posture the subject could possibly take up, what find he could have made, in order to get himself into a position such that everything we might say to him will be ineffective. It would not be fair to say that they impute bad faith to the subject because bad faith is too much tied to implications of the order of knowledge, which are totally foreign to this state of mind. That would be too subtle by half. There is in all this the idea of the subject's fundamental ill will. All these features lead me to think that I am being accurate in calling this style of analysis inquisitorial.

Before going into my subject, I will take as an example Margaret Little's article on counter-transference, which appeared in the first number of the International Journal of Psycho-analysis for 1951.

This article takes its bearings from a manner of orienting technique which is pushed very far by a certain section of the English school. As you know, it leads to the view that the whole of the analysis must unfold in the hic et nunc. Everything is supposed to take place through grappling with the subject's intentions, here and now, in the session. That one catches glimpses of bits and pieces of his past is no doubt conceded, but it is thought that in the end it is in the trial – I was about to say the trial of psychological strength – within the treatment that the entire activity of the analyst is deployed.

And that really is the problem – the activity of the analyst. How does he act? What are the implications of what he does?

For the authors in question, for Margaret Little, nothing else matters but the recognition by the subject, hic et nunc, of the intentions of his discourse. And his intentions only ever have value in their implications hic et nunc, in the immediate exchange. The subject may well describe himself taking on the grocer or the hairdresser – in fact, he is bawling out the person he's talking to, that is to say the analyst.

There is some truth in that. The slightest experience of conjugal life will tell you that there is always an implicit demand of some sort in the fact that one spouse relates to the other what got his goat during the day, rather than the other way round. But it may also stem from a concern to inform the other of some incident worth knowing about. Both are true. It is a question of knowing on which aspect one should throw some light.

As the following story told by Margaret Little shows, things do sometimes go even further. Certain of its features are a bit confused, but everything points to the fact that it is a training analysis, or in any case, the analysis of someone whose area of interest is very close to psychoanalysis.

The analysand had occasion to make a radio broadcast on a topic that intensely interested the analyst himself – these things happen. It so happened that he gave this broadcast a few days after his mother's death. Now everything points to the fact that the mother in question plays an extremely important role in the patient's fixations. He is certainly very affected by this mourning, but he nonetheless fulfils his obligations in a particularly brilliant manner. The next session, he arrives in a state of stupor close to confusion. Not only is it impossible to get anything out of him, but what he does say is surprising in its lack of coordination. The analyst interprets boldly – You are in this state because you think I greatly begrudge you your success on the radio the other day, with this topic which, as you know, personally interests me in the highest degree. There we have it!

The rest of the account shows that it took a year for the subject to recover from this shock-interpretation, which hadn't failed to have some effect, since he had instantly recovered his spirits.

This shows you that the fact that the subject comes out of a confused state of mind following an intervention by the analyst by no means proves that it was effective in the strictly therapeutic, structuring sense of the word, namely that it was, in the analysis, true. On the contrary.

Margaret Little brought the subject back to a sense of the unity of his ego. Suddenly he tears himself out of the confusion in which he found himself, saying to himself – Here is someone who points out to me that indeed everything is much of a muchness and that life goes on. And he starts off, gets going again – the effect is instantaneous. It is impossible, in the analytic experience, to consider the subject's change of style as being the proof of the correctness of an interpretation. I consider the proof of the correctness of an interpretation to lie in the confirmatory material the subject supplies. And even that needs to be put more subtly.

After a year, the subject realises that his state of confusion was linked to the backlash of his reactions to mourning, which he had only been able to overcome by inverting them. I refer you at this point to the psychology of mourning, whose depressive side some of you are sufficiently familiar with.

Indeed, a radio-talk is produced in accordance with a very specific modality of speech, since it is addressed to a mass of invisible listeners by an invisible speaker. It may be said that, in the imagination of the speaker, it isn't necessarily addressed to those who listen to it, but equally to everyone, the living and the dead. The subject there enters into a relationship of conflict – he might regret that his mother was not able to be a witness to his triumph, but perhaps, at the same time, in the speech which he gave, to his invisible listeners, there was something that was intended for her.

However that may be, the nature of the subject's attitude is then clearly inverted, pseudo-manic, and its strict relation with the recent loss of his mother, privileged object of his bonds of love, is quite clearly the source of the critical state in which he had arrived for the next session, after his exploit, after having accomplished, despite the unpropitious circumstances, and in a brilliant fashion, what he had set himself to do. Thus, Margaret Little, who is however far from having a critical attitude with respect to this style of intervention, herself testifies to the fact that an interpretation based on the intentional signification of the discursive act in the immediate present of the session is subject to all the relativities implied by the possible engagement of the analyst's ego.

In a word, the important thing is not that the analyst himself was mistaken and there's nothing in the slightest to indicate that the counter-transference is to be blamed for this interpretation, so clearly refuted by the rest of the treatment. Not only can we concede that the subject had been prey to the feelings that the analyst imputed to him, it is even extremely probable. That they led the analyst into giving the interpretation he did, isn't something dangerous in itself. If the only analysing subject, the analyst, had even felt some jealousy, it is up to him to take it into account in an appropriate manner, to be guided by it as by an extra needle on the dial. No one has ever said that the analyst should never have feelings towards his patient. But he must know not only not to give in to them, to keep them in their place, but how to make adequate use of them in his technique.

In this particular instance, it is because the analyst thought he should look first in the hic et nunc for the reason for the patient's attitude that he found it in something which, without a shadow of a doubt, really existed in the intersubjective field shared by the two characters. He was well placed to recognise it, because he felt some hostility, or at the very least irritation in connection with the patient's success. What is serious is to have believed himself authorised by a certain technique to make use of it straightaway and in a direct manner.

What do I contrast this to? I will now try and show you.

The analyst here believes himself authorised to offer what I will call an interpretation from ego to ego, or from equal to equal – allow me the play on words – in other words, an interpretation whose foundation and mechanism cannot in any way be distinguished from that of projection.

When I say projection, I am not saying erroneous projection. Let there be no mistake about what I'm explaining to you. Before I became an analyst, I had – thanks to what little psychological gifts I have – taken a formula as the principle of the little compass with which I appraised some situations. I was quite happy to say to myself – Feelings are always reciprocated. It is absolutely true, appearances notwithstanding. As soon as you put two subjects together – I say two, not three – feelings are always reciprocated.

This explains why the analyst was justified in thinking that given that he had these particular feelings, corresponding feelings could be elicited in the other. The proof of it is in their wholehearted acceptance by the other. All that would be necessary is for the analyst to tell him – You are hostile, because you think that I am irritated with you – and the feeling would be elicited. The feeling then was already there, virtually, since all that was required for it to exist was to light the blue touch-paper.

The subject was perfectly justified in accepting Margaret Little's interpretation, for the simple reason that, in a relationship as intimate as that which exists between analysand and analyst, he was sufficiently aware of the analyst's feelings to be induced into something symmetrical.

The question is to know whether this way of understanding the analysis of defences doesn't land us with a technique which almost inevitably generates a specific sort of error, an error which in fact isn't one, something prior to truth and falsity. There are interpretations which are so to the point and so true, so necessarily to the point and true, that one cannot say if they do or do not speak to a truth. Whichever way they will be verified.

It is best to abstain from offering this interpretation of the defence, which I will call from ego to ego, whatever value it may eventually have. In the interpretation of defences, there should always be at least a third term.

In fact, you need more than that, and I hope to be able to prove it to you. But I am only opening up the problem today.

It is late. Which will not allow us to go as far as I would have liked into the problem of the relation between resistance and the defences. Nevertheless I would like to give you some sense of where we're heading.

After having listened to Mannoni's and Anzieu's reports, and after having shown you the risks run by a particular analytic technique, I think it necessary to lay down some guidelines.

It is in The Interpretation of Dreams that Freud offered the first definition, in relation to analysis, of the notion of resistance, in Chapter Seven; Section One. There is this decisive sentence – Was immer die Fortsetzung der Arbeit stört ist ein Widerstand – which means – Everything which destroys/suspends/changes the continuation of the work – symptoms are not at issue here, what is is the analytic work, the cure, the Behandlung, as we say when dealing with an object undergoing certain processes – Everything which destroys the continuation of the work is a resistance.[1]

This has been unhappily translated into French as – Tout obstacle à l'interprétation provient de la résistance psychique.[2] I am pointing this out to you, because it doesn't make life easy for those who can only go by the very congenial translation of the brave M. Meyerson. And the whole of the preceding paragraph is translated in the same vein. This should instil in you a healthy suspicion of a number of translations of Freud. In the German edition a note is added to the sentence quoted, which discusses the following point – if the patient's father dies, is it a resistance? I am not going to tell you what conclusion Freud reaches, but you see that this note shows how broadly the question of resistance is conceived. Well, this note is omitted in the French edition.

Everything which suspends/destroys/interrupts/the continuity – Fortsetzung can even be translated like that – of the cure is a resistance. You must start from texts such as these, mull them over a bit, sift them and see where it gets you.

What does all this add up to? What is at issue is the continuation of the treatment, of the work. In order to make it perfectly unambiguous, Freud did not say Behandlung, which could mean the cure. No, what is at issue is work, Arbeit, which can be defined by its form, as the verbal association determined by the rule which he has just mentioned, the fundamental rule of free association. Now, this work, since we are dealing with the analysis of dreams, is quite clearly the revelation of the unconscious.

This will allow us to consider a certain number of problems, in particular the one which Anzieu mentioned just now – this resistance, where does it come from? We've seen that none of the texts in the Studien über Hysterie allow one to suppose that, as such, it comes from the ego. Nor does anything in the Traumdeutung indicate that it comes from the secondary process – whose introduction is such an important stage in the development of Freud's thought. When we get to the years around 1915 when Freud published Die Verdrängung, the first of those studies to appear amongst those which were eventually to be regrouped into the metapsychological writings, resistance is indeed conceived of as something produced on the side of consciousness, but whose identity is essentially determined by its distance, Entfernung, from what was originally repressed. The relation then of resistance to the contents of the unconscious itself is in this instance still extremely tangible. It will remain so right up to a period later than that of this article, which belongs to the middle period of Freud's development.

What is it, in the end, which has been primally repressed, from The Interpretation of Dreams up to this period which I call intermediary? It is still, as always, the past. A past which must be reinstated, and whose ambiguity we cannot but recall once again, no less than the problems that it raises as to its definition, its nature and its function.

This period is the same as that of the Wolfman, in which Freud raises the question, what is a trauma? He realises that trauma is an extremely ambiguous concept, since it would seem that, according to all the clinical evidence, its fantasy-aspect is infinitely more important than its event-aspect. Whence, the event shifts into the background in the order of subjective references. In contrast, the dating of the trauma remains for him a problem that he sees fit to retain quite, if I may put it this way, pig-headedly, as I reminded those of you who followed my course on the subject of the Wolfman. Who will ever know what he saw? But whether he saw it or not, he can only have seen it on a specific date, he cannot have seen it were it only one year later. I don't think I am being unfaithful to Freud's line of thought – all you need is to know how to read him, it's written down in black and white – by saying that it is only the perspective of history and of recognition that allows a definition of what counts for the subject.

For those of you who aren't familiar with this dialectic which I have already developed at great length, I would like to offer a certain number of basic concepts. One should always work at the level of the alphabet. I am therefore going to take an example which will make you understand clearly the questions raised by recognition, and which will keep you from drowning it in notions as confused as those of memory and recollection. If Erlebnis, in German, can still have a meaning, the French notion of a memory that is lived or not lived leads to all sorts of ambiguities. I am going to tell you a little story.

I wake up in the morning with my curtain, like Semiramis, and I open one eye. I don't see this curtain every morning because it's the curtain of my house in the country, where I go only every week or so, and among the lines fomented by the fringe of the curtain I notice, once again – I say once again, I have only ever seen it once like that in the past – the silhouette of a face, all at once, sharp-edged, caricatured and old-fashioned, which for me is vaguely like the face of an eighteenth-century marquis. This is one of those completely stupid fabulations to which the mind lends itself when waking, produced as a result of a gestalt-like crystallisation, as one would say these days, in speaking of the recognition of a figure one has known for a long time.

The same thing could have happened with a spot on the wall. That's why I can say that the curtain hasn't moved an inch since precisely eight days before. A week ago, on waking up, I had seen the same thing. I had, of course, completely forgotten it. But it is because of that that I know that the curtain hasn't moved. It is still there, in exactly the same position.

This is only a fable, because it takes place on the imaginary plane, although it wouldn't be difficult to put the symbolic coordinates in place. The bits of nonsense – the eighteenth-century marquis, etc. – play a very important part in it, because if I didn't have a certain number of fantasies on the subject of what the profile represents, I wouldn't have recognised it in the fringe of my curtain. But let's leave that.

Let us see what this implies on the plane of recognition. The fact that it really was like that eight days previously is linked to the phenomenon of recognition in the present.

This is exactly the expression that Freud uses in the Studien über Hysterie. He recounts having undertaken, at this period, several studies on memory, and he relates the memory evoked, the recognition, to the actual and present-day force which lends it, not specifically its weight and its density, but quite simply its possibility.[3]

That is how Freud proceeds. When he doesn't know which way to turn to elicit the reconstruction of the subject, he takes hold of him then and there, with the pressure of the hands on the forehead, and enumerates all the years, all the months, all the weeks, even all the days, naming them one by one – Tuesday the 17th, Wednesday the 18th, etc. He trusts sufficiently in the subject's implicit structuration by what has since been defined as socialised time, to think that, when his enumeration reaches the point at which the hand of the clock truly intersects with the critical moment of the subject, the latter will say – Oh, yes, that's right, I do remember something for that day. Note that I am not saying that it works. It is Freud who assures us that it did work.

Have you got hold of the implication of what I am saying to you? The subject's centre of gravity is this present synthesis of the past which we call history. And it is in that that we trust when it is a matter of keeping the work going. That is what is presupposed by analysis from its beginnings. Henceforth, there are no grounds on which to prove that it is refuted at its end. In truth, if it isn't like that it is absolutely impossible to see anything novel in analysis.

This is a first phase. Is it enough?

No, of course it isn't enough. The subject's resistance is no doubt in action on this plane, but it manifests itself in an odd manner which deserves to be explored and in strictly specific instances.

There is one case in which Freud knew the whole story – the mother had told him it. So he tells it to the subject, by saying to her – Here is what happened, this is what was done to you. On each occasion, the patient, a hysteric, responded with a little hysterical crisis, a replica of the characteristic crisis. She listened and replied, in her own way, which was her symptom. Which raises several small problems, and this one in particular – is it a resistance? It is a question that I open up for today.

I would like to conclude with the following remark. At the end of the Studien über Hysterie, Freud defines the pathogenic nucleus as what is being sought, but which repels the discourse – what discourse shuns. Resistance is the inflexion the discourse adopts on approaching the nucleus. From then on, we will only be able to resolve the question of resistance by deepening our understanding of what is the meaning of this discourse. We have already said it, it is a historical discourse.

Don't let's forget what analytic technique is in its beginning – a hypnotic technique. In hypnotism, the subject sustains this historical discourse. He even sustains it in a particularly striking, dramatised manner, which implicates the presence of the listener. Once out of this hypnotised state, the subject remembers nothing of this discourse. Why is this precisely the point of entry into the technique of analysis? Because the reviviscence of the trauma is revealed here, in itself, immediately, if not in a permanent, therapeutic manner. It turns out that a discourse held like that, by someone who can say me [moi], concerns the subject.

It still is ambiguous to speak of the lived, relived character of the trauma in the second, hysterical state. It is not on account of the discourse having been dramatised and presented in a pathetic manner that the word relived does the trick. What does it mean to say that the subject assumes his own lived experience?

You see that I am bringing the question to bear at the point where this relived is at its most ambiguous, namely in the subject's second state. But isn't it exactly the same at every level of analytic experience? At every turn we come upon the question – what is the meaning of this discourse which we force the subject to set up within the parenthesis of the fundamental rule. This rule tells him – When all is said and done, your discourse has no importance. As long as he surrenders himself to this exercise, he already only half believes in his discourse, since he knows himself to be in the cross-fire of our interpretation at every moment. So the question then becomes – What is the subject of the discourse?

That is where we will start off again next time, and we'll try to discuss the meaning and importance of resistance in relation to these fundamental problems.

The ego and the other

RESISTANCE AND TRANSFERENCE
THE FEELING OF PRESENCE
VERWERFUNG ≠ VERDRÄNGUNG
MEDIATION AND REVELATION
THE INFLECTIONS OF SPEECH

Last time we began to ask ourselves about the nature of resistance.

You did get a sense of the ambiguity, and not only the complexity, in our approach to this phenomenon of resistance. Several of Freud's formulations seem to indicate that resistance stems from what is to be revealed, that is to say from the repressed, from the verdrängt or again from the unterdrückt.

The early translators rendered unterdrückt by étouffé [stifled] – that is really feeble. Are verdrängt and unterdrückt the same thing? We are not going to go into these points of detail. We'll only do that when we have begun to see differences between these phenomena grounded in our experience.

Today I want to lead you, in the Papers on Technique, to one of these points which offers some perspective. Before using the vocabulary, what one has to do is to try to understand, and, to this end, to get oneself into a position in which things fall into place.

At the clinical consultation on Friday, I gave you advance notice of the reading of an important text, and I am going to try to keep to my promise.

Right at the heart of the collection of these so-called technical papers, there is a text which is called 'The dynamics of transference'. Like all the texts in this collection, one cannot say that we have cause to be entirely satisfied with its translation. There are some peculiar inaccuracies, which go right to the limit of impropriety. Some of them are astonishing. They all tend in the same direction, which is to efface the sharp edges of the text. For those who know German, I cannot recommend referring to the original text too much. I warn you of a break in the translation, a full stop inserted in the penultimate line, which separates off a very small sentence which seems to be there for no reason, one knows not why – For when all is said and done, it is impossible to destroy anyone in absentia or in effigie.[1] In the German text, we find – . . . because one should recall that no one can be killed in absentia or in effigie. It is linked to the preceding phrase. Isolated, the phrase cannot be understood, whereas Freud's text is perfectly articulated.

The passage from this article I mentioned to you I'll now read. You'll find it on page fifty-five of the French translation. It is directly linked with this important passage from the Studien that I reminded you of, which deals with the resistance met with by approximation[2] in the radial direction as Freud puts it, of the subject's discourse, when it finds itself closer to the deep formation which Freud calls the pathogenic nucleus.

Let us look[3] at a pathogenic complex which is sometimes very obvious and sometimes almost imperceptible . . . I would rather translate – either apparent as a symptom, or impossible to apprehend, non-manifest – because it is a question of the way in which the complex is translated, and it is the translation of the complex that is said to be apparent or imperceptible. It isn't the same thing to say that it, the complex, is. In the French translation there's a displacement which is enough to produce a kind of wavering. I'll continue – . . . from its manifestation in the conscious right down to its roots in the unconscious, we soon reach a region where the resistance makes itself felt so clearly that the association which then emerges bears its mark – of this resistance – and appears to us as a compromise between the requirements of this resistance and that of the work of investigation. It is not quite the association which emerges, it is the nächste Einfall, the closest, the next association, but in the end the meaning is retained. Experience – here's the important point – shows that it is at this point that transference emerges. When something from amongst the elements of the complex (in the latter's contents) is suitable for being transferred on to the doctor's person, transference takes place, furnishes the next idea and manifests itself in the form of a resistance, in the cessation of associations for example. Similar experiences teach us that the transference-idea is arrived at in preference to all other possible associations capable of sliding into consciousness, precisely because it satisfies the resistance. The last part of the sentence is underlined by Freud. A fact of this sort is replicated on an incalculable number of occasions in the course of a psychoanalysis. Every time that one gets close to a pathogenic complex it is first of all the part of the complex capable of transference that finds itself forced towards consciousness and which the patient persists in defending with the greatest tenacity.

The elements of this paragraph which should be highlighted are the following. First, we soon reach a region where the resistance makes itself clearly felt. This resistance stems from the very process of the discourse, from its approximation,[2] if I may say. Secondly, experience shows that it is at this point that the transference emerges. Thirdly, transference is produced precisely because it satisfies the resistance. Fourthly, a fact of this sort is replicated on an incalculable number of occasions in the course of a psychoanalysis. It really is a question of a palpable phenomenon in the analysis. And that part of the complex which manifested itself in the form of transference finds itself forced towards consciousness at this particular instant. The patient persists in defending it with the greatest tenacity.

[2] The sense of approximation Lacan is using here is close to that used in mathematics (e.g. Archimedes) – a method that recursively approximates to its desired end, by repeated application of a rule.

[3] In the passage that follows I give a literal translation of the French translation in order to make clear the conceptual points that Lacan draws out of problems of translation. See GW VIII 368; Stud Erg 163; SE XII 103.

There's a note added here which throws the phenomenon in question into relief, a phenomenon which is clearly observable, sometimes in an extraordinary purity. This note intersects with a point emerging from another of Freud's texts – When the patient is silent, there is every chance that this drying up of his discourse is due to some thought relating to the analyst.[4]

Employing a not uncommon technical maneouvre, but one which nonetheless we have taught our students to curb, to refrain from, this translates itself as a question of the sort – Doubtless you are having some thought that relates to me? Sometimes the patient's discourse is crystallised by this inquiry into some remarks concerning the analyst's style or face, or his furniture, or the way in which the analyst welcomed him that day, etc. This manoeuvre does have a rationale. Something like this can be on the patient's mind at the time and in thus focussing his associations, one can extract a whole variety of things from him. But sometimes one comes across an infinitely purer phenomenon.

Just when he seems ready to come out with something more authentic, more to the point than he has ever managed to come up with up to then, the subject, in some cases, breaks off, and utters a statement, which might be the following – I am aware all of a sudden of the fact of your presence.

That is something that has happened to me more than once and which analysts can easily testify to. The phenomenon occurs in connection with the concrete manifestation of resistance as it cuts into the very fabric of our experience in relation to transference. If it takes on a selective value, it's because the subject himself then feels something like a sharp bend, a sudden turn which causes him to pass from one slope of the discourse to the other, from one aspect of the function of speech to another.

I wanted to put this sharply focussed phenomenon before you straightaway, since it clarifies my remarks today. It is the point which will allow us to begin raising our questions again.

Before pursuing this line, I want to stay for a moment with Freud's text so as to show you clearly the extent to which what I am talking about is the same thing as what he is talking about. For a moment, you should stand back from the idea that resistance is all of a piece with the notion that the unconscious is, in a given subject, at a given moment, contained and, as one says, repressed. Whatever the extension that we may eventually give to the term resistance in its relation to the totality of the defences, resistance is a phenomenon which Freud localised in the analytic experience.

It is for this reason that the little note appended to the passage that I read to you is important – Freud there spells it out one word at a time.

However, one shouldn't conclude on the pathogenic importance . . . – that's exactly what I am telling you, it is not a question of the conception we construct for ourselves after the event, concerning what motivated, in the deep sense of the term, the stages of the subject's development – . . . excessively great pathogenic importance of the element chosen with a view to the transference-resistance. If in the course of a battle there is a particularly embittered struggle over the possession of some little church or some individual farm, there is no need to suppose that the church is a national shrine, perhaps, or that the house shelters the army's pay-chest. The value of the object may be a purely tactical one and may perhaps emerge only in this one battle.

It is within the movement in which the subject acknowledges himself that a phenomenon which is resistance appears. When this resistance becomes too great, the transference emerges.

It's true that the text doesn't say a transference-phenomenon. If Freud had wanted to say a transference-phenomenon appears, he would have done so. The proof of this distinction's significance is to be found at the end of the article. In the last sentence, the one which starts, Let us confess that nothing in analysis is more difficult . . ., the French translation gives vaincre les résistances [conquer the resistances], whereas the text is die Bezwingung der Übertragungsphänomene, that is to say, the forcing of the transference-phenomena.[5] I mention this passage to show you that Übertragungsphänomene belongs to Freud's vocabulary. Why, however, has it been translated as resistance? It isn't a mark of great learning, nor of great understanding.

Freud wrote that it is exactly at that point that something emerges which is not the phenomenon of transference itself, but a phenomenon with an essential relation to it.

As for the rest, what is at issue throughout this article is the dynamics of transference. I am not going to take up in their entirety all the questions it raises, because they touch on the specificity of transference to analysis, on the fact that there the transference isn't like it is everywhere else, but rather that it there has a quite particular function. I advise you to read this article. I bring it up here solely as an aid to our study of resistance. Nonetheless, it is, as you'll see, the pivotal point for what's at issue in the dynamics of transference.

What can this teach us about the nature of resistance? It allows us to reply to the question, who is speaking? and hence to know what the reconquest, the rediscovery of the unconscious might mean.

[5] GW VIII 374; Stud Erg 167–8; SE XII 108.

We have raised the question as to the meaning of memory [mémoire], rememoration, the technique of rememoration, as to the meaning of free association in as much as it allows us to arrive at a formulation of the subject's history. But what does the subject become? In the course of his progress, is it always the same subject at issue?

When confronted by this phenomenon, we get hold of a knot in this progress, a connection, a primary pressure, or rather, strictly speaking, a resistance. At a certain point in this resistance, we see what Freud calls the transference being produced, that is to say in this context the actualisation of the analyst's person. In extracting it from my experience, I told you just now that at the most sensitive and, it seems to me, significant point of the phenomenon, the subject experiences it as an abrupt perception of something which isn't very easy to define – presence.

It isn't a feeling that we have all the time. To be sure, we are influenced by all sorts of presences, and our world only possesses its consistency, its density, its lived stability, because, in some way, we take account of these presences, but we do not realise them as such. You really can sense that it is a feeling which I'd say we are always trying to efface from life. It wouldn't be easy to live if, at every moment, we had the feeling of presence, with all the mystery that that implies. It is a mystery from which we distance ourselves, and to which we are, in a word, inured.

I think that it is something which we cannot dwell on for too long. And we are going to try to find other ways of getting at it, because what Freud teaches us, the trusty analytic method, consists in always rediscovering the same connection, the same relation, the same schema, to be found simultaneously in forms of experience, of behaviour, and for that matter, within the analytic relationship.

Our aim is to establish a perspective, a perception in depth, of several planes. Notions like the id and the ego, which particular techniques have accustomed us to assuming in a wholesale manner, are perhaps not simply a contrasted pair. There we have to set up a stereoscope that is a little more complicated.

For those of you who came to my commentary on the Wolfman – already a long time back now, a year and a half ago – I'd like to remind you of certain particularly striking features of this text.

Just as he gets to the question of his patient's castration complex, a question which has an extremely specific function in this subject's structuration, Freud sets out the following problem. As soon as the fear of castration comes up for this subject, symptoms appear, located on a plane we commonly call the anal, since they are intestinal. Now, we interpret all of these symptoms according to the register of the anal conception of sexual intercourse, we regard them as attesting to a certain phase of infantile sexual theory. By what right? Isn't the subject raised to a level of genital structure from the very fact that castration has come into play? What is Freud's explanation?

Even though the subject, Freud says, has arrived at an initial infantile maturation, or pre-maturation, and even though he was mature enough to secure, at least partially, a more specifically genital structuration of his parent's relationship, he had refused the homosexual position allotted to him in this relation, he didn't realise, make real the Oedipal situation, he refused, rejected – the German word is verwirft – everything pertaining to the plane of genital realisation. He turned back to his previous version[6] of this affective relation, he retired into the positions of the anal theory of sexuality.

This is not even a repression, in the sense in which an element which would have been realised on a certain plane is repulsed. Repression, he says on page 111,[7] is something else – Eine Verdrängung ist etwas anderes als eine Verwerfung. In the French translation – the work of people whom intimacy with Freud should have rendered a little more enlightened – but doubtless it is not enough to have borne the relic of an eminent person to be authorised to become his guardian – the translation is – a repression is something other than a judgement which rejects and chooses [un refoulement est autre chose qu'un jugement qui rejette et choisit]. Why translate Verwerfung thus? I admit that it's difficult, but the French language . . .

M. Hyppolite: Rejection [rejet]?

Yes, rejection. Or, on occasion, refusal [refus].[8] Why suddenly introduce a judgement into it, in a place where no trace of Urteil is to be found? What's there is Verwerfung. Three pages further on, on the eleventh line, after elaborating on the consequences of this structure, Freud concludes by saying – Kein Urteil über seine . . .[9] It's the first time that he brings in Urteil, to round off the passage. But, here, there isn't any 'no judgement has been brought to bear on the existence of the problem of castration – Aber es war so, but it was the same, als ob sie nicht, as if it didn't exist.

This important articulation shows us that originally, for repression to be possible, there must be a beyond of repression, something final, already primitively constituted, an initial nucleus of the repressed, which not only is unacknowledged, but which, for not being formulated, is literally as if it didn't exist – I'm just following what Freud says. And nevertheless, in a certain sense, it is somewhere, since, as Freud everywhere tells us, it is the centre of attraction, calling up all the subsequent repressions.

I'd say that that is the very essence of the Freudian discovery.

To explain how a repression of this or that sort is produced, of an hysterical or obsessional type, there is actually no need to have recourse to an innate predisposition. Freud on occasion allows it as a broad general framework, but never as a principle. Read Bemerkungen über Neurosen, the second article, from 1896, on the neuroses of defence.[10]

The forms that repression takes on are brought on by this initial nucleus, which Freud then attributes to a certain experience, which he calls the original traumatic experience. In what follows we will take up the question of what trauma means, a notion which had to be relativised, but do hang on to the idea that the primitive nucleus is to be found at another level from that of the derivatives of repression.[11] It is their foundation and support.

In the structure of what happened to the Wolfman, the Verwerfung of the realisation of genital experience is a quite specific moment, which Freud himself distinguishes from all the others. The strange thing is, what is there, excluded from the subject's history, and which he is incapable of saying, had to be forced out by Freud, in order to see the back of it. It's only then that the repeated experience of his infantile dream took on its meaning, and made possible, not the reliving, but the direct reconstruction of the subject's history.

I'll leave the theme of the Wolfman hanging for the moment in order to look at things from another angle. Let's take up Chapter Seven of the Traumdeutung, devoted to the dream processes, Traumvorgänge.

Freud starts by summarising everything which had been brought out by his argument in the course of his book.

The fifth part of the chapter starts off with this splendid sentence – Elements in this complicated whole which are in fact simultaneous can only be represented successively in my description of them, – since he is once again going over everything he has explained about the dream – while, in putting forward each point, I must avoid appearing to anticipate the grounds on which it is based: difficulties such as these it is beyond my strength to master.[12]

This sentence shows clearly the very difficulties that I am also having here, in ceaselessly taking up that problem which is always to the forefront in our experience, for one must succeed somehow in a variety of ways in recreating it every time from a new perspective. Freud tells us that one must play dumb each time.

The movement of the argument in this chapter brings us face to face with something truly very peculiar. Freud lists all the objections one can make as to the validity of the memory of the dream. What is the dream? Is the subject's reconstitution of it accurate? What guarantee do we have that a later verbalisation isn't mixed in with it? Isn't every dream a thing of the moment, to which the subject's speech gives a history? Freud sets aside all these objections, and shows that they are groundless. And he does so by underlining the following, which is quite peculiar, that the more uncertain the text that the subject gives us is, the more it is meaningful. It is in the very doubt that the subject casts on certain bits of the dream that Freud, who listens to it, who expects it, who is there in order to reveal its meaning, clearly recognises what is important. Because the subject doubts, one must be certain.

But as the chapter progresses, the procedure is pared down to a point such that, at the limit, the most significant dream would be the dream that has been completely forgotten, one about which the subject couldn't say anything. That is more or less what Freud writes – It is often possible by means of analysis to restore all that has been lost by the forgetting of the dream's content; at least, in quite a number of cases one can reconstruct from a single remaining fragment, not, it is true, the dream – which is in any case a matter of no importance – but all the dream-thoughts.[13] A single remaining fragment [Quelques bribes] – that's exactly what I've been telling you, there's nothing left of the dream.

What else, besides, interests Freud? Here, we come on all the dream-thoughts.

For those who have done psychology, there is nothing more difficult to deal with than the term 'thought'. And as we have done psychology, these thoughts are, for us, as people used to thinking, what we have in our heads all the time.

But we are sufficiently enlightened by the whole of the Traumdeutung to realise that these dream-thoughts are not perhaps what one thinks they are when one studies the phenomenology of thought, thought without or with images, etc. These aren't what are usually called thoughts, since what is always involved is a desire.

God knows that we have learnt in the course of our research to realise that this desire runs away, appearing and disappearing before our eyes, like the slipper in a game of now you see it, now you don't. In fact, we don't always know if it should be located on the side of the unconscious or on that of the conscious. And whose desire anyway? and above all from what lack?

Freud illustrates what he means with an example, in a little note that he takes from the Introductory Lectures.[14]

A woman patient, who is both sceptical about and interested in him, Freud, tells him a fairly long dream, in the course of which, she says, some people told her about his book on Witz, and spoke highly of it. All this seems to lead nowhere. Then something else comes up, and the only scrap that remains of the dream is this – channel. Perhaps some other book where this word occurs, something in which channel is involved . . . she doesn't know, it's quite obscure.

So we are left with channel, and we don't know what it relates to, nor from whence it came, nor where it is going. Well, this is what is most interesting, he says, this thing which is only a tiny scrap, surrounded by an aura of uncertainty.

And what does it lead to? The next day, not the very same day, she recounts how she has an idea which relates to channel. It is a witticism. On a crossing from Dover to Calais, an Englishman and a Frenchman. In the course of conversation, the Englishman quotes the well-known dictum – De sublime au ridicule, il n'y a qu'un pas. And the Frenchman, gallantly, replies – Oui, le Pas-de-Calais, which is being particularly gracious to his fellow conversationalist. Now, the Pas-de-Calais is the channel of la Manche, the English Channel. We thus come upon the channel again, and what else, by the same token? Pay strict attention, because this has the same function as the emerging of presence in the moment of resistance. The sceptical patient had previously deliberated at length on the merits of Freud's theory of jokes. After her discussion, at the moment in which her discourse hesitates and is directionless, exactly the same phenomenon appears – just as Mannoni put it the other day, in what seemed to me a most happy way, because he was speaking as a midwife, resistance makes itself felt in the guise of transference.

Du sublime au ridicule, il n'y a qu'un pas – that is the point by which the dream hangs on the listener, because that is meant for Freud.

Thus, channel, it wasn't a lot, but after the associations, it's indisputable.

I would like to use some other examples.

God knows that Freud is careful in the grouping of facts, and it is not by chance that things are brought together in specific chapters. For example, phenomena which belong very specifically to the order of language appear in the dream just when it takes a certain direction. The subject quite consciously makes a linguistic mistake. In the dream, the subject knows that it's a linguistic mistake since someone intervenes in it to correct it. At a critical point, then, one finds an adaptation which is carried out poorly, and whose function is split before our eyes. But let's leave this to one side for the moment.

Let us turn our attention once again – I picked it out this morning, a little at random – to that celebrated example which Freud published as early as 1898 in his first chapter of The Psychopathology of Everyday Life. Regarding the forgetting of names, Freud makes use of the difficulty he once had, during a discussion with a travelling companion, of bringing to mind the name of the author of the celebrated fresco in the cathedral at Orvieto, a vast composition depicting the phenomena expected at the end of the world and centred around the apparition of the Antichrist. The fresco's author is Signorelli, and Freud doesn't manage to recover the name. Others come to mind – it's that one, no it isn't – Botticelli, Boltraffio . . ., he doesn't manage to recover Signorelli.

He gets to it in the end thanks to an analytic technique. For this little phenomenon doesn't come out of nowhere, it's ensconced in the text of a conversation. At the time they are travelling from Ragusa towards the Dalmation interior, and they are roughly at the limit of the Austrian empire, in Bosnia-Herzegovina. This word Bosnia gives rise to a certain number of anecdotes, as does Herzegovina. Then some remarks follow about a particularly endearing inclination of the Muslim clientele, which is, from a certain point of view, primitive, and which here attests to an extraordinary sense of propriety. When a doctor brings particularly bad news, of an incurable disease – Freud's interlocutor seems in fact to be a doctor practicing in the area – these people allow themselves to give vent to a certain hostility. So they immediately appeal to him, in saying – Herr, what is there to be said? If he could be saved, I know you would have saved him.[15] They are confronted with a fact which has to be accepted, whence their measured, courteous, respectful attitude to the doctor, the Herr, as he is called in German. All of this provides the background against which the rest of the conversation proceeds, punctuated by the meaningful forgetting which presents Freud with his problem.

Freud indicates that he did indeed take a full part in the conversation, but at a certain point, his attention wandered away – even while he was speaking, he was thinking of something else, to which this medical story was leading him.

On the one hand, he turned over in his mind the value that patients, especially Muslims, attach to everything concerned with the sexual functions. A patient who consulted him about a disturbance of his sexual potency had quite literally said to him – If one no longer has that, life isn't worth living. On the other hand, he remembered having learnt, in one of the places he had stayed, of the death of one of his patients, whom he had cared for for a very long time, something one doesn't come to hear of, he said, without a certain shock. He hadn't wanted to express these thoughts about the high evaluation of sexual activities, because he wasn't very sure of his interlocutor. And then, he wasn't happy to let his thoughts dwell on the subject of this patient's death. But in thinking about all this, he had withdrawn his attention from what he was in the middle of saying.

In his text Freud draws up a very pretty little picture – go look at the German edition – on which he writes all the names – Botticelli, Boltraffio, Herzegovinia, Signorelli – and at the bottom the repressed thoughts, the sound Herr and the question. The result is what is left. The word Signor had been called up by the Herr of these ever so polite Muslims, Traffio had been called up by the fact that that is where he had received the shock of the bad news about his patient. What he was able to rediscover, at the moment when his discourse was searching out the author of the Fresco at Orvieto, was what was still available, after a certain number of root elements had been recalled by what he calls the repressed, that is to say the ideas concerning the sexual stories of the Muslims, and the theme of death.

What does this mean? The repressed wasn't as repressed as all that, although he hadn't spoken to his travelling companion about it, he presents us with it straightaway in his text. But everything happens, in effect, as if these words – one can properly speak of words even if these vocables are parts of words – were those parts of the discourse that Freud truly had to offer to his interlocutor. He didn't say it, even though he had started to. That[16] is what interested him, that is what he was ready to say, and because he didn't say it, what stayed with him, in the rest of his intercourse with this interlocutor, was the debris, the pieces, the scraps of this speech.

Don't you see here to what extent this phenomenon, which takes place at the level of reality, is complementary to what takes place at the level of the dream? What we are witnessing is the emerging of a veridical speech.

God knows that it can reverberate a great deal, this veridical speech. What is at issue? – if not the absolute, namely death, which is present in it, and which Freud tells us that he preferred, and not only on account of his interlocutor, not to confront too closely. God also knows that the problem of death is experienced by the doctor as a problem of mastery. Now, the doctor in question, Freud, like the other, lost – it's always like that that we feel the loss of a patient, above all when we have cared for him for a long time.

So what beheads Signorelli? Everything is indeed focussed on the first part of this name, and on its semantic reverberations. It is in as much as speech, that speech which might reveal the deepest secret of Freud's being, isn't spoken, that all Freud can do is hang on to the other with the scraps of this speech. Only debris is left. That is the phenomenon of forgetting, literally made manifest by the degradation of speech in its relation to the other.

Now – this is what I've been wanting to get at with these examples – it is in so far as the confession of being doesn't come to term that speech runs entirely along the slope by which it hooks on to the other.

Hooking on to the other is not alien, if I can put it this way, to the essence of speech. Without doubt, speech is mediation, mediation between subject and other, and it implicates the coming into being of the other in this very mediation. An essential element of the coming into being of the other is the capacity of speech to unite us to him. This is above all what I have taught you up to now, because this is the dimension within which we are always moving.

But there is another side to speech – revelation.

Revelation, and not expression – the unconscious is not expressed, except by deformation, Entstellung, distortion, transportation. This summer I wrote The Function and Field of Speech and Language, intentionally without using the term 'expression', because the whole of Freud's work unfolds in the dimension of revelation, and not of expression. Revelation is the ultimate source of what we are searching for in the analytic experience.

Resistance is produced at the moment when the speech of revelation is not said, when – as Sterba puts it in a most bizarre manner at the end of an atrocious, though entirely honest, article, which focusses the whole of the analytic experience around the dissociation [dédoublement] of the ego, one half of which must come to our aid against the other – the subject can no longer get himself out of it.[17] He hooks on to the other because what is pressing towards speech cannot attain it. The arrested arrival of speech, in so far as something perhaps renders it fundamentally impossible, that's the pivotal point around which, in analysis, speech entirely seesaws over into its initial aspect and is reduced to its function of relationship to the other. If speech then functions as mediation, it is on account of its revelation not having been accomplished.

The question is always one of knowing at which level hooking on to the other occurs. You have to be made mutton headed by a certain way of theorising, of dogmatising and of regimenting yourself in analytic technique, to be capable of telling us, as someone once did, that one of the preconditions of analytic treatment, is what? – is that the subject has a certain awareness of the other as such. You don't say! But the point is knowing at what level this other is realised, and how, in which function, in which circle of its subjectivity, at what distance, this other is.

In the course of the analytic experience, this distance is continuously changing. How silly can you be to claim that it is a specific stage of the subject!

The same way of thinking leads M. Piaget to talk of the egocentric idea of the infant's world. As if adults had something to teach kids on this subject! And I would really like to know what, in the scales of eternity, has the greater weight when it comes to a better apprehension of the other, that held by M. Piaget, in his professorial position, and at his age, or that of a child! This child, we see that he is prodigiously open to everything concerning the way of the world that the adult brings to him. Doesn't anyone ever reflect on what this prodigious porosity to everything in myth, legend, fairy tales, history, the ease with which he lets himself be invaded by these stories, signifies, as to his sense of the other? Does anyone think that it's compatible with the child playing little games with blocks, thanks to which M. Piaget shows us that he arrives at a Copernican view of the world?

The point is to know how, at a given moment, this quite mysterious feeling of presence points to the other. Maybe it is part of what Freud tells us about in 'The dynamics of transference', that is, part of all the preliminary structurations, not only of the love life of the subject, but of his organisation of the world.

If I had to single out the first inflection of speech, the initial moment in which the entire realisation of the truth of the subject is inflected in its trajectory, the initial level on which the captation of the other takes on its function, I would isolate it in a formula given me by someone who is present here and whom I supervise. I was asking him – Where has he got to, your subject, in relation to you this week? He then gave me an expression which coincides exactly with what I have tried, in this inflection, to pinpoint – He called on me to bear witness. And, indeed, that really is one of the most elevated, although already deflected, functions of speech – the call to bear witness.

A little further and it will be seduction. A little further still, the attempt to inveigle[18] the other into a game in which speech even turns into – as analytic experience has clearly shown us – a more symbolic function, into a deeper instinctive satisfaction. Not to speak of the final stage – the complete disintegration of the speech function in the transference-phenomena, in which the subject, Freud notes, frees himself entirely and does exactly what he pleases.

In the end, doesn't this consideration bring us back to what I started off with in my commentary on the functions of speech? namely, the opposition between empty and full speech, full speech in so far as it realises the truth of the subject, empty speech in relation to what he has to do hic et nunc with his analyst, in which the subject loses himself in the machinations of the system of language, in the labyrinth of referential systems made available to him by the state of cultural affairs to which he is a more or less interested party.[19] Between these two extremes, a whole gamut of modes of realisation of speech is deployed.

This perspective brings us exactly to the following consideration – the resistance in question projects its effects on to the system of the ego, in as much as the system of the ego isn't even conceivable without the system, if one can put it this way, of the other. The ego has a reference to the other. The ego is constituted in relation to the other. It is its correlative. The level on which the other is experienced locates exactly the level on which, quite literally, the ego exists for the subject.

For resistance, in fact, is embodied in the system of the ego and the other. It comes into being at this or that moment of the analysis. But it emanates from somewhere else, namely from the subject's impotence to end up in the domain in which his truth is realised. In a way, a way doubtless more or less defined for a given subject by the fixation of his character and his structure, it is always on a specific level, through a specific style of relations with the other, that the act of speech comes to be projected.

Look at the paradox of the analyst's position from that moment on. It's just at the moment when the speech of the subject is at its fullest that I, the analyst, can intervene. But I would be intervening in what? – in his discourse. Now, the more intimate the discourse is for the subject, the more I focus on this discourse. But the inverse is equally true. The emptier his discourse is, the more I too am led to catch hold of the other, that is to say, led into doing what one does all the time, in this famous analysis of the resistances, led into seeking out the beyond of his discourse – a beyond, you'll be careful to note, which is nowhere, the beyond that the subject has to realise, but which he hasn't, and that's the point, realised, and which is in consequence made up of my own projection, on the level on which the subject is realising it at that moment.

Last time I showed you the dangers of interpretations or of intentional imputations, which, whether verified or not, susceptible or not to verification, are in fact no more verifiable than any other system of projections. And right there you have the difficulty of analysis.

When we say that we engage in the interpretation of resistances, we are confronting this difficulty – how can one operate at a level of the speech relation which has a lower density? How can one operate within this interpsychology, of ego and alter ego, to which we are reduced by the very degradation of the process of speech? In other words, what are the possible relations between that intervention of speech which is interpretation, and the level of the ego, in so far as this level always mutually involves the analysand and the analyst? When the function of speech has become so firmly inclined in the direction of the other that it is no longer even mediation, but only implicit violence, a reduction of the other to a correlative function of the subject's ego, what can we do so as to still legitimately employ speech in the analytic experience?

You get a sense of the oscillating character of the problem. It brings us back to the question – what meaning does this support taken in the other have? Why does the other become less and less truly other to the extent that it takes on more and more exclusively the function of support?

This is the vicious circle which one has to find a way out of in analysis. Aren't we all the more caught up in it the more the history of technique shows that a stronger emphasis has always been placed on the ego-related aspect of resistances? It is the same problem as is expressed again in the following way – why does the subject alienate himself all the more the more he affirms himself as ego?

We thus come back to last session's question – who, then, is it who, beyond the ego, seeks recognition?

Introduction and reply to Jean Hyppolite's presentation of Freud's Verneinung

THE LINGUISTIC CRISS-CROSSING THE PHILOSOPHICAL DISCIPLINES
STRUCTURE OF HALLUCINATION
IN EVERY RELATION TO THE OTHER, NEGATION

Those who were here last time heard an exposition on the central passage in Freud's paper, 'The dynamics of transference'.

The whole of this exposition consisted in showing you that the principal phenomenon of transference starts with what I could call the basis of the movement of resistance. I isolated that moment, which remains masked in analytic theory, in which resistance, in its most essential aspect, is manifested in a see-saw motion of speech towards the presence of the listener, towards the witness who is the analyst. The moment when the subject interrupts himself is usually the most significant moment in his approach towards the truth. At this point we gain a sense of resistance in its pure state, which culminates in the feeling, often tinged with anxiety, of the analyst's presence.

I also taught you that the analyst's questioning when the subject interrupts himself – a questioning which, because it has been pointed out to you by Freud, has become almost automatic for some people – Aren't you thinking about something that has to do with me, the analyst? – is only an activism which crystallises the orienting of the discourse towards the analyst. All this crystallisation shows is the following, that the subject's discourse, in so far as it doesn't attain this full speech in which its base in the unconscious should be revealed, is already addressed to the analyst, is so made as to interest him, and is supported by this alienated form of being that one calls the ego.

The relation of the ego to the other, the relation of the subject to this other himself, to this fellow being in relation to whom he is initially formed, is an essential structure of the human constitution.

It is by taking our cue from this imaginary function that we can conceptualise and explain what the ego is in analysis. I am not talking about the ego in psychology, where it performs a synthetic function, but the ego in analysis, a dynamic function. The ego makes itself manifest there as defence, as refusal. Inscribed in it is the entire history of successive oppositions which the subject manifested to the integration of what will subsequently be called within the theory, but only subsequently, his deepest and most misunderstood drives. In other words, in these moments of resistance, so clearly pointed out by Freud, we gain a sense of the means by which the very movement of the analytic experience isolates the fundamental function of the ego – misunderstanding [méconnaissance].

I showed you the mainspring, the fine point of Freud's investigation, in relation to dream analysis. You there saw, in an almost paradoxical form, the extent to which the Freudian analysis of the dream presupposes a function of speech. This is clinched by the fact that Freud grasps the last trace of a vanishing dream just at the moment when the subject turns completely towards him. It is at the precise moment when the dream is no more than a trace, a fragment of a dream, an isolated vocable, that we rediscover its transferential tip. I have already mentioned this significant, isolated interruption, which may be the turning-point of a phase in the analytic session. The dream is hence modelled on an identical movement.

Similarly, I have shown you the significance of speech that is unspoken because it is refused, because verworfen, rejected [rejetée] by the subject. I made you realise the specific weight of speech in the forgetting of a word – with an example taken from The Psychopathology of Everyday Life – and the extent to which there is, in this instance also, a sizeable difference between what the subject's speech should have proferred, and what is left to him with which to address the other. In the present instance, on account of the effect of the word Herr, something is lacking in the subject's speech, the vocable Signorelli, which he will no longer be able to bring to mind with the interlocutor, with whom the word Herr had, in an implicit manner, been called up a moment earlier, with all of its signification. Revealing as this moment is of the fundamental relation between resistance and the dynamic of the analytic experience, it leads us to a question which can be polarised between these two terms – the ego, speech.

This is a question which has been so little explored – although it should be the object of the essential investigation for us – that somewhere, under Mr Fenichel's pen, we find, for example, that the subject indisputably gains access to the meaning of words via the ego. Does one have to be an analyst to think that such a view is, at the very least, subject to dispute? Even if we admit that the ego is indeed what, as they say, controls our motor activities, and as a consequence the issuing of these vocables known as words, can one claim that, in our discourse, right now, the ego is the master of everything that these words harbour?

The symbolic system is extraordinarily intricate, marked as it is by this Verschlungenheit, property of criss-crossing, which the translation of the papers on technique has rendered as complexity, which is, and how, much too weak. Verschlungenheit designates linguistic criss-crossing – every easily isolable linguistic symbol is not only at one with the totality, but is cut across and constituted by a series of overflowings, of oppositional overdeterminations which place it at one and the same time in several registers. This language system, within which our discourse makes its way, isn't it something which goes infinitely beyond every intention that we might put into it, and which, moreover, is only momentary?

It is precisely on these ambiguities, on these riches already involved in the symbolic system as it has been constituted by the tradition in which we as individuals take up our places, far more than we can spell out or learn of it, it is on these functions that the analytic experience plays. At every moment this experience consists in showing the subject that he is saying more than he thinks he is – to take up only this aspect of the question.

We might be led to take up the question from the genetic point of view. But we would then get caught up in an investigation in psychology which would lead us so far away that we can't broach it now. Nevertheless it seems to be indisputable that one cannot make judgements concerning the acquisition as such of language on the basis of the acquisition of the motor mastery revealed by the appearance of the first words. The punching in of words which observers are pleased to record leaves intact the problem of knowing to what extent the words which do indeed emerge in motor representation emerge precisely as a result of an initial appreciation of the totality of the symbolic system as such.

The words that first appear have, as clinical experience shows, an entirely contingent signification. Everyone knows the degree of diversity shown by the first fragments of language as they appear in the child's elocution. And we also know how striking it is to hear the child give expression to adverbs, particles, words, to perhaps or not yet, before having given expression to a substantive, the minimal naming of an object.

Setting up the problem in this way from the outset seems indispensable to finding a place for any valid observation. If one doesn't manage to grasp clearly the autonomy of the symbolic function in the realising of the human, it is impossible to proceed from the facts without at once committing the crassest of errors in understanding.

Since this isn't a course in general psychology, I will probably not have an opportunity to return to these questions again.

Today, I think I will only be able to introduce the problem of the ego and of speech, starting, of course, with the way in which it is revealed in our experience.

We can only address this problem in the form which it now has. We cannot pretend that the Freudian theory of the ego doesn't exist. Freud opposed the ego to the id, and this theory permeates our theoretical and technical conceptions. That's why today I want to draw your attention to a text called Verneinung.

Verneinung, as M. Hyppolite pointed out to me just now, is dénégation and not négation, as it has been translated in French. That is how I myself have always referred to it in my seminars, each time I had occasion to.

The text dates from 1925. It comes after the publication of the articles dealing with the psychology of the ego and its relation to the id. Specifically, it comes after the article Das Ich und das Es. In it Freud takes up again this relation, always so alive for him, of the ego with the spoken manifestation of the subject in the session.

It seemed to me, for reasons which will become apparent to you, that M. Hyppolite, who by his presence, not to speak of his interventions, does us a great honour in coming here to participate in our work, could make us privy to a critique that is sustained by everything that we know of his previous work.

The problem at issue, as you are going to see, concerns nothing less than the entire theory, if not of knowledge, at least of judgement. That is why I asked him, no doubt a little insistently, to be so good as, not only to stand in for me, but to bring what he alone can bring to a text as rigorous as Die Verneinung.

I think that this could present difficulties for any mind not trained in those philosophical disciplines which we could not do without in our present capacity. Our experience is not that of affective smoochy-woochy. We don't have to elicit in the subject the return of more or less evanescent, confused experience, in which would consist all the magic of psychoanalysis. Hence we are plainly doing our duty in listening, when it comes to a text like this, to the expert opinions of someone who is practised in the analysis of language and trained in philosophical disciplines.

This paper shows once more the fundamental value of all of Freud's writings. Every word is worthy of being measured for its precise angle, for its accent, its specific turn, is worthy of being subjected to the most rigorous of logical analyses. It is in that way that it is distinguished from the same terms gathered together more or less hazily by the disciples, for whom the apprehension of the problems was at second-hand, if one may say it, and never in any depth, which resulted in this degradation of analytic theory to which its hesitations so constantly attest.

Before giving the floor to M. Hyppolite, I would like to draw your attention to an intervention that he made in the course of the sort of debate that was instigated by a certain way of putting things concerning Freud and his intentions with respect to the patient. M. Hyppolite had at that time come to Z*'s rescue . . .

M. HYPPOLITE: . . . for a brief moment.

. . . yes, for a brief moment of rescue. What was at issue, if you remember, was to find out what was Freud's basic, intentional attitude with respect to the patient, when he claimed to have substituted the analysis of resistances by speech for the subjugation that operates through suggestion or through hypnosis.

I showed myself to be extremely guarded on the question of knowing if there were at this point signs of combativeness in Freud, indeed of domination, vestiges of an ambitious style which we might see betrayed in his youth.

On this point, I think there is a quite decisive text. It is a passage from Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego. It is in connection with collective psychology, that is to say, relations to the other, that the ego, in so far as it is an autonomous function, is brought into Freud's work for the first time – a simple point, perhaps, but worth making because it justifies the particular manner in which I myself am introducing it to you. This passage comes from chapter four, entitled 'Suggestion and libido'.

We shall therefore be prepared for the statement that suggestion (or more correctly suggestibility) is actually an irreducible, primitive phenomenon, a fundamental fact in the mental life of man. Such, too, was the opinion of Bernheim, of whose astonishing arts I was a witness in the year 1889. But I can remember even then feeling a muffled hostility to this tyranny of suggestion. When a patient who showed himself unamenable was met with the shout: 'What are you doing? Vous vous contre-suggestionez!' I said to myself that this was an evident injustice and an act of violence. For the man certainly had a right to counter-suggestions if people were trying to subdue him with suggestions. Later on my resistance took the direction of protesting against the view that suggestion, which explained everything, was itself to be exempt from explanation. Thinking of it, I repeated the old conundrum:

Christoph trug Christum,
Christus trug die ganze Welt,
Sag' wo hat Christoph
Damals hin den Fuss gestellt?[1]

So – Freud experienced genuine revulsion on contact with the violence that speech can bring with it. This potential tendency of the analysis of resistances which Z* attested to the other day is precisely the misconstrual to be avoided in putting analysis into practice. I think that in this respect this passage has a very great value, and deserves to be cited.

In thanking him once more for the collaboration that he is willing to give us, I will ask M. Hyppolite who, from what I have gathered, was willing to devote a considerable amount of time to this text, to tell us straightforwardly what he makes of it.

Jean Hyppolite's contribution to the seminar, 'A spoken commentary on Freud's Verneinung', will be found in an Appendix.

We cannot thank M. Hyppolite enough for giving us the opportunity, through a movement coextensive with Freud's thought, to encounter straightaway this beyond of positive psychology, which he has so very remarkably located.

In passing, let me point out to you that in insisting in these seminars on the trans-psychological character of the psychoanalytical domain, we are only rediscovering what is quite evident from our practice, and which the very thought of the person who opened its gates to us constantly manifests in the very slightest of his writings.

There is a great deal to be drawn from a careful reflection on this text. The great concision of M. Hyppolite's presentation is perhaps, in a sense, much more didactic than what I myself, in my own way, tell you, with specific intentions in mind. I will get it duplicated for the benefit of those who come here, because it seems to me that one couldn't have a better preface to this differentiation of levels, to this critique of concepts, which I have myself endeavoured to introduce to you, with the aim of avoiding confusions.

M. Hyppolite's elaborations on Freud's text has shown us the difference between the levels of the Bejahung, of affirmation, and of negativity in as much as it sets up at a lower level – I use much more clumsy expressions quite on purpose – the constitution of the subject-object relation. That is exactly what this text, so minimal in appearance, introduces us to from the start, and it clearly links up with some of the most recent philosophical thinking.

By the same token, it allows us to criticise the ambiguity that always dogs us concerning the notorious opposition between the intellectual and the affective – as if the affective were a sort of colouration, a kind of ineffable quality which must be sought out in itself, independently of the eviscerated skin which the purely intellectual realisation of a subject's relationship would consist in. This conception, which urges analysis down strange paths, is puerile. The slightest peculiar, even strange, feeling that the subject professes to in the text of the session is taken to be a spectacular success. That is what follows from this fundamental misunderstanding.

The affective is not like a special density which would escape an intellectual accounting. It is not to be found in a mythical beyond of the production of the symbol which would precede the discursive formulation. Only this can allow us from the start, I won't say to locate, but to apprehend what the full realisation of speech consists in.

There is a little time left. I would like just now to try to indicate with some examples how the question arises. I am going to show it to you from two different angles.

Let us begin by taking a phenomenon whose perspective has been completely transformed by the development of thinking about psychopathology – hallucination.

Up to a certain date, hallucination was considered to be a critical phenomenon around which revolved the question of the discriminating value of consciousness – it couldn't be consciousness which was hallucinated, it had to be something else. In fact, one need only acquaint oneself with the new phenomenology of perception as put forward in M. Merleau-Ponty's book to see that hallucination is on the contrary integrated as being essential to the subject's intentionality.

When it comes to hallucination, one is usually content with a certain number of registers, such as that of the pleasure principle, in order to explain its production. One thus considers it as the initial movement in the order of the subject's satisfaction. We cannot rest content with a theorisation as simple as this.

Recall the example that I mentioned to you last time in the Wolfman. The progress of the analysis of the subject in question, the contradictions which are revealed by the traces through which we follow the specification of his position in the human world, point to a Verwerfung, a rejection – literally, it has always been for him as if the genital plane did not exist. We have been led to locate this rejection on the level, I would say, of the non-Bejahung, because we cannot, in any way, place it on the same level as a negation.

What is striking is what happens next. In the light of the explanations that have been given you today concerning the Die Verneinung, it will be much easier to comprehend. In a general way, in fact, the condition such that something exists for a subject is that there be Bejahung, this Bejahung which isn't a negation of the negation. What happens when this Bejahung doesn't happen, in such a way that nothing appears in the symbolic register?

Just let's look at the Wolfman. There was no Bejahung for him, no realisation of the genital plane. There is no trace of this plane in the symbolic register. The only trace we have of it is the emergence, not at all in his history, but really in the external world, of a minor hallucination. Castration, which is precisely what didn't exist for him, manifests itself in the form of something he imagines – to have cut his little finger, so deeply that it hangs solely by a little piece of skin. He is then overwhelmed by a feeling of a castastrophe that is so inexpressible that he doesn't even dare to talk of it to the person by his side. What he daren't talk about is this – it is as if this person to whom he immediately refers all of his emotions were annulled. The other no longer exists. There is a sort of immediate external world, of manifestations perceived in what I will call a primitive real, a non-symbolised real, despite the symbolic form, in the usual sense of the term, that this phenomenon takes.

The subject is not at all psychotic. He just has a hallucination. He might be psychotic later on, but he isn't at the moment when he has this absolutely limited, nodal experience, quite foreign to his childhood, completely disintegrated. At this point in his childhood, nothing entitles one to classify him as a schizophrenic, but it really is a psychotic phenomenon we are dealing with.

Hence there is here, at the level of completely primitive experience, at the source-point in which the possibility of the symbol lays the subject open to a certain relation to the world, a correlation, a balancing that I would very much like you to understand – what is not recognised irrupts into consciousness in the form of the seen.

If you go deeply into this particular polarisation, you'll find it much easier to broach the ambiguous phenomenon known as déjà-vu, which lies between these two modes of relation, the recognised and the seen. In the déjà-vu, something in the external world is carried to the limit, and emerges with a special pre-signification. Retrospective illusion relates this perceived thing endowed with an original quality to the domain of the déjà-vu. Freud is talking of nothing other than this when he tells us that any experiencing[2] of the external world implicitly refers to something which has already been perceived in the past. This is true as far as you might want to take it – in a certain way, all varieties of the perceived necessarily include a reference to something previously perceived.

That is why we are here brought back to the level of the imaginary as such, to the level of the model image of the original form. What is at issue is not the recognised as symbolised and verbalised. Rather we rediscover the problems raised by Platonic theory, not of remembering but of reminiscence.

I promised you another example, which I am taking from the advocates of the so-called modern way of analysing. You'll see that these principles were already set out in 1925 in this text of Freud's.

A great deal is made of the fact that at first we analyse the surface, as they say. It would be the crowning glory to make it possible for the subject to progress by escaping this sort of chance represented by the intellectualised sterilisation of contents re-evoked by analysis.

Well, Kris, in one of his articles, gives an account of the case of a subject whom he took into analysis and who, it should be said, had already been analysed once. This subject is seriously hampered in his profession, an intellectual profession which appears to be, in the glimpses one catches of it, not far removed from what might be our preoccupations. This subject experiences all manner of difficulties producing, as they say. Indeed, his life is as it were fettered by the feeling he has of being, let's say for the sake of brevity, a plagiarist. He is continually discussing his ideas with someone who is very close to him, a brilliant scholar,[3] but he always feels tempted to take on the ideas his interlocutor provides him with, and that is for him a perpetual impediment to everything that he wants to get out, to publish.

[2] 'toute épreuve'. Cf. Realitätsprufung, épreuve de la réalité, reality-testing.

All the same, he manages to get one text into shape. But, one day, he turns up declaring almost triumphantly that the whole of his thesis is already to be found in the library, in a published article. So there he is, this time, a plagiarist despite himself.

What will the alleged interpretation of the surface that Kris offers us actually consist in? Probably in the following – Kris in actual fact gets interested in what happened and what the article contains. Looking into it more closely, he realises that none of the central theses brought forward by the subject are to be found there. Some issues are raised which address the same question, but there is nothing of the new views brought forward by his patient, whose thesis is thus clearly original. This is where you must start from, Kris says, it's what he calls – I don't know why – taking up things on the surface.

Now, Kris says, if the subject is bent on showing him that his entire behaviour is completely shackled, it is because his father never succeeded in producing anything, because he was crushed by a grandfather – in all the senses of the word – who himself had a highly constructive and fertile mind. He needs to find in his father a grandfather, a father who would be grand, who, in contrast, would be capable of doing something, and he satisfies this need by forging himself tutors, always grander than him, upon whom he becomes dependent by means of a plagiarism which he then reproaches himself for, and by means of which he destroys himself. He is thus doing nothing more than satisfying a need, the same need that tormented his childhood and in consequence dominated his history.

There's no question about it, the interpretation is valid. And it is important to see how the subject reacted to it. What does Kris consider as being the confirmation of the significance of what he put forward, which has such tremendous implications?

In what follows we see the whole history of the subject unfolding. We see that the symbolisation, properly speaking penile of this need for the real, creative and powerful, father, took the form of all sorts of games in childhood, fishing games – will the father catch a bigger or a smaller fish? etc. But the immediate reaction of the subject is the following. He remains silent, and at the next session he says – The other day, on leaving, I went into such and such street – it takes place in New York, it is the street where there are foreign restaurants where you can eat rather more spicy dishes – and I sought out a place where I could find the dish I am particularly fond of, fresh brains.

Here you can see what makes for a response elicited by an accurate interpretation, namely a level of speech which is both paradoxical and full in its meaning.

What makes this an accurate interpretation? Are we dealing with something which is at the surface? What does that mean? It means nothing, other than that Kris, via a detour that is doubtless diligent, but whose outcome he could easily have predicted, came to realise precisely the following – that the subject, in his manifestation in this special guise of the production of an organised discourse, in which he is always subject to this process which is called negation and in which the integration of his ego is accomplished, can only reflect his fundamental relation to his ideal ego in an inverted form.

In other words, the relation to the other, in so far as the primitive desire of the subject strives to manifest itself in it, always contains in itself this fundamental, original element of negation, which here takes the form of inversion.

This, as you see, only opens up new problems for us.

But to continue, it would be useful if one were to fix precisely the difference of level between the symbolic as such, the symbolic possibility, the opening up of man to symbols, and, on the other hand, its crystallisation in organised discourse in so far as it contains, fundamentally, contradiction. I think that M. Hyppolite's commentary has shown you that today in a magisterial fashion. I would like you to keep both the tool and the means to use it to hand, as milestones to which you will always be able to refer yourselves when you come to difficult crossroads in the rest of our discussion. That is why I thank M. Hyppolite for having given us the benefit of his extraordinary expertise.

Discourse analysis and ego analysis

ANNA FREUD OR MELANIE KLEIN

What I intend to do is to begin to draw you into the area marked out by the remarks I made last time. It is very precisely that area between the formation of the symbol and the discourse of the ego, and we have already been making our way into it from the start of this year. Today, I've entitled the seminar we'll be pursuing together 'Discourse analysis and ego analysis', but I cannot promise to live up to such an ambitious title in a single session. In opposing these terms, I mean them to take the place of the classical opposition between analysis of contents/analysis of resistances.

In the text on the Verneinung that he kindly commented on for us, M. Hyppolite brought out the importance of the complex meaning of Aufhebung. In German, this term signifies at once to deny, to suppress and also to preserve through suppression, to raise up. We have here an example of a concept which cannot be pondered over too much in order to reflect upon what we do in our dialogue, with the subject, as psychoanalysts have for some time noted.

Obviously we are dealing with the ego of the subject, with its limitations, its defences, its character. We have to get it moving. But what function does it have in this operation? The entire psychoanalytic literature is as it were at a loss over its exact definition.

All the recent discussions which take the ego of the analysand to be the ally of the analyst in the Great Analytic Work contain quite obvious contradictions. Indeed, apart from ending up with the notion, not only of the bipolarity or bi-functioning of the ego, but strictly speaking of its splitting,[1] the radical distinction between two egos, it is very difficult to define the ego as an autonomous function, while at the same time continuing to regard it as a master of errors, the seat of illusions, the locus of a passion proper to it, one which leads essentially to misunderstanding [méconnaissance]. In analysis, as moreover in one major philosophical tradition, misunderstanding is precisely its function.

There are paragraphs in Anna Freud's book, The Ego and the Mechanisms of Defence, where one has the feeling, if you overlook the sometimes disconcertingly reifying character of its language, that she is talking about the ego with the same kind of understanding as we are trying to sustain here. And at the same time one has the feeling that she is talking about the-little-man-within-the-man, who has an autonomous life within the subject and who is there to defend it – Father, look out to the right, Father, look out to the left – against whatever might assail him from without as from within. If we were to consider her book as the depiction of a moralist, then she incontestably is speaking of the ego as the seat of a certain number of passions, in a style not unworthy of the manner in which La Rochefoucauld points out the unflagging ruses of self-love.

The dynamic function of the ego in the analytic dialogue thus up to now remains fundamentally contradictory for lack of having its place rigorously specified and this fact comes to the surface each time we touch on the principles underlying technique.

I believe that many of you have read this book of Anna Freud's. It is extremely instructive and it is easy to pick out, on account of its being quite rigorous, those points where the weaker elements in its argument appear, still more apparent in the examples she gives.

Look at the passages where she tries to define the function of the ego. In analysis, she says, the ego is only made manifest through its defences, that is to say in so far as it is opposed to the work of analysis. Does that amount to saying that everything which is opposed to the work of analysis is a defence of the ego? Elsewhere she acknowledges that one cannot maintain this and that there are other elements of resistance than the defences of the ego. Isn't that the way I began broaching the problem with you? Many of the problems we've taken up here figure in this book, and one should read it pen in hand, because it has the status of a legacy, faithfully transmitted, of Freud's final detailed construction regarding the ego.

Someone close to us in the Société, seized at the 1950 Congress, I know not why, with a lyrical impulse – this dear friend – called Anna Freud the plumb-line of psychoanalysis. Well, the plumb-line doesn't make a building. A number of other instruments are needed, a water-level for instance. But in the end the plumb-line isn't that bad – it allows us to gauge the vertical of certain problems.

I am going to ask Mlle Gélinier to give you an account of an article of Melanie Klein's entitled 'The importance of symbol-formation in the development of the ego'. I don't think reading one of Anna Freud's texts dealing with the analysis of children, and especially the ego defences, can be a bad way of introducing it.

Here is a small example she gives us. It concerns one of her patients, who comes to be analysed on account of a state of acute anxiety which disrupts her life and her studies, all this, to obey her mother.

Her attitude toward me was friendly and frank, but I noticed that in all her communications she carefully avoided making any allusion to her symptom. She never mentioned anxiety attacks which took place between the analytic sessions. If I myself insisted on bringing her symptom into the analysis or gave interpretations of her anxiety which were based on unmistakable indications in her associations, her friendly attitude changed. On every such occasion the result was a volley of contemptuous and mocking remarks. The attempt to find a connection between the patient's attitude and her relation to her mother was completely unsuccessful. Both in consciousness and in the unconscious that relation was entirely different. In these repeated outbursts of contempt and ridicule the analyst found herself at a loss and the patient was, for the time being, inaccessible to further analysis. As the analysis went deeper, however, we found that these affects did not represent a transference reaction in the true sense of the term and were not connected with the analytic situation at all. They indicated the patient's customary attitude toward herself whenever emotions of tenderness, longing, or anxiety were about to emerge in her affective life. The more powerfully the affect forced itself upon her, the more vehemently and scathingly did she ridicule herself. The analyst became the recipient of these defensive reactions only secondarily, because she was encouraging the demands of the patient's anxiety to be worked over in consciousness. The interpretation of the content of the anxiety, even when this could be correctly inferred from other communications, could have no result so long as every approach to the affect only intensified her defensive reaction. It was impossible to make that content conscious until we had brought into consciousness and so rendered inoperative the patient's method of defending herself against her affects by contemptuous disparagement – a process which had become automatic in every department of her life. Historically this mode of defence by means of ridicule and scorn was explained by her identification of herself with her dead father, who used to try to train the little girl in self-control by making mocking remarks when she gave way to some emotional outburst. The method had become stereotyped through her memory of her father, whom she had loved dearly. The technique necessary in order to understand this case was to begin with the analysis of the patient's defence against her affects and to go on to the elucidation of her resistance in the transference. Then, and then only, was it possible to proceed to the analysis of her anxiety itself and of its antecedents.[2]

What is at stake in what is here presented as the necessity for analysing the ego defence? Nothing other than the correlate of an error. Indeed, Anna Freud immediately approached the material from the perspective of the dual relation between the patient and herself. She took the patient's defence to be what was its manifestation, namely an aggressive act toward her, Anna Freud. It is on the plane of her own ego, Anna Freud's, it is within the framework of the dual relation with her, Anna Freud, that she perceived the manifestations of the ego defence. At the same time she wanted to see in it a manifestation of transference, according to the formula which makes of the transference the reproduction of a situation. Although it is often given, to the point where it is taken to be classical, this formula is incomplete, since it doesn't specify how the situation is structured. What I am now saying to you is related to what I pointed out in my lecture at the Collège Philosophique.

Anna Freud started by interpreting the analytic relation in accordance with the prototype of the dual relation, which is the relation of the subject to her mother. She immediately found herself in a position which not only marked time but was also perfectly sterile. What does she call having analysed the defence against the affects? Following this text, there seems no other alternative than her very own understanding. This path would not take her very far. She should have distinguished between the dual interpretation, in which the analyst enters into an ego to ego rivalry with the analysand, and the interpretation which moves forward in the direction of the symbolic structuration of the subject, which is to be located beyond the present structure of his ego.

Through this we come back to the question of knowing what Bejahung, what assumption by the ego, what yes is at issue in the progress of analysis. What Bejahung should be elicited, so as to constitute the unveiling essential to the progress of an analysis?

In a passage to be found in the Outline of Psycho-analysis, page 40 in the French edition,[3] but which is not outside of our purview since it is headed 'The technique of psycho-analysis', Freud tells us that it is the ratification of a pact that determines the point of entry into the analytic situation. The sick ego promises us the most complete candour – promises, that is, to put at our disposal all the material which its self-perception yields it; we assure the patient of the strictest discretion and place at his service our experience in interpreting material that has been influenced by the unconscious. Our knowledge is to make up for his ignorance and to give his ego back its mastery over lost provinces of his mental life. This pact constitutes the analytic situation.

Well – as my last lecture implied – if it is true that our knowledge comes to the rescue of the ignorance of the analysand, it is no less the case that we are also in ignorance, in as much as we are ignorant of the symbolic constellation dwelling in the subject's unconscious. What is more, this constellation should always be conceived of as structured, in accordance with a complex order.

The word complex surfaced in analytic theory through a kind of internal force since, as you know, it wasn't Freud who invented it, but Jung. When we get on the trail of the unconscious, what we encounter are structured, organised, complex situations. Freud gave us the first model of it, its standard, in the Oedipus complex. Those of you who have followed my seminar for some time have had the opportunity to see for themselves to what extent the Oedipus complex poses problems and to what extent it contains ambiguities, thanks to the commentary I made on those cases least subject to reservations on account of their having been so richly sketched in by Freud himself, namely three of the five great psychoanalyses. In short, the entire development of analysis has resulted from showing to advantage, one after another, each of the tensions implied within this triangular system. This fact alone requires us to see in it something quite different from this solid mass summed up in the classic formula – sexual attraction for the mother, rivalry with the father.

You are aware of the profoundly dissymmetrical character, right from the start, of each of the dual relations included within the Oedipal structure. The relation linking the subject to the mother is distinct from that linking him to the father, the narcissistic or imaginary relation to the father is distinct from the symbolic relation, and also from the relation that we really do have to call real – which is residual with respect to the edifice which commands our attention in analysis. All this demonstrates well enough the structure's complexity, and it is by no means inconceivable that another line of research will allow us to develop the Oedipal myth more clearly than has been done up to now.

Despite the wealth of material which has been included within the Oedipal relation, the schema laid down by Freud can hardly be said to have been departed from. This schema should be kept to in its essentials, because it is, and you'll see why, truly fundamental, not only for any understanding of the subject, but also for any symbolic realisation by the subject, of the id, of the unconscious – which is a self [soi-même] and not a set of unorganised drives, as a part of Freud's theoretical elaboration might lead one to think when one reads in it that within the psyche only the ego possesses an organisation.

Last time we saw that even the reduction of the negation bearing on what has been denied does not, for all that, render up to us, on behalf of the subject, his Bejahung. One should take a close look at the value of the criteria we demand – and on which we are, moreover, in agreement with the subject – in order to recognise a satisfactory Bejahung.

What is the source of the evidence? It is the analytic reconstruction that the subject must authenticate. The memory must be re-experienced with the help of empty spaces. And Freud quite rightly reminds us that we can never wholeheartedly trust memory. From then on, what, exactly, are we satisfied with when the subject tells us that things have got to that clicking-point where he has the feeling of truth?

This question brings us to the heart of the problem of the feeling of reality which I touched on the other day with respect to the genesis of the Wolfman's hallucination. I put forward the quasi-algebraic formula, which has the air of being almost too transparent, too concrete – the real, or what is perceived as such, is what resists symbolisation absolutely. In the end, doesn't the feeling of the real reach its high point in the pressing manifestation of an unreal, hallucinatory reality?

For the Wolfman, the symbolisation of the meaning of the genital plane was verworfen. So should we be surprised that a number of interpretations, which are called interpretations of contents, are not symbolised by the subject? They manifest themselves at a stage when they cannot in any way make available to him the revelation of his situation within this forbidden territory that is his unconscious, in so far as they are still located in the plane of negation or in that of the negation of the negation. Something has not yet been got over – which is precisely beyond discourse, and which necessitates a jump in discourse. Repression cannot purely and simply disappear, it can only be gone beyond, in the sense of Aufhebung.

What Anna Freud calls the analysis of the defences against affect is only one step in her own understanding and not in that of the subject. Once she realises that she is on the wrong track in believing that the subject's defence is a defence against herself, she can then analyse the resistance of the transference.

Where does this lead her? – to someone who isn't there, to a third party. She sifts out something that must greatly resemble Dora's position. The subject is identified with her father and this identification has structured her ego. This structuration of the ego is here referred to as a defence. It is the most superficial aspect of identification, but one is able, through this short cut, to make connection again with a deeper plane, and to recognise the subject's position in the symbolic order. Nothing other than this is at stake in analysis – recognising what function the subject takes on in the order of the symbolic relations which covers the entire field of human relations, and whose initial cell is the Oedipus complex, where the assumption of sex is decided.

Now I will let Mlle Gélinier speak – she will get you to grasp Melanie Klein's point of view. This point of view is opposed to that of Anna Freud – it is not for nothing that these two ladies confronted each other in Merovingian rivalries, a situation not without parallel.

Anna Freud's point of view is intellectualist, and leads her into putting forward the view that everything in analysis must be conducted from a median, moderate position, which would be that of the ego. For her everything starts with the education or the persuasion of the ego, and everything must come back to that. You are going to see the diametrically opposite starting point of Melanie Klein's approach to a particularly difficult subject, apropos of whom one may ask oneself how Anna Freud would have been able to make use of her categories of the strong ego and the weak ego, which presuppose a position of preliminary re-education. By the same token you will be able to judge which of the two is closer to the axis of the Freudian discovery.

Melanie Klein's article, 'The importance of symbol-formation in the development of the ego', published in 1930, is to be found in The Writings of Melanie Klein, vol I, pp. 219–32.

She slams the symbolism on him with complete brutality, does Melanie Klein, on little Dick! Straight away she starts off hitting him large-scale interpretations. She hits him a brutal verbalisation of the Oedipal myth, almost as revolting for us as for any reader – You are the little train, you want to fuck your mother.

Quite clearly, this way of doing things leads to theoretical discussions – which cannot be dissociated from a case-diagnostic. But it is clear that as a result of this interpretation something happens. Everything is there.

You will have noticed the lack of contact that Dick experiences. That's where the defect of his ego is. His ego isn't formed. Moreover Melanie Klein differentiates Dick from a neurotic, by his profound indifference, his apathy, his absence. In fact, it is clear that, for him, what isn't symbolised is reality. This young subject is completely in reality, in the pure state, unconstituted. He is entirely in the undifferentiated. Now, what constitutes a human world? – if not the interest brought to bear on objects as distinct entities or as equivalent ones. The human world is an infinite world as far as its objects are concerned. In this respect, Dick lives in a non-human world.

This text is a precious one because it comes from a therapist, a woman of experience. She feels things, she expresses them badly – one cannot blame her for that. The theory of the ego is incomplete here perhaps because she hadn't decided to provide one, but what she does show extremely well is the following – if, in the human world, objects become variegated, develop, with the luxuriance that makes for its originality, it is to the extent that they make their appearance within a process of expulsion linked to the instinct of primitive destruction.

What is at issue here is a primitive relation, at the very root, the instinctual root, of being. As these ejections out of the subject's primitive world each take place, a world which is not yet organised into the register of a properly human, communicable reality, so each time a new type of identification arises. That is what is insufferable, and anxiety arises simultaneously.

Anxiety is not a sort of energy that the subject has to apportion out in order to constitute objects, and Melanie Klein's text does not include any turn of phrase which might be read in this way. Anxiety is always defined as appearing suddenly, as arising.[4] To each of the objectal relations there corresponds a mode of identification of which anxiety is the signal. The identifications in question here precede the ego-identification. But even when this latter will have been achieved, every new re-identification of the subject will cause anxiety to arise - anxiety in the sense of its being a temptation, a giddiness, a loss of the subject as he finds himself at extremely primitive levels. Anxiety is a connotation, a signal, as Freud always very clearly formulated it, a quality, a subjective colouration.

Now this anxiety is exactly what is not generated in the subject in question. Dick cannot even engage in the first sort of identification, which would already be an essay in symbolism. He is, paradoxical as it may seem to say it, eyeball to eyeball with reality, he lives in reality. In Melanie Klein's office, there is neither other nor ego for him, just a reality pure and simple. The space between the two doors is the body of his mother. The trains and all that is doubtless something, but something which is neither nameable nor named.

It is at this point that Melanie Klein, with her animal instinct which has moreover allowed her to bore through a body of knowledge which was up to then impenetrable, dares to speak to him – to speak to a being who nonetheless allows himself to be apprehended as someone who, in the symbolic sense of the term, does not reply. He is there as if she didn't exist, as if she were a piece of furniture. And yet she is speaking to him. She literally gives names to what doubtless does indeed partake in the symbol, since it can be named immediately, but which was, up to that moment, for this subject, just reality pure and simple.

That is what gives signification to the term prematuration which she employs to say that Dick has already in some sense reached the genital stage.

Normally, the subject finds for those objects of his primitive identification a series of imaginary equivalents which diversify his world – he draws up identifications with certain objects, withdraws them, makes them up again with others, etc. Each time anxiety prevents a definitive identification, the fixation of reality. But these comings and goings will give its framework to that infinitely more complex real which is the human real. After this phase, in the course of which fantasies are symbolised, comes the so-called genital phase, in which reality is then fixed.

Now, for Dick, reality is clearly fixed, but that's because he cannot undertake these comings and goings. He is immediately in a reality which knows no development.

It is however not a completely dehumanised reality. It signifies, at its own level. It is already symbolised, since one can give it a meaning. But as it is above all a movement of coming and going, it only amounts to an anticipated, fixed symbolisation, with a single and unique primary identification, with the following names – the void, the dark. This gap is precisely what is human in the structure peculiar to the subject, and that is what replies within him. He only makes contact with this gap.

In this gap, he can count only a very limited number of objects, which he cannot even name, as you have already astutely noted. Certainly, he already has some sense of vocables, but to these vocables he hasn't given a Bejahung – he hasn't assumed them. At the same time, paradoxical as it may appear, a potentiality for empathy can be found in him, which is much greater than normal, because he is perfectly at ease in relation to reality, in a non-anxiogenic fashion. When he sees little pencil shavings on Melanie Klein's blouse, the result of a fragmentation, he says – Poor Melanie Klein.

Next time we will take up the problem of the relation between the symbolic and the real from the most difficult angle, at its point of origin. You will see the connection with what we singled out the other day in M. Hyppolite's commentary – the function of destructionism in the constitution of human reality.

FUNCTION OF THE MYTH OF OEDIPUS IN PSYCHOANALYSIS

The small talk I will offer you today was announced under the title 'The topic of the imaginary'. Such a subject is quite enough to fill up several years of teaching, but since several questions concerning the place of the imaginary in the symbolic structure crop up while following the thread of our discourse, today's chat may justify its title.

It wasn't without some preconceived plan, the rigour of which will, I hope, become apparent as it is revealed in its entirety, that last time I brought your attention to a case whose particular significance resides in its showing in miniature the reciprocal interplay of those three grand terms we have already had occasion to make much of – the imaginary, the symbolic, and the real.

Without these three systems to guide ourselves by, it would be impossible to understand anything of the Freudian technique and experience. Many difficulties are vindicated and clarified when one brings these distinctions to bear on them. This is indeed the case with the incomprehensions Mlle Gélinier remarked upon the other day when dealing with Melanie Klein's text. What matters, when one tries to elaborate upon some experience, isn't so much what one understands, as what one doesn't understand. The value of Mlle Gélinier's report is precisely to have highlighted what, in this text, cannot be understood.

That is why the method of textual commentary proves itself fruitful. Commenting on a text is like doing an analysis. How many times have I said to those under my supervision, when they say to me – I had the impression he meant this or that – that one of the things we must guard most against is to understand too much, to understand more than what is in the discourse of the subject. To interpret and to imagine one understands are not at all the same things. It is precisely the opposite. I would go as far as to say that it is on the basis of a kind of refusal of understanding that we push open the door to analytic understanding.

It isn't enough for it to seem to hang together, a text. Obviously, it hangs together within the framework of pat phrases we've grown used to – instinctual maturation, primitive aggressive instinct, oral, anal sadism, etc. And yet, in the register that Melanie Klein brings into play, there appear several contrasts, which I am going to return to in detail.

Everything turns on what Mlle Gélinier found to be peculiar, paradoxical, contradictory in the ego's function – if too developed, it stops all development, but in developing, it reopens the door to reality. How is it that the gate to reality is reopened by a development of the ego? What is the specific function of the Kleinian interpretation, which appears to have an intrusive character, a superimposing upon the subject? These are the questions that we will have to touch upon again today.

You should have realised by now that, in the case of this young subject, real, imaginary and symbolic are here tangible, are flush with one another. I have taught you to identify the symbolic with language – now, isn't it in so far as, say, Melanie Klein speaks, that something happens? On the other hand, when Melanie Klein tells us that the objects are constituted by the interplay of projections, introjections, expulsions, reintrojections of bad objects, and that the subject, having projected his sadism, sees it coming back from these objects, and, by this very fact, finds himself jammed up by an anxious fear, don't you have the feeling that we are in the domain of the imaginary?

From then on the whole problem is that of the juncture of the symbolic and of the imaginary in the constitution of the real.

To clarify things a little for you, I've concocted a little model for you, a substitute for the mirror-stage.

As I have often underlined, the mirror-stage is not simply a moment in development. It also has an exemplary function, because it reveals some of the subject's relations to his image, in so far as it is the Urbild of the ego. Now, this mirror-stage, which no one can deny, has an optical presentation – nor can anyone deny that. Is it a coincidence?

The sciences, and above all those sciences in labour, as ours is, frequently borrow models from other sciences. My dear fellows, you wouldn't believe what you owe to geology. If it weren't for geology, how could one end up thinking that one could move, on the same level, from a recent to a much more ancient layer? It wouldn't be a bad thing, I'll note in passing, if every analyst went out and bought a small book on geology. There was once an analyst geologist, Leuba, who wrote one. I can't recommend you to read it too highly.

Optics could also have its say. At this point I find that I'm not in disagreement with the tradition established by the master – more than one of you must have noticed in the Traumdeutung, in the chapter 'The psychology of the dream-process', the famous schema into which Freud inserts the entire proceedings of the unconscious.

Inside, Freud places the different layers which can be distinguished from the level of perception, namely from the instantaneous impression – Mnem', Mnem'', etc, both image and memory. These recorded traces are later repressed into the unconscious. It is a very pretty schema, which we will come back to since it will be useful to us. But I'd like to point out that it is accompanied by a commentary which doesn't appear to have ever attracted anyone's attention, even though it was used again in another form in Freud's quasi last work, the Outline of Psycho-analysis.

I will read it to you as it is to be found in the Traumdeutung. What is presented to us in these words is the idea of psychical locality – what is at issue here is precisely the field of psychical reality, that is to say of everything which takes place between perception and the motor consciousness of the ego. I shall entirely disregard the fact that the mental apparatus with which we are here concerned is also known to us in the form of an anatomical preparation, and I shall carefully avoid the temptation to determine psychical locality in any anatomical fashion. I shall remain upon psychological ground, and I propose simply to follow the suggestion that we should picture the instrument which carries out our mental functions as resembling a compound microscope or a photographic apparatus, or something of the kind. On that basis, psychical locality will correspond to a point inside the apparatus at which one of the preliminary stages of an image comes into being. In the microscope and telescope, as we know, these occur in part at ideal points, regions in which no tangible component of the apparatus is situated. I see no necessity to apologise for the imperfections of this or of any similar imagery. Analogies of this kind are only intended to assist us in our attempt to make the complications of mental functioning intelligible by dissecting the function and assigning its different constituents to different component parts of the apparatus. So far as I know, the experiment has not hitherto been made of using this method of dissection in order to investigate the way in which the mental instrument is put together, and I can see no harm in it. We are justified, in my view, in giving free rein to our speculations so long as we retain the coolness of our judgement and do not mistake the scaffolding for the building. And

since at our first approach to something unknown all that we need is the assistance of provisional ideas, I shall give preference in the first instance to hypotheses of the crudest and most concrete description.[2]

I don't have to tell you that, seeing as advice is given so as not to be followed, since then we haven't missed an opportunity of taking the scaffolding for the building. On the other hand, the authorisation which Freud gives us to make use of supplementary relations so as to bring us closer to an unknown fact incited me into myself manifesting a certain lack of deference in constructing a schema.

Something almost infantile will do for us today, an optical apparatus much simpler than a compound microscope – not that it wouldn't be fun to follow up the comparison in question, but that would take us a bit far out of our way.

I cannot urge you too strongly to a meditation on optics. The odd thing is that an entire system of metaphysics has been founded on geometry and mechanics, by looking to them for models of understanding, but up to now it doesn't seem as though optics has been exploited as much as it could have been. Yet it should lend itself to a few dreams, this strange science which sets itself to produce, by means of apparatuses, that peculiar thing called images, in contrast to other sciences, which import into nature a cutting up, a dissection, an anatomy.

Don't think that, having said this, I am trying to make you believe that the moon is made of green cheese, or to make you take optical images for those images with which we are concerned. But, all the same, it is not for nothing that they share a name.

Optical images possess a peculiar diversity – some of them are purely subjective, these are the ones we call virtual, whereas others are real, namely in some respects, behave like objects and can be taken for such. More peculiar still – we can make virtual images of those objects which are real images. In such an instance, the object which is the real image quite rightly has the name of virtual object.

There is in truth something which is even more surprising, which is that optics is founded on a mathematical theory without which it is absolutely impossible to structure it. For there to be an optics, for each given point in real space, there must be one point and one corresponding point only in another space, which is the imaginary space. This is the fundamental structural hypothesis. It gives the impression of being overly simple, but without it one cannot write even one equation, nor symbolise anything – optics would be impossible. Even those who are not aware of this couldn't do a thing in optics if it didn't exist.

Here, too, the imaginary space and the real space fuse. Nonetheless they have to be conceived of as different. When it comes to optics, there are many opportunities for employing certain distinctions which show you the extent to which the symbolic source counts in the emergence of a given phenomenon.

On the other hand, there is in optics a set of phenomena which can be said to be altogether real since we are also guided by experience in this matter, but in which, nonetheless, subjectivity is implicated at every moment. When you see a rainbow, you're seeing something completely subjective. You see it at a certain distance as if stitched on to the landscape. It isn't there. It is a subjective phenomenon. But nonetheless, thanks to a camera, you record it entirely objectively. So, what is it? We no longer have a clear idea, do we, which is the subjective, which is the objective. Or isn't it rather that we have acquired the habit of placing a too hastily drawn distinction between the objective and the subjective in our little thought-tank? Isn't the camera a subjective apparatus, entirely constructed with the help of an x and a y which take up residence in the domain which the subject inhabits, that is to say that of language?

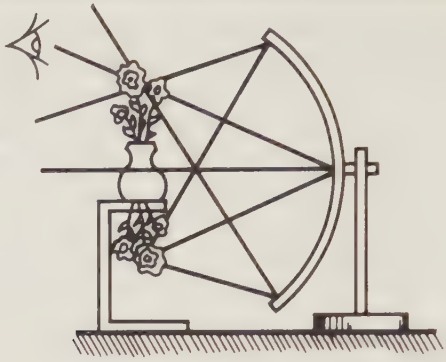
I will leave these questions hanging, to move straight on to a small example that I will try to get into your heads before I put it on the blackboard, because there is nothing more dangerous than things on the blackboard – it's always a bit flat.

It is a classical experiment, which used to be performed in the days when physics was fun, in the days when physics was really physics. Likewise, as for us, we find ourselves at a moment in time when psychoanalysis is really psychoanalysis. The closer we get to psychoanalysis being funny the more it is real psychoanalysis. Later on, it will get run in, it will be done by cutting corners and by pulling tricks. No one will understand any longer what's being done, just as there is no longer any need to understand anything about optics to make a microscope. So let us rejoice, we are still doing psychoanalysis.

Put a vast cauldron in place of me – which perhaps could quite happily stand in for me on some days, as a sound-box – a cauldron as close as possible to being a half-sphere, nicely polished on the inside, in short a spherical mirror. If it is brought forward almost as far as the table, you won't see yourselves inside it – hence, even if I were turned into a cauldron, the mirage effect that occurs from time to time between me and my pupils would not come about here. A spherical mirror produces a real image. To each point of a light ray emanating from any point on an object placed at a certain distance, preferably in the plane of the sphere's centre, there corresponds, in the same plane, through the convergence of the rays reflected on the surface of the sphere, another luminous point – which yields a real image of the object.

I am sorry that I haven't been able to bring the cauldron today, nor the experimental apparatuses. You'll have to represent them to yourselves.

Suppose that this is a box, hollow on this side, and that it's placed on a stand, at the centre of the half-sphere. On the box, you will place a vase, a real one. Beneath it, there is a bouquet of flowers. So, what is happening?



The experiment of the inverted bouquet

The bouquet is reflected in the spherical surface, meeting at the symmetrical point of luminosity. Consequently, a real image is formed. Note that the rays do not quite cross perfectly in my schema, but that is also true in reality, and for all optical instruments – one only ever gets an approximation. Beyond the eye, the rays continue their movement, and diverge once again. But for the eye, they are convergent, and give a real image, since the characteristic of rays which strike the eye in a convergent form is that they give a real image. Convergent in meeting the eye, they diverge in moving away from it. If the rays happen to meet the eye in the opposite sense, then a virtual image is formed. This is what happens when you look at an image in the mirror – you see it where it isn't. Here, on the contrary, you see it where it is – on the one condition that your eye be in the field of the rays which have already crossed each other at the corresponding point.

At that moment, while you do not see the real bouquet, which is hidden, if you are in the right field, you will see a very peculiar imaginary bouquet appear, taking shape exactly in the neck of the vase. Since your eyes have to move linearly in the same plane, you will have an impression of reality, all the while sensing that something is strange, blurred, because the rays don't quite cross over very well. The further away you are, the more parallax comes into play, and the more complete the illusion will be.

This is a fable we will put to a great deal of use. To be sure, this schema has no pretension to touch on anything which has a substantial relation to anything we deal with in analysis, the so-called real or objective relations, or the imaginary relations. But it allows us to illustrate in a particularly simple way what follows on from the strict intrication of the imaginary world and the real world in the psychic economy – now you are going to see how.

This little experiment pleased me. It is not me who invented it, it has been around for a long time, known as the experiment of the inverted bouquet. As it stands, in its innocence – these authors didn't make it up for us – it seduces us with its contingent details, the vase and the bouquet.

Indeed, the specific domain of the primitive ego, Urich or Lustich, is constituted by a splitting, by a differentiation from the external world – what is included inside is differentiated from what is rejected by the processes of exclusion, Aufstossung, and of projection. From then on, if there are any notions which are placed at the forefront of every psychoanalytic conception of the primitive stage of the ego's formation, it is clearly those of container and contained. This is how the relation of the vase to the flowers that it contains can serve us as a metaphor, a most precious one at that.

You know that the process of his physiological maturation allows the subject, at a given moment in his history, to integrate effectively his motor functions, and to gain access to a real mastery of his body. Except the subject becomes aware of his body as a totality prior to this particular moment, albeit in a correlative manner. That is what I insist upon in my theory of the mirror-stage – the sight alone of the whole form of the human body gives the subject an imaginary mastery over his body, one which is premature in relation to a real mastery. This formation is separated from the specific process of maturation and is not confused with it. The subject anticipates on the achievement of psychological mastery, and this anticipation will leave its mark on every subsequent exercise of effective motor mastery.

This is the original adventure through which man, for the first time, has the experience of seeing himself, of reflecting on himself and conceiving of himself as other than he is – an essential dimension of the human, which entirely structures his fantasy life.

In the beginning we assume there to be all the ids, objects, instincts, desires, tendencies, etc. That is reality pure and simple then, which is not delimited by anything, which cannot yet be the object of any definition, which is neither good, nor bad, but is all at the same time chaotic and absolute, primal. This is the level Freud is referring to in Die Verneinung, when he talks about judgements of existence – either it is, or it is not. And it is here that the image of the body gives the subject the first form which allows him to locate what pertains to the ego and what does not. Well then, let us say that the image of the body, if we locate it in our schema, is like the imaginary vase which contains the bouquet of real flowers. That's how we can portray for ourselves the subject of the time before the birth of the ego, and the appearance of the latter.

I'm schematising, as you're quite well aware, but developing a metaphor, a thinking apparatus, requires that from the start one give a sense of what its use is. You will see that this apparatus here possesses a versatility which allows for all sorts of movement. You can invert the experiment's conditions – the pot could just as well be underneath and the flowers on top. You could make what is real imaginary at your discretion, on condition that you retain the relation of the signs, $+ - +$ or $- + -$.

For there to be an illusion, for there to be a world constituted, in front of the eye looking, in which the imaginary can include the real and, by the same token, fashion it, in which the real also can include and, by the same token, locate the imaginary, one condition must be fulfilled – as I have said, the eye must be in a specific position, it must be inside the cone.

If it is outside this cone, it will no longer see what is imaginary, for the simple reason that nothing from the cone of emission will happen to strike it. It will see things in their real state, entirely naked, that is to say, inside the mechanism, a sad, empty pot, or some lonesome flowers, depending on the case.

You might say – We aren't an eye, what is this eye which wanders around?

The box represents your own body, the bouquet, instincts and desires, the objects of desire which rove about. And the cauldron, what's that? That could well be the cortex. Why not? It would be fun – we'll discuss that some other day.

In the middle of this, your eye doesn't rove about, it is fixed there, like a titillating little appendage of the cortex. So, why am I telling you that it roves around and that, according to its position, sometimes it works, sometimes it doesn't?

The eye is here, as so often, symbolic of the subject.

The whole of science is based on reducing the subject to an eye, and that is why it is projected in front of you, that is to say objectivated – I'll explain that to you another time. In relation to the theory of the instincts, some time back someone proposed a very beautiful construction, the most paradoxical that I have ever heard professed, which entified the instincts. At the end, not a single one was left standing, and it was, just on this account, useful to undertake this demonstration. In order to reduce us for a moment to being only an eye, we had to put ourselves in the shoes of the scientist who can decree that he is just an eye, and can put a notice on the door – Do not disturb the experimenter. In life, things are entirely different, because we aren't an eye. So, this eye, what does it mean?

It means that, in the relation of the imaginary and the real, and in the constitution of the world such as results from it, everything depends on the position of the subject. And the position of the subject – you should know, I've been repeating it for long enough – is essentially characterised by its place in the symbolic world, in other words in the world of speech. Whether he has the right to, or is prohibited from, calling himself Pedro hangs on this place. Depending on what is the case, he is within the field of the cone or he isn't.

That is what you have to get into your heads, even if it seems a bit much, to understand what follows.

We must accept Melanie Klein's text for what it is, namely the write-up of an experiment.

Here's a boy, who, we are told, is about four years old, whose general level of development is between fifteen and eighteen months. That is a question of definition, and you never know what is meant. What is the instrument of measurement? Specification is often omitted. An affective development of fifteen to eighteen months, this notion remains even more fuzzy than the image of a flower in the experiment I just set up for you.

The child possesses a very limited vocabulary, more than just limited in fact, incorrect. He deforms words and uses them inopportunely most of the time, whereas at other times it is clear that he knows their meaning. Melanie Klein insists on the most striking fact – this child has no desire to make himself understood, he doesn't try to communicate, his only activities, more or less playful, are emitting sounds and taking pleasure in meaningless sounds, in noises.

Even so, this child possesses something of language – otherwise Melanie Klein could not make herself understood by him. He has some of the elements of the symbolic apparatus at his disposal. On the other hand, Melanie Klein, from this first, so crucial, contact with the child on, characterises his attitude as one of apathy, indifference. He is nonetheless not lacking in direction. He does not give the impression of being an idiot, far from it. Melanie Klein distinguishes him from all the neurotic children she had previously seen by observing that he gave no sign of anxiety, even in the disguised forms which it assumes in neurotics, either explosion or else withdrawal, stiffness, timidity. It could not escape the notice of this therapist, with all her experience. There he is, this child, as if nothing was going on. He looks at Melanie Klein as he would look at a piece of furniture.

I am underlining these aspects because I want to highlight the uniform character of reality for him. Everything is equally real for him, equally indifferent.

This is where Mlle Gélinier's quandaries begin.

The child's world, Melanie Klein tells us, is manufactured out of a container – this would be the body of the mother – and out of the contents of the body of this mother.[3] In the course of the development of his instinctual relations with this privileged object, the mother, the child is led into instigating a series of relations of imaginary incorporations. He can bite, absorb the body of his mother. The style of this incorporation is one of destruction.

In this maternal body, the child expects to encounter a certain number of objects, themselves possessing a specific unity, though objects which may be dangerous for him are included amongst them. Why dangerous? For exactly the same reason whereby he is dangerous for them. Mirroring them, as one might well say, he clothes them with the same capacities for destruction as those of which he feels himself the bearer. It is in virtue of this that he will come to accentuate their exteriority in relation to the initial limitations of his ego, and reject them like bad, dangerous objects, poo-poo.

[3] The term Lacan uses is 'contenu', which covers both the English 'contents' (the term Klein uses, see op. cit. p. 232 and particularly p. 221) and 'contained', which is the English term most appropriate for some of the uses to which Lacan is putting the term in this seminar.

Certainly these objects will be externalised, isolated, from this primal universal container, from this primal large whole that is the fantasised image of the mother's body, the entire empire of the primal infantile reality. But they will nevertheless always be endowed with the same maleficent accent which marked his first relations with them. That is why he will reintroject them, and switch his attention to other, less dangerous objects. For example, he will construct what is called the equation faeces-urine. Different objects from the external world, more neutralised, will be set up as the equivalents of these first ones, will be linked up with them through the imaginary – I am underlining it – equation. Hence, the symbolic equation that we rediscover between these objects arises from an alternating mechanism of expulsion and introjection, of projection and absorption, that is to say from an imaginary interplay.

It is specifically this interplay that I am trying to symbolise for you in my schema through the imaginary inclusions of real objects, or inversely, through the capturing of imaginary objects within a real enclosure.

In Dick's case, we see clearly that there is the skeleton of imagination, if I may say, of the external world. It is there ready to surface, but only ready to.

Dick plays with the container and the contained. Already, he has quite naturally entified in several objects, the little train for example, a certain number of tendencies, of persons even – himself as little train, in comparison with his father who is the big train. Moreover, the number of objects of significance is, surprisingly, for him very limited, limited to the minimal signs capable of expressing the inside and the outside, the contained and the container. Hence the dark space is straightaway assimilated to the inside of the mother's body, in which he seeks refuge. What doesn't happen is the free play, the conjunction between the different forms, imaginary and real, of objects.

That is why, when he seeks refuge in the empty, dark inside of the maternal body, there are no objects there, to Mlle Gélinier's great surprise. For one simple reason – in his case, the bouquet and the vase cannot both be there at the same time. That is the key.

Mlle Gélinier's astonishment is based on the fact that, for Melanie Klein, everything takes place on a plane of equal reality – of unreal reality,[4] as she puts it, which, in fact, doesn't facilitate our conceiving the dissociation of different sets[5] of primitive objects. Melanie Klein has neither a theory of the imaginary nor a theory of the ego. It is up to us to introduce these notions, and to understand that, in so far as one part of reality is imagined, the other is real and inversely, in so far as one part is reality, the other becomes imaginary. One can see why, in the beginning, the conjunction of different parts, of sets,[6] can never be accomplished.

[4] English in the original.

Here, we are in the mirror relation.

We call this the plane of projection. But can one designate the correlate of projection? One has to find another word than introjection. As we use it in analysis, the word 'introjection' is not the opposite of projection. It is almost only ever used, you will notice, when it is a question of symbolic introjection. It is always accompanied by a symbolic denomination. Introjection is always the introjection of the speech of the other, which introduces an entirely different dimension from that of projection. Around this distinction you can discriminate between what is a function of the ego and what pertains to the order of the dual relation, and what is a function of the super-ego. It is not for nothing that they are distinguished within analytic theory, nor that it is accepted that the super-ego, the authentic super-ego, is a secondary introjection in relation to the function of the ideal ego.

These are asides. I'll return to the case described by Melanie Klein.

The child is there. He has a certain number of significant registers at his disposition. Melanie Klein – we can follow her at this point – underlines the extreme restrictedness of one of them – the imaginary domain. Normally it is through the possibilities of play in the imaginary transposition that the progressive valorisation of objects comes about, on the plane that we commonly designate as affective, through a diversification, a fanning-out of all the imaginary equations which allow the human being to be the only animal to have at his disposition an almost infinite number of objects – objects marked with the value of a Gestalt in his Umwelt, objects isolated as to their forms. Melanie Klein underlines the poverty of the imaginary world, and, by the same token, the impossibility of this child entering into an effective relation with objects qua structures. An important correlation to grasp.

If we now sum up everything that Melanie Klein describes of this child's attitude, the significant point is simply the following – he makes no call.

The call – this is a notion that I ask you to retain. You are going to say to yourselves – Of course, being Doctor Lacan, he uses this to go on about language again. But the child already has his own system of language, quite sufficient. The proof is that he plays with it. He even makes use of it to play a game of opposition against the adults' attempts to intrude. For example, he behaves in a way which is said in the text to be negativistic.[6] When his mother suggests a name to him, one he is capable of reproducing in a correct manner, he reproduces it in an unintelligible, deformed manner, which cannot be of any use whatever. Here we rediscover the distinction to be drawn between negativism and negation – as M. Hyppolite reminded us, thus demonstrating not only his culture, but also that he has seen patients with his own eyes. As to Dick, he uses language in a strictly negativistic manner.

In consequence, in introducing the call, it isn't language that I am covertly slipping in. I will even go further – not only isn't it language, but it isn't a higher level of language. It is in fact beneath language, if we're talking of levels. You have only to observe a pet to see that a being deprived of language is quite capable of making calls on you, calls to draw your attention to something which, in some sense or other, it lacks. To the human call a further, richer development is reserved, because it takes place precisely in a being who has already reached the level of language.

Let us be schematic.

A certain Karl Bühler put forward a theory of language, which is neither unique, nor the most complete, but in it you'll find something of interest – he differentiates three stages in language. Unfortunately he located them in registers which do not make them very comprehensible.

First of all, the level of the statement as such, which is almost a level of the natural datum. I am at the level of the statement when I say the simplest thing to someone, for example an imperative. It is at this level of the statement that everything concerning the nature of the subject must be placed. An officer, a professor, will not give an order in the same language as a worker or foreman. At the level of the statement, from its style to its very intonation, everything we learn bears on the nature of the subject.

In any imperative, there's another plane, that of the call. It is a question of the tone in which the imperative is uttered. The same text can have completely different imports depending on the tone. The simple statement stop can have, depending on the circumstances, completely different imports as a call.

The third level is communication properly speaking – what is at issue, and its reference to the totality of the situation.

With Dick we are at the level of the call. The call acquires its weight within the already acquired system of language. Now, what is crucial here is that this child does not voice any call. The system whereby the subject comes to locate himself in language is interrupted, at the level of speech. Language and speech are not the same thing – this child is, up to a certain point, a master of language, but he doesn't speak. There is a subject here who quite literally does not reply.

Speech has not come to him. Language didn't stick to his imaginary system, whose register is extremely limited – valorisation of trains, of door-handles, of the dark. His faculties, not of communication, but of expression, are limited to that. For him, the real and the imaginary are equivalent.

Hence Melanie Klein here has to give up on technique. She has the minimum of material. She doesn't even have games – this child does not play. When he picks up a little train for a while, he doesn't play, he does it in the same way he moves through the air – as if he were an invisible being, or rather as if everything were, in a specific manner, invisible to him.

Melanie Klein here doesn't, as she is vividly aware, offer an interpretation. She starts off, she says, from ideas she already has, which are well known, as to what happens at this stage. I won't beat about the bush, I just tell him – Dick little train, big train daddy-train.

Thereupon, the child starts to play with his little train, and he says the word, station.[7] Crucial moment, when the sticking of language to the subject's imaginary begins to sketch itself.

Melanie Klein plays this back to him – The station is mummy. Dick is going into mummy. From this point on, everything starts firing. She'll only feed him these kinds of lines, and no others. And very quickly the child makes progress. That's a fact.

So what did Melanie Klein actually do? – nothing other than to bring in verbalisation. She symbolised an effective relationship, that of one named being with another. She plastered on the symbolisation of the Oedipal myth, to give it its real name. It's from that point on that, after an initial ceremony, taking refuge in the dark in order to renew contact with the container, something new awakens in the child.

The child verbalises a first call – a spoken call. He asks for his nurse, with whom he came in and who he had allowed to leave as if it were nothing to him. For the first time, he reacts by calling, which is not simply an affective call, mimed by the whole being, but a verbalised call, which from then on includes a reply. This is his first communication in the strict, technical sense of the term.

Things then progress to the point where Melanie Klein brings into play all the other elements of a situation which is from then organised, right up to and including the father himself, who comes to take his own part. Outside of the sessions, Melanie Klein says, the child's relations unfold on the plane of the Oedipus complex. The child symbolises the reality around him starting from this nucleus, this little palpitating cell of symbolism which Melanie Klein gave him.

That is what she later calls – gaining access to his unconscious.[8]

What did Melanie Klein ever do, which would reveal the least comprehension of any kind of process, which might, in the subject, amount to his unconscious? She accepts it from the start, out of habit. Do all read the case again and you will see in it the spectacular demonstration of the formula that I am always giving you – the unconscious is the discourse of the other.

Here is a case where it is absolutely apparent. There is nothing remotely like an unconscious in the subject. It is Melanie Klein's discourse which brutally grafts the primary symbolisations of the Oedipal situation on to the initial ego-related [moïque] inertia of the child. Melanie Klein always does that with her subjects, more or less implicitly, more or less arbitrarily.

In the extreme case, in the case of the subject who hasn't acceded to human reality, since no call can be heard from him, what are the effects of the symbolisations introduced by the therapist? They specify an initial position from which the subject can introduce an interplay between the imaginary and the real and master his development. He is swallowed up in a series of equivalences, in a system in which objects are substituted one for the other. He runs through an entire sequence of equations which drive him out of the space between the doors where he had gone to seek refuge in the absolute darkness of the total container, to those objects which he substitutes for it – the wash-basin, for example. In this way he unfolds and articulates his entire world. And then, from the wash-basin, he moves on to an electric radiator, on to objects which are more and more complex. He accedes to richer and richer contents [contenus], such as to the possibility of defining the contained [contenu] and the non-contained [non-contenu].

Why speak in this case of the development of the ego? That's to confuse, as always, the ego and the subject.

Development only takes place in so far as the subject integrates himself into the symbolic system, acts within it, asserts himself in it through the use of genuine speech. It isn't even essential, you should note, that this speech be his own. In the couple that is temporarily constituted in what is, however, its least affectivated form, between the therapist and the subject, genuine speech can be brought forth. To be sure, not any old speech – that's where we perceive the virtue of the symbolic situation of the Oedipus complex.

It really is the key – a very elementary key. I have already pointed out to you that there most probably was a whole bunch of keys. One day perhaps I will give you a lecture on what we gain in this respect from the myths of primitive peoples – I wouldn't say inferior, because they aren't inferior, they know much more than we do. When we study a mythology, for example one that might perhaps appear with respect to a Sudanese population, we discover that for them the Oedipus complex is just a rather thin joke. It is a very tiny detail within an immense myth. The myth allows the cataloguing of a set of relations between subjects of a wealth and complexity besides which the Oedipus complex seems only to be so abridged an edition that in the end it cannot always be used.

But no matter. Us analysts have been satisfied with it up to now. Certainly, one does try to elaborate it a bit, but it is all rather timid. One always feels terribly tangled up because one doesn't distinguish easily between the imaginary, symbolic and real.

Now I want to bring the following to your attention. When Melanie Klein offers him the Oedipal schema, the imaginary relation which the subject lives, though extremely impoverished, is already complex enough for us to say that he has a world of his own. But for us this primitive real is literally ineffable. As long as he doesn't tell us anything about it, we have no means of gaining access to it, except through symbolic extrapolations which constitute the ambiguity of all systems such as Melanie Klein's – she tells us, for instance, that within the empire of the maternal body, the subject is to be found with all his brothers, not to mention the father's penis, etc. Really?

It doesn't matter, since we can thus grasp in any case how this world is set in motion, how the imaginary and real begin to be structured, how the successive investments develop, investments which delineate the variety of human, that is nameable, objects. All of this process has its point of departure in this initial fresco constituted by a significative speech, formulating a fundamental structure which, in the law of speech, humanises man.

How can I put this in yet another way? Ask yourselves what the call represents in the field of speech. Well, it's the possibility of refusal. I say the possibility. The call doesn't imply refusal, it doesn't imply any dichotomy, any bipartition. But you can see for yourselves that it is when the call is made that dependency relations establish themselves in the subject. From then on he will welcome his nurse with open arms, and in deliberately hiding himself behind the door, he will all at once reveal in relation to Melanie Klein the need to have a companion in this cramped corner which he occupied for a while. Dependency will come in its train.

In this observation, then, you see, quite independently, the set of pre-verbal and post-verbal relations at play in the child. And you realise that the external world – what we call the real world, which is only a humanised, symbolised world, the work of transcendence introduced by the symbol into the primitive reality – can only be constituted when a series of encounters have occurred in the right place.

These positions belong to the same order as those which, in my schema, cause a given structuration of the situation to depend upon a given position of the eye. I will make further use of this schema. For today I only wanted to introduce a bouquet, but one can introduce the other.

Starting from Dick's case and by employing the categories of the real, the symbolic and the imaginary, I showed you how it can happen that a subject who has all the elements of language at his disposition, and who has the possibility of making several imaginary moves that allow him to structure his world, might not be in the real. Why isn't he in it? – simply because things didn't happen in a specific order. The figure is in its entirety upset. No way of giving this entirety any development whatsoever.

Are we dealing with the development of the ego here? Look at Melanie Klein's text again. She says that the ego had developed in too precocious a manner, in such a way that the child has too real a relation to reality, because the imaginary could find no place there – and then, in the second part of her sentence, she says that it is the ego which halts development. This simply means that the ego cannot be fruitfully employed as an apparatus in the structuring of this external world. For one simple reason – because of the poor position of the eye, the ego quite simply doesn't appear.

Let the vase be virtual. The vase doesn't appear, and the subject remains in a reduced reality, with a similarly reduced imaginary baggage.

The core of this observation, which is what you must understand – the virtue of speech, in so far as the act of speech is a mode of functioning coordinated to a symbolic system that is already established, typical and significant.

It would be worth your while to ponder the questions, to reread the text, also to get the feel of this little schema so that you could see for yourselves what use you could put it to.

What I've given you today is a theoretical discussion in complete contrast with the set of problems raised last time by Mlle Gélinier. The title of the next session, which will take place in two weeks time, will be – The transference – the different levels on which it should be studied.

The wolf! The wolf!

THE CASE OF ROBERT
THEORY OF THE SUPER-EGO
THE CORE OF SPEECH

In the course of our dialogue, you have been able to get acquainted with the ambition which rules our commentary, namely that of reconsidering the fundamental texts of the analytic experience. The moving spirit of our excavation is the following idea – whatever in an experience is always best seen is at some remove. So it is not surprising that it should be here and now that we are led, in order to understand the analytic experience, to begin again with what is implied by its most immediate given, namely the symbolic function, or what in our vocabulary is exactly the same thing – the function of speech.

We rediscover this, the central domain of analytic experience, signalled throughout Freud's oeuvre, never named, but signalled at every step. I don't think I am pushing it when I say that that is what can be immediately translated, almost algebraically, from any Freudian text. And this translation yields the solution of a number of antinomies which become apparent in Freud with that honesty which ensures that any given one of his texts is never closed, as if the whole of the system were in it.

For the next session, I would very much like someone to undertake to give a commentary on a text which exemplifies what I've just been saying. This text is to be found between 'Remembering, repeating and working-through' and 'Observations on transference-love', which are two of the most important texts in the collection of Papers on Technique. I am referring to 'On narcissism: an introduction'.

It is a text that we cannot but bring into our course, as soon as we have touched on the situation of the analytic dialogue. You will agree with that, if you know the further implications of these terms, situation and dialogue – dialogue in inverted commas.

We tried to define resistance within its own field. Then, we formulated a definition of transference. Now, you will be well aware of the great distance which separates – resistance, which keeps the subject from this full speech which analysis awaits from him, and which is a function of that anxiogenic inflection constituted, in its most radical mode, at the level of symbolic exchange, by the transference – from this phenomenon which we handle in a technical manner in analysis and which seems to us to be the driving force,[1] as Freud put it, of the transference, namely love.

In 'Observations on transference-love', Freud did not hesitate to call the transference by the name, love. Freud is so little concerned to evade the phenomenon of love, of passionate love, in its most concrete sense, that he goes so far as to say that there is no really essential distinction between transference and what, in everyday life, we call love. The structure of this artificial phenomenon which is transference and that of the spontaneous phenomenon we call love, and more specifically passionate love, are, on the plane of the psychic, equivalent.

On Freud's part, there is no evading this phenomenon, no attempt to dissolve the scabrous into something symbolic, in the sense in which it is usually understood – the illusory, the unreal. Transference – is love.

Our inquiries are now going to centre on transference-love, to wind up our study of the Papers on Technique. This will take us to the heart of that other notion, which I am trying to bring in here, without which, what is more, it is not possible to arrive at a judicious apportioning of what we deal with in our experience – the function of the imaginary.

Don't get the idea that this function of the imaginary is absent from Freud's texts. It is no more so than the symbolic function. Freud quite simply didn't place it in the foreground, and didn't call attention to it everywhere it can be found. When we come to study 'On narcissism', you will see that Freud himself, in order to specify the difference between dementia praecox, schizophrenia, psychosis, on the one hand, and neurosis on the other, comes up with no other definition than the following, which may perhaps seem surprising to some of you. A patient suffering from hysteria or obsessional neurosis has also, as far as his illness extends, given up his relation to reality. But analysis shows that he has by no means broken off his erotic relations to people and things. He still retains them in phantasy; i.e. he has, on the one hand, substituted for real objects imaginary ones from his memory, or has mixed the latter with the former; – remember our schema from last time – and on the other hand, he has renounced the initiation of motor activities for the attainment of his aims in connection with those objects. Only to this condition of the libido may we legitimately apply the term 'introversion' of the libido which is used by Jung indiscriminately. It is otherwise with the paraphrenic. He seems really to have withdrawn his libido from people and things in the external world, without replacing them by others in phantasy. This simply means that he recreates this imaginative world . . . When he does so replace them, the process seems to be a secondary one and to be part of an attempt at recovery, designed to lead the libido back to objects.[2]

[2] (1914c) GW X 139; Stud III 42; SE XIV 74.

Here we come to what is the essential distinction to be drawn between neurosis and psychosis, as to the functioning of the imaginary, a distinction which Schreber's analysis, which, I hope, we will be able to start before the end of the year, will enable us to consider in greater depth.

For today, I will yield the floor to Rosine Lefort, my student, here on my right, who, as I heard yesterday evening, presented her observations on a child, whom she had spoken of with me for a long time, to our sub-group dealing with the psychoanalysis of children. It is one of those serious cases which leave us with a great feeling of unease as to the diagnosis, and in a considerable quandary as to the nosology. But at all events, Rosine Lefort was able to penetrate deeply, as you will be able to see for yourselves.

Just as we started off, two lectures ago, with Melanie Klein's observation, today I yield the floor to Rosine Lefort. She will open up, in so far as time permits, questions to which I will provide answers which may well be included next time in my discussion entitled 'Transference in the imaginary'.

Dear Rosine, tell us about the case of Robert.

THE CASE OF ROBERT

MME LEFORT: Robert was born on 4 March 1948. His past history has been reconstituted with some difficulty, and it is in large part owing to the material brought up in sessions that it has been possible to learn of the traumas he suffered.

His father is not known. His mother is presently confined as a paranoiac. She kept him with her up to the age of five months, moving from house to house. She neglected his essential needs, to the point of forgetting to feed him. She had to be continually reminded to care for her child: washing, dressing, feeding. We have established that this child was so neglected as to suffer from hunger. He had to be hospitalised at the age of five months in an acute state of hypertrophy and wasting.

Scarcely had he been hospitalised when he suffered a bilateral otitis which necessitated a double mastoidectomy. He was then sent to Paul Parquet,[3] whose strict prophylactic practice is well known. There, he was isolated, and fed on a drip on account of his anorexia. He came out at nine months, and was returned almost by force to his mother. Nothing is known of the two months he then spent with her. We pick up his scent again after his hospitalisation at eleven months, when he was again in a state of acute wasting. He was definitively and legally abandoned five months later without having seen his mother again.

From that time up to the age of three years and nine months, this child underwent changes of residence twenty-five times, passing through institutions for children or hospitals, without ever being placed in a foster home, properly speaking. These hospitalisations were made necessary by childhood illnesses, by an adenoidectomy, by the neurological, ventriculographic, electro-encephalographic examinations he was given – result: normal. Health and medical evaluations were made indicating profound somatic disturbances, and then, the somatic ones having been improved upon, psychological deterioration. The last evaluation, at Denfert, when Robert was three and a half, suggested that he be confined, which could only have been definitive, on account of an unclearly defined para-psychotic state. Gesell's test gave an I.Q. of 43.

So he arrived, at the age of three and a half, at the institution, the unit at the Denfert repository, where I undertook his treatment. At that time, he was in the following condition.

From the point of view of height and weight, he was in very good shape, except for a chronic bilateral otorrhea. From the standpoint of motor activity, he had a swinging gait, extreme lack of coordination in his movements, a constant hyperagitation. From the point of view of language, complete absence of coordinated speech, frequent screams, guttural and discordant laughter. He yelled the only two words he knew – Miss! and wolf! This word, wolf!, he repeated throughout the day, so I nicknamed him the wolf-child, because that really was the image he had of himself.

From the point of view of his behaviour, he was hyperactive, continually prey to jerky and disorderly movements, without aim. Unorganised prehensive activity – he would throw his arm out to take hold of an object and if he didn't reach it, he couldn't correct it, and had to start the movement all over again from the beginning. A variety of sleeping problems. With this permanent condition as a background, he experienced convulsive fits of agitation, without any true convulsions, with reddening of the face, piercing howls, during each of the routine moments of his daily life – the pot, and above all the emptying of the pot, undressing, feeding, open doors, which he couldn't stand, likewise darkness, other children's yelling, and as we will see, moving rooms.

Less often, he had crises of a diametrically opposed sort, in which he was completely prostrate, staring aimlessly, like a depressive.

With an adult, he was hyperagitated, undifferentiated, without any true contact. Children he appeared to ignore, but when one of them screamed or cried, he went into a convulsive fit. In these moments of crisis, he became dangerous, he became strong, he throttled other children, and he had to be kept isolated during the night and at meals. At those times he betrayed neither a hint of anxiety, nor any emotion.

We didn't really know what category to put him in. But we tried to treat him nonetheless, though we did ask ourselves if anything would come of it.

I am going to tell you about the first year of treatment, which was then discontinued for a year. There were several phases in the treatment.

During the preliminary phase, he retained his everyday behaviour. Guttural screams. He would arrive in the room running without stopping, howling, jumping in the air and crouching down, putting his head between his hands, opening and closing the door, switching the light on and off. With objects, he would either take them up or hurl them aside, or pile them on top of me. Very marked prognathism.

The only thing I could extract from these first few sessions was that he did not dare go near the feeding-bottle containing milk, or coming somewhat closer to it would blow on it. I also noted an interest in the wash-basin which, when full of water, seemed to spark off a real panic attack.

At the end of this preliminary phase, after one session, after having piled everything on top of me while in a very agitated state, he bolted and I heard him at the top of the staircase, which he didn't know how to go down by himself, saying in a pathetic voice, in a very low tone, for him unusual, Mummy, looking into the emptiness.

This preliminary phase came to an end outside the treatment. One evening, after going to bed, he tried to cut off his penis with a pair of plastic scissors, while standing on his bed in front of the other terrified children.

In the second part of the treatment, he started to reveal what Wolf! meant to him. He would scream it all the time.

He started, one day, by trying to strangle a little girl whom I had in treatment. They had to be separated and he was put in another room. He had a violent reaction, and was intensely disturbed. I had to come and bring him back into the room where he normally lived. As soon as he was there, he howled – Wolf!, and started to throw everything across the room – it was the dining-hall – food and plates. In the days that followed, each time that he passed by the room where he had been put, he howled – Wolf!

This also clarifies his behaviour towards doors, which he couldn't stand being left open, he spent the time of the session in opening them so as to make me close them again and howling – Wolf!

At this point we should recall his history – the shifting from place to place, the rooms, were for him a destruction, since he had never stopped changing places, nor adults. It had become a real principle of destruction for him, one which had intensely marked the primitive manifestations of his activity of ingestion and excretion. He expressed it mainly in two scenes, one with the feeding-bottle and the other with the pot.

He had at long last taken to the bottle. One day, he went to open the door, and held out the feeding-bottle to an imaginary person – whenever he was alone in a room with an adult, he carried on behaving as if there were other children around him. He held out the bottle. He came back tearing off the teat, he made me put it back on, held the bottle outside again, left the door open, turned his back on me, drank two gulps of milk, and, facing me, tore off the teat, threw back his head, covered himself in milk and spilt the rest over me. And, seized with panic he fled, unconscious and blind. I had to pick him up from the staircase which he'd started to roll down. At that moment I had the impression that he had swallowed the destruction and that the open door and the milk were linked.

The scene with the pot which followed was marked by the same destructive character. At the beginning of the treatment, he felt obliged to do his business in the session, thinking that if he gave me something, he would keep me. He could only do it pressed against me, sitting on the pot, holding my apron in one hand, and the bottle or a pencil in the other. He would eat before, and especially after. Not milk but sweets and cakes.

The emotional intensity betrayed great fear. The most recent of these scenes clarified the relation for him between defecation and destruction through changes.

In the course of this session, he had started to do his business, seated beside me. Then with his pooh beside him, he leafed through the pages of a book, turning the pages. Then he heard a noise from outside. Crazed with fear, he went out, took his pot, and set it down in front of the door of the person who had just gone into the room next door. Then he returned into the room where I was, and flattened himself against the door, howling – Wolf! Wolf!

I had the impression it was a propitiatory rite. He was incapable of giving this pooh to me. To some extent he knew that I didn't exact it from him. He went to put it outside, knowing full well that it would be thrown out, hence destroyed. So I interpreted his rite for him. Straightaway, he went to look for the pot, put it back in the room beside me, hid it with a piece of paper, saying, 'have no more, have no more',[4] so as not to be obliged to give it.

Then he started to be aggressive towards me, as if giving him permission to take possession of himself through this pooh which he had at his disposal. I had given him the possibility of being aggressive. Clearly, not being able to own, up until then, he didn't have a sense of aggressivity, but only of auto-destruction, specifically when he attacked the other children.

From that day on, he no longer felt obliged to do his business in the session. He used symbolic substitutes, sand. He was acutely confused as to his own self, the contents of his body, objects, children, and the adults who surrounded him. His state of anxiety, of agitation, became more and more acute. For the rest of the time he was becoming unbearable. I would actually witness truly hectic sessions in which I had considerable difficulty intervening.

That day, after having drunk a little milk, he spilt it on the floor, then threw sand into the wash-basin, filled the feeding-bottle with sand and water, peed in the pot, put sand in it. Then he shovelled up milk mixed with sand and water, added the lot to the pot, and placed the india-rubber baby and the bottle on top of it, and entrusted the whole of it to me.

Then, he went to open the door, and came back with fear written all over his face. He again took up the bottle which was in the pot and broke it, working feverishly on it until he had reduced it to little pieces. He then gathered them all carefully together, and buried them into the sand in the pot. He was in such a state that I had to take him down, feeling that I couldn't do anything for him any more. He brought the pot along.

[4] 'a pu, a pu'.

A bit of sand fell on the ground, unleashing unbelievable panic in him. He had to gather up every last bit of sand, as if it was a piece of himself, and he howled – Wolf! Wolf!

He couldn't stand being put in the group, he couldn't stand any child coming close to his pot. He had to be put to bed in a state of extreme tension, which, in a spectacular manner, was only relieved by a diarrhetic debacle, which he spread everywhere in his bed and on the walls, with his hands.

The whole of this scene was so pathetic, lived through with such anxiety, that I was very worried, and I started to get a sense of the idea he had of himself.

He gave it greater precision the next day, when I had to frustrate him – he ran to the window, opened it and cried out – Wolf! Wolf!, and, seeing his own image in the glass, he hit it, crying out – Wolf! Wolf!

That is the way Robert represented himself, he was the Wolf! It was his own image that he hit or that he evoked with such intensity. This pot into which he placed what comes into him and what comes out, the pee and the pooh, then a human image, the doll, then the pieces of the bottle, it really was an image of himself, akin to that of the wolf, as the panic generated when a bit of sand fell on the floor testified. In sequence and at the same time, he was all the elements that he put into the pot. He was just the series of objects through which he came into contact with daily life, symbols of the contents of his body. The sand is the symbol of faeces, the water that of urine, the milk that of what enters his body. But the scene with the pot shows that he differentiated very little between these things. For him, all of these contents are united in the same feeling of permanent destruction of his body, which, in opposition to these contents, represents the container, and which he symbolised with the broken bottle, whose pieces were buried under these destructive contents.

In the following phase, he exorcised the Wolf! I say exorcise because this child gave me the impression of being possessed. Thanks to my permanent presence, he was able to exorcise, with a little of the milk he had drunk, the scenes from daily life which did him such harm.

At that point, my interpretations above all tended to differentiate the contents of his body from the affective point of view. The milk is what one receives. Pooh is what one gives, and its value depends on the milk one has received. Pee is aggressive.

Many sessions went on in this way. Just when he was peeing in the pot, he would inform me – Not pooh, it's pee. He was sorry. I reassured him in telling him that he received too little to be able to give something without destroying him. That reassured him. He could then go and empty the pot in the toilet.

The emptying of the pot was surrounded with many protective rites. He started by emptying the urine into the sink in the toilet while letting the tap run so as to be able to replace the urine with water. He filled the pot, letting it amply overflow, as if a container only had an existence through its content and also had to overflow so as to contain it in its turn. There we have a syncretistic vision of being in time, as container and contained, exactly like an intra-uterine existence.

Here he rediscovered this confused image that he had of himself. He emptied the pee, while trying to catch it again, convinced that it was he who was leaving. He howled – Wolf!, and the pot only had a reality for him when full. My whole concern was to show him the reality of the pot, which was still there after having been emptied of his pee; just as he, Robert, was still there after having peed, and the tap wasn't washed away by the water which ran from it.

*On account of these interpretations and my continued presence, Robert progressively introduced a delay between emptying and filling, until the day when he was able to return, triumphantly carrying an empty pot in his arms. He had quite clearly acquired the idea of the permanence of his body. His clothes were for him his container, and when he was stripped of them, it was certain death. The business of undressing was for him the occasion for genuine crises, the most recent one having lasted three hours, during which the staff described him as possessed. He howled –*Wolf!, running from one bedroom to the next, smearing the other children with faeces that he found in the pots. It was only once he was tied up that he calmed down.

The next day, he came to the session, started to undress in an extreme state of anxiety, and, completely naked, climbed into the bed. It took three sessions before he was able to drink a little milk, completely naked in the bed. He pointed to the window and the door, and hit his image while howling – Wolf!

In parallel, in daily life, undressing was easy, but was followed by a deep depression. He started to sob without reason each evening, seeking comfort from the ward-sister downstairs, going to sleep in her arms.

At the end of this phase, he had exorcised with me the emptying of the pot, as well as the undressing scene, through my continuing presence, which had turned milk into a constructive element. But, driven by the necessity of building up a minimum, he hadn't touched on the past, he only counted on the present of everyday life, as if he were deprived of memory.

In the next phase, it was I who became the Wolf!

He made use of the little bit of construction he had succeeded in accomplishing to project on to me all the badness he had drunk, and, in some way, to rediscover his memory. He was thus progressively able to become aggressive. This was to turn tragic. Driven by the past, he had to be aggressive towards me, and yet, at the same time, in the present I was the one he needed. I had to reassure him by my interpretations, speak to him about the past which was forcing him to be aggressive, and assure him that it wouldn't cause me to disappear, nor shift him from where he was, something he always took as a punishment.

When he had been aggressive towards me, he would try to destroy himself. He would represent himself by the bottle, and would try to break it. I would take it out of his hands, because he wasn't in a fit state to cope with breaking it. He would then take up the thread of the session, and his aggressivity towards me continued.

At that point, he made me play the role of his starving mother. He forced me to sit on a chair on which a mug of milk was sat, so that I would knock it over, thus depriving him of his good food. Then he started howling – Wolf!, took the cot and wash-tub and threw them out of the window. He turned against me, and, with great violence made me swallow dirty water while howling – Wolf! Wolf! Here this feeding-bottle stood for bad food, and was a throwback to his separation from his mother, who had deprived him of food, and to all the changes which he was made to suffer.

In parallel, he conferred another aspect of the bad mother on me, the role of the one who leaves. One evening, he saw me leaving the institution. The next day, he reacted, even though he had seen me leave on other occasions without being capable of expressing the emotion that he must have felt. That day, he peed on me whilst in a highly aggressive, and also anxious, state.

This scene was only the prologue to a final scene, which resulted in my being definitively burdened with all the bad things that had happened to him, and in projecting on to me the Wolf!

So, because I used to leave, I was made to swallow the bottle of dirty water and was on the receiving end of the aggressive pee. So I was the Wolf! Robert separated himself from it during one session, by shutting me in the toilets, then returned to the room where we had the sessions, all alone, climbed into the empty bed, and started to moan. He could not call me, yet I did have to come back, since I was the permanent person. I came back. Robert was stretched out, pathetic, his thumb now within an inch of his mouth. And, for the first time in a session, he held out his arms to me and let himself be consoled.

From this session on, the institution witnessed a total change in his behaviour. I had the impression that he had exorcised the Wolf!

From this point on, he no longer talked about it, and could move on to the next phase – intra-uterine regression, that is to say the construction of his body, of the body-ego,[5] which he hadn't been able to do up till then.

To use the dialectic that he himself had always used, that of the contained-container, Robert was obliged, in order to construct himself, to be my content, but had to make sure of his possession of me, that is to say of his future container.

He started this period by using a bucket full of water, the handle of which was made of rope. He absolutely could not stand this rope being attached to the two ends. It had to hang on one side. I had been struck by the fact that when I had had to tie the rope up again for carrying the bucket, he had experienced pain that seemed almost physical. One day, he put the bucket full of water between his legs, took the rope and brought its end up to his navel. I then had the impression that the bucket was me, and he was attaching himself to me with an umbilical cord. Then, he overturned the contents of the bucket of water, took all his clothes off, and then lay down in the water, in a foetal position, curled up, stretching himself out from time to time, and going so far as opening and closing his mouth on the liquid, just as a foetus drinks the amniotic fluid.

as the most recent American experiments have shown. I had the impression that this was how he was constructing himself.

Exceedingly agitated at the beginning, he became aware of a certain reality of pleasure, and everything came to a climax in two key scenes, enacted in an extraordinarily collected manner, and with an astonishing completeness, given his age and his general condition.

In the first of these scenes, Robert, completely naked and facing me, collected up the water in his cupped hands, raised it to the level of his shoulders and let it run the length of his body. He started afresh like this several times, and then he said to me, softly – Robert, Robert.

This baptism in water – because it was a baptism, given the collected manner in which he accomplished it – was followed by a baptism in milk.

He started by playing in the water with more pleasure than contemplativeness. Then, he took his glass of milk and drank it. Then he put the teat back on and started running the milk from the feeding-bottle the length of his body. As it didn't flow fast enough, he took the teat off, and started afresh, making milk run over his chest, his stomach and along his penis with an intense feeling of pleasure. Then he turned towards me, showed me this penis, taking it in his hand, with an air of complete rapture. Then he drank some milk, thus putting some both inside and outside him, in such a way that the content was both contained and container at once, rediscovering the same scene that he had enacted with the water.

In the subsequent phases, he moved on to the stage of oral construction.

This stage is extremely difficult, very complex. First of all, he was four years old and he was living through the most primitive of the stages. What is more, the other children that I then had in treatment in this institution were girls, which created a problem for him. Finally Robert's patterns[6] of behaviour had not entirely disappeared and had a tendency to return whenever he encountered frustration.

After his baptism by water and milk, Robert started to experience the symbiosis which characterises the primitive mother-child relationship. But when the child actually lives through it, there is normally no problem of sexuality, at least in the direction, new-born to the mother. Whereas here, there was one.

Robert had to set up a symbiosis with a feminine mother, which thus presented him with the problem of castration. The problem was to get him to accept food without this entailing his castration.

At first he experienced this symbiosis in a simple form. Seated on my knees, he ate. Then, he took my ring and my watch and put them on, or he took a pencil from my smock and broke it with his teeth. Then I interpreted it for him. This identification with a castrating phallic mother remained from then on within the plane of the past, and was accompanied by a reactional aggressivity whose motivations changed over time. He now only broke the lead of his pencil to punish himself for this aggressivity.

After that, he could drink milk from the bottle, resting in my arms, but it was he who held the bottle. It was only later that he could cope with my holding the bottle, as if the whole of the past forbade him from taking into him, from me, the contents of so essential an object.

His desire for symbiosis was still in conflict with his past. That's why he opted for the expedient of giving himself the bottle. But as he acquired the experience, by means of other foods, such as pap and cakes, that the food he received from me in the course of this symbiosis didn't make him into a girl, he could then accept it from me.

He first tried to differentiate himself from me by sharing with me. He gave me everything to eat, saying, while touching himself – Robert, then touching me – Not Robert. I made great use of this in my interpretations to help him differentiate himself. The situation then ceased being only between him and me, and he brought in the little girls who I had in treatment.

It was a castration problem, since he knew that a little girl came up for sessions with me before him and after him. So the logic of emotions required that he turn himself into a girl, since it was a girl who broke the symbiosis he needed with me. The situation was one of conflict. He played it out in different ways, peeing seated on the pot, or else doing it standing up, while showing himself to be aggressive.

Robert was now capable of receiving, and capable of giving. He gave me his pooh without fear of being castrated by this gift.

So we had got to a stage in the treatment that can be summarised as follows – the contents of his body are no longer destructive, bad, Robert is capable of expressing his aggressivity in peeing standing up, without the existence and integrity of the container, that is to say his body, being put into question.

The Gesell IQ had changed from 43 to 80, and on the Terman-Merill, he had an IQ of 75. The clinical picture had changed, his motor difficulties had disappeared, as well as the prognathism. With the other children, he had become friendly and often protective of the smaller ones. One could start to integrate him into the group activities. Only his language remained rudimentary, Robert never put together sentences, he only used key words.

Then I left on holiday. I was away for two months.

On my return, he made a scene which showed the coexistence in him both of patterns[7] from the past and of the present construction.

While I was away, his behaviour had remained as it had been – what the separation meant to him, his fear of losing me, was expressed in the old way, but in a very rich fashion, on account of what he had since acquired.

When I returned, he emptied out, as if to destroy them, the milk, his pee, his pooh, then took off his smock and threw it in the water. He thus destroyed his old contents and his old container, rediscovered through the trauma of my absence.

The next day, overwhelmed by his psychological reaction, Robert expressed himself on the somatic plane – profuse diarrhoea, vomiting, fainting. He emptied himself completely of his past image. Only my continuous presence could make the connection with a new image of himself – like a new birth.

At that moment, he acquired a new image of himself. We saw him re-enacting in the session ancient traumas we knew nothing of. Robert drank from the bottle, put the teat in his ear, and then broke the bottle, in a condition of acute violence.

Now, he could do it without the integrity of his own body suffering from it. He separated himself from the symbol of the bottle, and could express himself through the bottle qua object. This session was so striking – he repeated it twice – that I made inquiries about what happened when he had had the antrotomy at the age of five months. We then learned that in the E.N.T. ward where he had been operated upon, he had not been given an anaesthetic, and that throughout the painful operation a bottle of sweetened water had been kept forced in his mouth.

This traumatic episode clarified the image that Robert had constructed of a starving, paranoiac, dangerous mother, who certainly attacked him. Then the separation, a bottle held by force, making him swallow his cries. The force-feedings with the tube, twenty-five moves in succession. I had the impression it was Robert's tragedy that all his oral-sadistic fantasies had been realised in the actual events of his life. His fantasies had become reality.

Lately, I have had to confront him with something real. I was away for a year, and I returned eight months pregnant. He saw me pregnant. He started playing with fantasies of the destruction of this child.

I disappeared for the birth. While I was away, my husband took him into treatment, and he acted out the destruction of this child. When I returned, he saw me thin, and childless. So he was convinced that his fantasies had become reality, that he had killed the child, and hence that I was going to kill him.

He has been extremely disturbed in the last fortnight, up until the day when he was able to tell me about it. Then and there, I confronted him with reality. I brought him my daughter, in such a way that he would now be able to make the break. His level of agitation subsided instantly, and the next day, when I had him for a session, he started at last to demonstrate some jealousy. He was becoming attached to something living and not to death.

This child had always remained at the staye in which fantasies are realities. That is what explains why his fantasies of intra-uterine form had been reality in the treatment, so that he could perform an astonishing construction. If he had gone past this stage, I wouldn't have been able to have secured this construction of himself.

As I was saying yesterday, I had the impression that this child had sunk under the real, that at the beginning of the treatment there was no symbolic function in him, still less an imaginary function.

But he did have two words.

M. Hyppolite: I want to ask a question about the word Wolf! Where did Wolf! come from?

Mme Lefort: In children's homes, you often see nurses scaring them with the wolf. In the home where I had him in treatment, one day when the children were impossible to deal with, they were shut in the children's garden, and a nurse went outside to howl like a wolf so as to make them be good.

M. Hyppolite: It still has to be explained why fearing the wolf took hold in him, just as with so many other children.

Mme Lefort: The wolf was quite clearly the devouring mother, in part.

M. Hyppolite: Do you think that the wolf is always the devouring mother?

Mme Lefort: In children's stories, the wolf is always about to eat. At the oral-sadistic stage, the child wishes to eat its mother, and thinks that its mother is going to eat it. Its mother becomes the wolf. I think that that is probably its genesis but I'm not sure. In this child's history there are many things of which I am ignorant, which I wasn't able to find out about. When he wanted to be aggressive towards me, he didn't go on all fours, nor did he bark. At the moment he does. Now he knows that he is human, but he needs, from time to time, to identify himself with an animal, just like a child of eighteen months. And when he wants to be aggressive, he gets on all fours, and goes wouh, wouh, without the least anxiety. Then he stands up and carries on with the rest of the session. He can still only express his aggressivity at this stage.

M. Hyppolite: Yes, it's between zwingen and bezwingen.[8] There's a world of difference between the word implying constraint, and the one which doesn't. Constraint, Zwang, is the wolf who creates anxiety in him, and once the anxiety is overcome, Bezwingung, that's when he plays the wolf.

Mme Lefort: Yes, I quite agree.

Naturally the wolf raises all the problems of symbolism: it isn't a function with a limit, since we are forced to search out its origin in a general symbolisation.

Why the wolf? We are not particularly familiar, in this part of the world, with this character. The fact that it is the wolf who is chosen to produce these effects ties us straightaway to a broader function on the mythical, folkloric, religious, primitive plane. The wolf is part of a complete filation, which connects up with secret societies, with everything that implies in the way of initiation, either in the adoption of a totem, or in the identification with a character.

[8] Zwingen and bezwingen are both often roughly translated as 'to overcome, to vanquish'. Zwang is the term most often rendered in English by 'compulsion' (cf. 'Zwangsneurose', 'Zwangsvorstellung' – 'obsessional neurosis', 'obsessional idea').

It is difficult to draw these distinctions in relation to such an elementary phenomenon, but I would like to draw your attention to the difference between the super-ego and the ego-ideal, in the determination of repression.

I don't know if you have realised the following – here we have two conceptions which seem to lead in exactly opposite directions, as soon as one brings them into play, in any kind of dialectic, in order to explain the behaviour of a patient. The super-ego is constraining and the ego-ideal exalting.

These are things that one tends to gloss over, because we move from one term to the other as if the two were synonymous. It is a question which is worth pursuing in relation to the transference relationship. When one looks for the basis of therapeutic action, one says that the subject identifies the analyst with his ego-ideal or on the contrary with his super-ego, and, in the same text one substitutes one for the other in accordance with the unfolding of the demonstration, without really explaining what the difference is.

Certainly I will be led to examine the question of the super-ego. I should say from the start that, if we don't limit ourselves to a blind, mythical usage of this term, this key-word, this idol, the super-ego is essentially located within the symbolic plane of speech, in contrast to the ego-ideal.

The super-ego is an imperative. As is indicated by common sense and by the uses to which it is put, it is consonant with the register and the idea of the law, that is to say with the totality of the system of language, in so far it defines the situation of man as such, that is to say in so far as he is not just a biological individual. On the other hand, one should also emphasise, as a counter to this, its senseless, blind character, of pure imperativeness and simple tyranny. What path will allow us to bring these notions into a synthesis?

The super-ego has a relation to the law, and is at the same time a senseless law, going so far as to become a failure to recognise [méconnaissance] the law. That is always the way we see the super-ego acting in the neurotic. Isn't it because the morality of the neurotic is a senseless, destructive, purely oppressive, almost always anti-legal morality, that it became necessary to elaborate on the function of the super-ego in analysis?

The super-ego is at one and the same time the law and its destruction. As such, it is speech itself, the commandment of law, in so far as nothing more than its root remains. The law is entirely reduced to something, which cannot even be expressed, like the You must, which is speech deprived of all its meaning. It is in this sense that the super-ego ends up by being identified with only what is most devastating, most fascinating, in the primitive experiences of the subject. It ends up being identified with what I call the ferocious figure, with the figures which we can link to primitive traumas the child has suffered, whatever these are.

In this very special case, we see, embodied there, this function of language, we touch on it in its most reduced form, reduced down to a word whose meaning and significance for the child we are not even able to define, but which nonetheless ties him to the community of mankind. As you have quite aptly remarked, this isn't a wolf-child who might have lived in a savage state, but a speaking child, and it is through this Wolf! that you had the possibility, right from the beginning, of establishing a dialogue.

What is remarkable in this case is the moment when, after a scene which you described, the use of the word Wolf! disappeared. It is around this pivot of language, of the relationship to this word, which for Robert is the summary of a law, that the turning-point from the first to the second phase occurs. There then follows this extraordinary elaboration, brought to a close by this touching self-baptism, when he utters his own Christian name. At that point we come close to the fundamental relation, in its most reduced form, of man to language. It is extraordinarily moving.

What questions do you still want to raise?

MME LEFORT: What is the diagnosis?

Well, there are some people who have already taken a stand on this. Lang, I've been told that you had said something on this subject yesterday evening, something which appeared to me to be interesting. I think the diagnosis you made is only analogical. By making a reference to the categories that exist in nosography, you uttered the word. . . .

DR LANG: Hallucinatory delirium.[9] One can always try to look for an analogy between relatively deep disturbances in the behaviour of children and what we are familiar with in adults. And most often we talk about infantile schizophrenia when we don't quite know what is happening. An essential element is lacking here, needed in order to talk of schizophrenia, namely dissociation. There is no dissociation, because there is scarcely any construction. It seemed to me reminiscent of certain forms of organisation of hallucinatory delirium. I had great reservations yesterday evening, because there is a margin between direct observation of the child at this age and what we know from our usual nosography. In this particular case many things would have to be clarified.

Yes. That is how I understood what you had said when it was passed on to me. A hallucinatory delirium, by which you mean a chronic hallucinatory psychosis, has only one thing in common with what is happening in this subject, and that is this dimension, which Mme Lefort subtly highlighted, which is that this child lives only the real. If the word hallucination means something, it is this feeling of reality. In hallucination there is something which the patient truly takes to be real.

[9] The French term is 'délire', notoriously difficult to translate, since it has a wider range than 'delirium'; it has occupied an important place in French psychiatric terminology for well over a century.

You know how much this remains a problem, even in a hallucinatory psychosis. In an adult chronic hallucinatory psychosis, there is a synthesis of the imaginary and the real, which is the entire problem of psychosis. Here we find a secondary imaginary elaboration which Mme Lefort has highlighted, which is literally non-inexistence in the nascent state.

It's a long time since I have re-examined the case. And yet, the last time we met, I had put before you the grand schema of the vase and the flowers, in which the flowers are imaginary, virtual, illusory, and the vase real, or inversely, because one can set up the apparatus the other way round.

At this juncture, all I can do is point out to you the pertinence of this model, constructed around the relation between the contained-flowers and the container-vase. The container-contained system, which I already placed in the foreground with the significance that I give to the mirror-stage, is here seen being played out to the full, and quite nakedly. We see the child behaving in accordance with the more or less mythical function of the container, and, as Mme Lefort has noted, only being able to endure it being empty at the end. To be capable of enduring its emptiness is, in the end, to identify it as a truly human object, that is to say, an instrument, capable of being detached from its function. And it is essential in so far as in the human world, there is not only utility, but also the tool,[10] that is to say instruments, which exist as things in their own right.

M. Hyppolite: Universal.

Dr Lang: The way in which the wolf changes from being vertical to horizontal is rather delightful. It does seem to me precisely that the wolf of the beginning is lived through.

It is neither him nor anyone else, at the beginning.

No, I think that it is essentially speech reduced down to its core. It is neither him nor anyone else. He is clearly the wolf! in so far as he says this very word. But the wolf! is anything in so far as it can be named. Here you see the nodal state of speech. Here the ego is completely chaotic, speech has come to a halt. But, starting with the wolf! he will be able to take his place and construct himself.

Dr Bargues: I noticed the fact that there was a change at a particular moment, when the child played with his excrement. He gave, transformed and took sand and water. I think that it is the imaginary which he started to construct and reveal. He could already take a greater distance from the object, his excrement, and then he distanced himself further and further. I don't think that one can talk of the symbol in the sense in which you understand it. However, yesterday, I had the impression that Mme Lefort talked about them as symbols.

It's a difficult question. It is the one we are addressing here, in as much as it may be the key to what we designate as the ego. What is the ego? These aren't homogeneous agencies. Some are realities, others are images, imaginary functions. The ego itself is one of them.

This is what I would like to turn to before we leave. What musn't be left out is what you described to us in such an absorbing way at the beginning – the motor activity of this child. This child seems to have suffered no lesion of the organic systems. What sort of motor behaviour has he now? How are his grasping gestures?

MME LEFORT: To be sure, he no longer is as he was at the beginning.

At the beginning, as you have described him, when he wanted to reach an object, he could only grasp it in one complete gesture. If this gesture failed him, he had to start again from the beginning. So he is in control of visual adaptation, but he suffers from disturbances of his sense of distance. This wild child can always, like a well organised animal, catch what he wishes. But if there is something wrong or lacking in the act, he can only correct it in doing the whole thing over again. Consequently, we can say that there doesn't seem to have been any deficiency or backwardness bearing on the pyramidal system in this child, but we are confronted with signs of failures in the functions of ego-synthesis, in the sense in which we understand the ego in analytic theory.

The lack of attention, the unarticulated agitation that you also observed, at the beginning, must also be linked to failures of the ego's functions. Besides, one should take note that, in certain respects, analytic theory goes so far as to make sleep a function of the ego.

MME LEFORT: From the memorable day when he locked me up, his motor disturbances diminished, and this child, who neither slept nor dreamt, began to dream in the night, and to call his mother in his dreams.

That is what I was trying to get at. I am not overlooking the direct relation between the atypicality of his sleep and the anomalous character of his development, whose backwardness is to be placed precisely on the plane of the imaginary, on the plane of the ego in so far as it is an imaginary function. This observation shows us that, from the backwardness of a given point in imaginary development, there ensues disturbances of certain functions which are apparently of a lower level than what we may call the superstructural level.

What gives this case its special interest is the relation between the strictly sensorimotor maturation and the function of imaginary mastery by the subject. That is the question. The point is to know to what extent it is this particular articulation which is involved in schizophrenia.

According to our inclination and the idea each of us has of schizophrenia, of its mechanism and of its fundamental source, we can include or exclude this case from the category of schizophrenic illness.

It is clear that it isn't schizophrenia in the sense of a state, in as much as you have showed us its significance and its movement. But there is here a schizophrenic structure of the relation to the world and an entire set of phenomena that we could, if need be, bring into line with the catatonic set of phenomena. To be sure, strictly speaking there is no symptom of it, so that we can place the case, as Lang did, in any one given category, only in order to give it an approximate location. But some deficiencies, some failures in adaptation to the human, point towards something which later, analogically speaking, would present itself as a schizophrenia.

I think that one can't say any more about it, except that it is what one calls an exemplary case. After all, we have no reason to think that the nosological categories have been there all along, awaiting us from eternity. As Péguy said, the little pegs always fit into the little holes, but there comes a time when the little pegs no longer correspond to the little holes. That it is a question of phenomena of a psychotic nature, more exactly of phenomena which may terminate in psychosis, seems indisputable to me. Which doesn't mean that all psychoses have analogous beginnings.

Leclaire, I'm asking you specifically to work out something for next time from 'On narcissism: an introduction', which is to be found in volume IV of the Collected Papers, or in volume X of the complete works. You'll see that what is at issue are the questions raised by the register of the imaginary, which we are in the course of studying here.

SEXUALITY AND LIBIDO
FREUD OR JUNG
THE IMAGINARY IN NEUROSIS
THE SYMBOLIC IN PSYCHOSIS

For those who weren't here last time, I am going to appraise the utility as I see it of bringing Freud's article 'Zur Einführung des Narzissmus' in at this point.

How can we take stock of our findings to date? This week, I realised, not without satisfaction, that some of you have started to be seriously concerned about the systematic usage that I recommend to you here, and have done for some time, of the categories of the symbolic and the real. You know that I insist on the notion of the symbolic by telling you that it is always advisable to start with that notion in order to understand what we are doing when we intervene in analysis, and especially when we intervene in a positive fashion, namely through interpretation.

We have been led to emphasise that aspect of resistance which is to be located at the very level of the utterance of speech. Speech can express the being of the subject, but, up to a certain point, it never succeeds in so doing. So we have now reached the point where we ask ourselves the question – in relation to speech how should one locate all these affects, all these imaginary references which are ordinarily invoked when one wants to define the action of the transference in the analytic experience? You have clearly perceived that it is not a matter of course.

Full speech is speech which aims at, which forms, the truth such as it becomes established in the recognition of one person by another. Full speech is speech which performs.[2] One of the subjects finds himself, afterwards, other than he was before. That is why this dimension cannot be evaded in the analytic experience.

We cannot think of the analytic experience as a game, a lure, an intrigue based on an illusion, a suggestion. Its stake is full speech. Once this point has been made, as you might have already noticed, lots of things sort themselves out and are clarified, but lots of paradoxes and contradictions appear. The value of this conception is precisely to bring out these paradoxes and contradictions, which doesn't make them opacities and obscurities. On the contrary, it is often what appears to be harmonious and comprehensible which harbours some opacity. And inversely it is in the antinomy, in the gap, in the difficulty, that we happen upon opportunities for transparency. This is the point of view on which our method is founded, and so, I hope, is our progress.

The first of the contradictions to appear is the remarkable fact that the analytic method, if it aims at attaining full speech, starts off on a path leading in the diametrically opposed direction, in so far as it instructs the subject to delineate a speech as devoid as possible of any assumption of responsibility and that it even frees him from any expectation of authenticity. It calls on him to say everything that comes into his head. It is through these very means that it facilitates, that is the least one can say, his return on to the path which, in speech, is below the level of recognition and concerns the third party, the object.

Two planes have always been distinguished within which the exchange of human speech is played out – the plane of recognition in so far as speech links the subjects together into this pact which transforms them, and sets them up as human subjects communicating – the plane of the communiqué, in which one can distinguish all sorts of levels, the call, discussion, knowledge, information, but which, in the final analysis, involves a tendency to reach an agreement on the object. The term 'agreement' is still there, but here the emphasis is placed on the object considered as external to the action of speech, which speech expresses.

To be sure, the object is not devoid of reference to speech. From the start, it is already partially given in the system of objects, or objective system,[3] in which one should include the accumulated prejudices which make up a cultural community, up to and including the hypotheses, the psychological prejudices even, from the most sophisticated generated by scientific work to the most naive and spontaneous, which most certainly do not fail considerably to influence scientific references, to the point of impregnating them.

So here is the subject invited to abandon himself entirely to this system – it is just as much the scientific knowledge he possesses or what he can imagine on the basis of the facts he possesses as to his condition, his problem, his situation, as the most naive of his prejudices, upon which his illusions are founded, including his neurotic illusions, in so far as what is at stake there is an important part of the constitution of the neurosis.

[3] 'système objectal, ou objectiv' – 'objectal' is a word coined within the technical vocabulary of psychoanalysis (Robert gives 1951 as its date of introduction) to describe whatever relates to the objects independent of the subject's ego. 'Objectif' has a venerable history, in philosophy, linguistics and ordinary usage – it corresponds roughly to 'objective', including therein the often neglected philosophical senses in English (and such uses as in 'the objective of a telescope').

It would seem – and this is where the problem lies – that this speech act can only progress along the path of intellectual conviction which emerges from educational intervention, that is to say a higher intervention, which comes from the analyst. Analysis progresses through indoctrination.

It is this indoctrination one has in mind when one talks about the first phase of analysis as having been intellectualist. Of course it never existed. Perhaps some intellectualist conceptions of analysis were around then, but that doesn't mean that intellectualist analyses actually took place – the forces authentically at work were there from the beginning. If they hadn't been, analysis would never have had the opportunity to show its mettle, and assert itself as an obvious method of psychotherapeutic intervention.

What is called intellectualism in this context is something completely different from what is connoted were we to speak of something intellectual. The better we analyse the various levels of what is at stake, the better we will be able to distinguish what has to be distinguished and unify what has to be unified, and the more effective our technique will be. That is what we will try to do.

So, there really must be something other than indoctrination to explain the effectiveness of the analyst's interventions. That is what experience has shown to be efficacious in the action of transference.

That's where the opacity begins – what, after all, is transference?

In its essence, the efficacious transference which we're considering is quite simply the speech act. Each time a man speaks to another in an authentic and full manner, there is, in the true sense, transference, symbolic transference – something takes place which changes the nature of the two beings present.

But there what is at issue is a transference other than the one which is initially encountered in analysis not only as a problem, but as an obstacle. Indeed, this function should be located on the imaginary plane. So it is to specify it, that the notions you are familiar with, the repetition of prehistoric situations, unconscious repetition, the putting into effect of a reintegration of history – history in the opposite sense to the one I once put forward, since it is a question of an imaginary reintegration, the past situation only being experienced in the present, without the knowledge of the subject, in so far as its historical dimension is misrecognised [méconnue] by him – you'll note that I didn't say unconscious. All these ideas have been put forward so as to define what we observe, and their reward is a guaranteed empirical finding. They don't uncover, however, the reason, the function, the signification of what we observe in the real.

To expect an explanation for whatever is observed is, you'll perhaps tell me, to expect too much, to manifest too great a thirst for theory. Several hard-headed characters would perhaps like to impose a damper on us at this point.

However it seems to me that the analytic tradition doesn't distinguish itself by its lack of ambition in this respect – there must be reasons for that. Besides, whether justified or not, whether carried away or not by Freud's example, few are the psychoanalysts who have not succumbed to the theory of mental evolution. This particular metapsychological business is in truth completely impossible, for reasons which will become apparent later. But one cannot practice psychoanalysis, not even for one second, without thinking in metapsychological terms, just as M. Jourdain[4] was pretty well obliged to speak prose, whether he wanted to or not, as soon as he started speaking. This fact is truly structural to our activity.

Last time I alluded to Freud's article on transference-love. You are well aware of the strict economy of Freud's works, and to what extent it can be said that he never truly addressed himself to a subject which was not urgent, indispensable for him to deal with – in the course of a career which had almost the span of a human life, especially if one thinks at what point in his actual life, his biological life, he began his teaching.

We cannot but see that one of the most important questions in analytic theory is to know what is the connection between the bonds of transference and the characteristics, both positive and negative, of the love relation. Clinical experience vouchsafes it, as does, by the same token, the theoretical history of the discussions arising around what is called the source of therapeutic efficaciousness. In short, this subject has been on the agenda roughly since the 1920s – the Berlin Congress first of all, the Salzburg Congress, the Marienbad Congress. Since that time, the usefulness of the function of transference in the manipulation we undertake of the patient's subjectivity has never stopped being questioned. We have even separated out something which some go so far as to call, not just transference neurosis – a nosological label designating what the subject is affected with – but a secondary neurosis, an artificial neurosis, an actualisation of the neurosis in the transference, a neurosis which knots the imaginary persona of the analyst in its threads.

We know all that. But the question as to what constitutes the mainspring of what takes effect in analysis remains obscure. I am not talking about the courses of action we sometimes undertake, but about the very source of therapeutic efficacity.

The least one can say is that there is an enormous diversity of opinion in the analytic literature on this subject. To go back to the venerable discussions, all you have to do is take a look at the last chapter of Fenichel's little book. I'm not often one to recommend reading Fenichel, but as far as the historical data are concerned, he is a very instructive witness. You will see the diversity of opinion – Sachs, Rado, Alexander – when the question was broached at the Salzburg Congress.[5] You will also see the said Rado announce in what direction he intends to push the theorisation of the source of analytic efficacity. Strangely enough, having promised to spell out in black and white the solution to these problems, he never did so.

It seems that there's some mysterious resistance at work, acting so as to keep the question in comparative darkness, not only on account of its own obscurity, since little glimmers of light sometimes appear in this or that researcher's work, the more reflective subjects. One really has the feeling that the question is often caught sight of, that someone gets as close as is possible to it, but that it exerts some sort of repulsion which forbids it being rendered into concepts. Perhaps here more than elsewhere, it is possible that the completion of the theory, and even its progress, are experienced as a threat. That isn't to be excluded. It is no doubt the most propitious hypothesis.

The opinions expressed in the course of discussions on the nature of the imaginary link established in the transference bear a very close relation to the notion of the object relation.

This latter idea has now come to the foreground in analytic theoretical work. But you are aware of the extent to which the theory wavers on this issue.

Take for example the fundamental article of James Strachey, which appeared in the International Journal of Psycho-analysis, dealing with the source of therapeutic efficacity. It is one of the best argued of texts, whose entire emphasis falls on the super-ego. You can see the difficulties that this conception gets one in, and the number of supplementary hypotheses that the above-mentioned Strachey is required to introduce in order to sustain it. He suggests that the analyst takes on, in relation to the subject, the function of the super-ego. But the theory according to which the analyst is purely and simply the mainstay of the super-ego's function cannot stand up, since this function is precisely one of the most important sources of the neurosis. So the argument is circular. To get out of it, the author finds himself forced to introduce the idea of a parasitical super-ego – a supplementary hypothesis which is completely unjustified, but which the contradictions in his argument necessitate. Besides, he is obliged to go too far. So as to argue for the existence of this parasitical super-ego in analysis, he is obliged to posit that a set of exchanges, of introjections and projections, take place between the analysand subject and the analyst subject, which bring us to the level of the mechanisms by which good and bad objects – introduced by Melanie Klein into the practice of the English school – are constituted. This brings with it the risk of re-creating them ad nauseam.

One can locate the question of the relations between the analysand and the analyst on a completely different plane – on the plane of the ego and the non-ego, that is to say, on the plane of the narcissistic economy of the subject.

Moreover, the question of transference-love has from the start been too closely linked with the analytic study of the notion of love. We are not dealing with love in the guise of Eros – the universal presence of a power binding subjects together, underlying the whole of the reality in which analysis is played out – but of passionate love, as it is concretely lived by the subject, as a sort of psychological catastrophe. It raises the question, as you know, of knowing how this passionate love is, in its very essence, linked to the analytic relation.

Having said something nice about Fenichel's book, let me tell you something nasty about it. It is as delightful as it is striking to note the sort of revolt, of insurrection even, that the extremely pertinent remarks of two authors on the relations between love and transference seem to elicit in Mr Fenichel. They emphasise the narcissistic character of the relationship of imaginary love, and show how and to what extent the loved object is confounded, by means of one whole facet of its qualities, of its attributes, and also of its impact on the psychic economy, with the subject's ego-ideal. One thus sees the general syncretism of Mr Fenichel's thought linked up in a curious fashion with this middle way which is his and which leads him to experience such repugnance, a real phobia when faced with the paradox generated by this imaginary love. Imaginary love in its essence partakes of illusion, and Mr Fenichel experiences a kind of horror in thus seeing the very function of love devalued.

That is precisely what is at issue – what is this love, which enters in as an imaginary mainspring in analysis? Fenichel's horror tells us something about the subjective structure of the character in question.

Well, for us, what we have to locate is the structure which articulates the narcissistic relation, the function of love in its widest sense and the transference in its practical efficacy.

There is more than one way to help you find your sense of direction in the midst of all the ambiguities which, as I think you have become aware, make their appearance again and again at every twist and turn in the analytic literature. I hope to teach you new categories, which introduce essential distinctions. These are not external distinctions, scholastic or ever-expanding ones – juxtaposing this or that field, proliferating bipartitions off to infinity, a mode of procedure which consists in always introducing supplementary hypotheses. No doubt this method is open to those who want it; but for my part I am aiming at progress in understanding.

It is a matter of bringing into focus what is implied by simple ideas, which already exist. There is no point in taking apart indefinitely, as one could – as has been done in a remarkable work on the idea of transference. I am rather inclined to leave intact the empirical totality of the notion of transference, all the while remarking that it is plurivalent and that it acts in several registers at a time, in the symbolic, the imaginary and the real.

These are not three fields. Even in the animal kingdom, you have been able to see that it is in relation to the same actions, the same behaviour, that we can distinguish precisely the functions of the imaginary, the symbolic and the real, for the simple reason that they do not belong in the same order of relations.

There are a number of ways of introducing these ideas. Mine has its limits, like any dogmatic account. But its usefulness is in being critical, that is to say in arising just where the empirical efforts of researchers meet with a difficulty in handling a pre-existing theory. That is what makes for the value of the path of textual commentary.

Doctor Leclaire starts the reading and commentary on the initial pages of 'On narcissism: an introduction'. Interruption.

What Leclaire is saying here is quite right. For Freud there is a relation between a thing x which has moved on to the plane of the libido, and the disinvestment of the external world characteristic of the forms of dementia praecox – take this in as extended a sense as you can. Now, to set up the problem in these terms creates great difficulties in analytic theory, as it was constituted at that time.

In order to understand it one must look at the Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality, where the notion of a primitive auto-erotism comes from.[6] What is this primitive auto-erotism, whose existence Freud postulates? It is a libido which constitutes the objects of interest, and which is allocated, through a sort of evasion, of extension, of pseudopodia. Beginning with this emission by the subject of libidinal investments, its instinctual development unfolds, its world is built up, in accordance with an instinctual structure peculiar to it. This conception does not give rise to any difficulties so long as Freud leaves out of the libido's mechanism everything pertaining to a register other than that of desire as such. The register of desire is, for him, an extension of the concrete manifestations of sexuality, an essential relation maintained by the animal being with the Umwelt, its world. So you see that this is a bipolar conception – on one side the libidinal subject, on the other the world.

Now this conception breaks down, as Freud knew very well, if one generalises excessively the notion of libido, because, in so doing, one neutralises it. Isn't it quite clear, moreover, that it adds essentially nothing to an understanding of the facts of neurosis if the libido functions roughly in the same way as M. Janet called the function of the real? On the contrary, the libido takes on its meaning by being distinguished from the real, or realisable, relations, from all the functions which have nothing to do with the function of desire, from everything touching on the relations of the ego and of the external world. It has nothing to do with instinctual registers other than the sexual, with, for example, whatever has to do with the domain of nutrition, of assimilation, of hunger in so far as it is conducive to the preservation of the individual. If the libido is not isolated from the entire range of functions for the preservation of the individual, it loses all meaning.

Now, in schizophrenia, something happens which completely disturbs the relations of the subject to the real, swamping the foundation with form. This fact, all of a sudden, raises the question of knowing whether the libido doesn't go much further than the definition given it by taking the sexual register as its organising, central core. That's the point at which the libido theory begins to create problems.

It creates such problems that it has been effectively put in question. I'll show you that when we analyse Freud's commentary on the text written by Senatspräsident Schreber. It is in the course of this commentary that Freud becomes aware of the difficulties created by the problem of libidinal investment in the psychoses. And he then makes use of notions that are ambiguous enough for Jung to say that he had given up defining the nature of the libido as being uniquely sexual. Jung does take this step decisively, and introduces the notion of introversion, which is for him – that is the criticism which Freud made of him – a notion ohne Unterscheidung,[7] lacking in capacity to discriminate. And he ends up with the vague notion of psychic interest, which collapses into one single register what belongs to the order of the preservation of the individual and what belongs to the order of sexual polarisation of the individual in its objects. All that remains is a kind of relation of the subject to himself which Jung says pertains to the libidinal order. What the subject must do is realise himself as an individual in possession of genital functions.

Since then, psychoanalytic theory has been vulnerable to a neutralisation of the libido, which consists, on the one hand, in firmly asserting that the libido is what is involved, and on the other, in saying that it is simply a property of the soul, the creator of its world. Such a conception is extremely difficult to distinguish from analytic theory, in so far as the Freudian idea of a primordial auto-erotism forming the basis upon which objects are progressively constituted is almost equivalent, in terms of its structure, to Jung's theory.

That is why, in his article on narcissism, Freud harks back to the necessity of distinguishing egoistical libido and sexual libido. Now you understand one of the reasons why he wrote this article.

The problem is an extremely knotty one for him to resolve. All the while maintaining the distinction between the two libidos, throughout the entire article he continually skirts around the notion of their equivalence. How can these terms be clearly distinguished if one maintains the idea that they are equivalent in energetic terms, which is what allows one to say that it is in so far as the libido is disinvested from the object that it returns back on to the ego? There's the problem raised. As a result, Freud is led to conceive of narcissism as a secondary process. A unity comparable to the ego does not exist at the beginning, nicht von Anfang, is not to be found in the individual from the start, and the Ich has to develop, entwickelt werden.[8] The auto-erotic instincts, in contrast, are there right from the start.

Those of you who are somewhat familiar with what I am putting before you will see that this idea confirms the usefulness of my conception of the mirror-stage. The Urbild, which is a unity comparable to the ego, is constituted at a specific moment in the history of the subject, at which point the ego begins to take on its functions. This means that the human ego is founded on the basis of the imaginary relation. The function of the ego, Freud writes, must have eine neue psychische Aktion. . . . zu gestalten.[9] In the development of the psyche, something new appears whose function it is to give form to narcissism. Doesn't that indicate the imaginary origin of the ego's function?

In the next two or three lectures, I will specify what use, simultaneously limited and various, should be made of the mirror-stage. For the first time, I will teach you, in the light of Freud's text, that there are two registers implied in this stage. Finally, if last time I showed you that the imaginary function contains the plurality of experience of the individual, I am going to show you that one cannot limit it to that – because of the need to distinguish the psychoses from the neuroses.

What is now important to bear in mind from the article's opening is the difficulty Freud experiences in defending the originality of the psychoanalytic dynamic against the Jungian dissolution of the problem.

According to the Jungian schema, psychic interest comes and goes, goes out, comes back, colours, etc. It drowns the libido in the universal magma which will be the basis of the world's constitution. Here we come upon a very traditional mode of thought clearly distinct from orthodox analytic thought. Psychic interest is here nothing other than an alternating spotlight, which can come and go, be projected, be withdrawn from reality, at the whim of the pulsation of the psyche of the subject. It's a pretty metaphor, but it throws no light on practice, as Freud underlines. It does not allow one to grasp the differences that there might be between a directed, sublimated retreat of interest in the world which the anchorite may achieve, and that of the schizophrenic, whose result is however structurally quite distinct, since the subject discovers that he is completely stuck. No doubt a considerable number of clinical points have been brought out by the Jungian investigation, which intrigues by its quaintness, its style, the parallels it establishes between what some mental or religious ascesis produces and what a schizophrenic produces. That, perhaps, is a way of working which has the advantage of adding some colour and life for the benefit of the researchers, but which quite clearly has illuminated nothing in the way of mechanisms – Freud doesn't miss the opportunity of quite mercilessly underlining that in passing.

What is crucial for Freud is grasping the difference in structure which exists between the withdrawal from reality which we observe in the neuroses and that which we observe in the psychoses. One of the crucial distinctions is established in a surprising manner – surprising at least for those who haven't come to grips with these problems.

In the refusal to recognise [méconnaissance], in the refusal, in the barrier opposed to reality by the neurotic, we note a recourse to fancy. Here we have function, which in Freud's vocabulary can only refer to the imaginary register. We know the extent to which people and objects in the neurotic's milieu change significance entirely, in relation to a function there is no problem in naming – without going further than ordinary linguistic usage – as imaginary. Imaginary here refers – in the first instance, to the subject's relation to its formative identifications, which is the true meaning of the term 'image' in analysis – secondly, to the relation of the subject to the real whose characteristic is that of being illusory, which is the facet of the imaginary most often highlighted.

Now, whether rightly or wrongly, it doesn't matter at this stage, Freud emphasises that nothing comparable is to be found in psychosis. When it comes to the psychotic subject, if he loses the realisation of the real, he doesn't find any imaginary substitute. That is what distinguishes him from the neurotic.

This conception may appear extraordinary at first glance. You are well aware that one has to make some headway in conceptualisation at this point in order to follow Freud's thinking. One of the most widespread of conceptions is that the deluded [délirant] subject is dreaming, that he is bang in the middle of the imaginary. So, in Freud's conception, the function of the imaginary cannot be the function of the unreal. Otherwise there'd be no point in his denying the psychotic access to the imaginary. And since in general Freud knows what he is saying, we will have to find a means of filling in what he meant on this topic.

This will lead us into a coherent exposition of the relations between the imaginary and the symbolic, since that is one of the points on which Freud brings this difference of structure to bear with great energy. When the psychotic reconstructs his world, what is invested to start off with? You will see along what path, for many of you unexpected, this will take us – the answer is words. There, you cannot but recognise the category of the symbolic.

We will push what this critique opens up further. We will see that it may be the case that the specific structure of the psychotic should be located in a symbolic unreal, or in a symbolic unmarked by the unreal. The function of the imaginary is to be located somewhere entirely different.

You're beginning to see, I hope, the difference between Freud's and Jung's appreciation of the place of the psychoses. For Jung, the two domains of the symbolic and the imaginary are there completely confused, whereas one of the preliminary articulations that Freud's article allows us to pinpoint is the clear distinction between the two.

Today is only a curtain-raiser. But when it comes to matters as important as these, you can't raise the curtain too slowly. I have only managed to introduce – as moreover the very title of the article puts it – a limited number of questions, which have never been raised. It will give you the time to turn things over in your minds, and to do a little work from now to the next time.

Next time I would like to see, in commenting on this text, as close a collaboration as possible from our friend Leclaire. I would rather like to see Granoff engage in this work – he seems to have a particular inclination and interest in Freud's article on transference-love – this may well be an opportunity for him to contribute by introducing this article. There's a third article that I would like to entrust to someone for next time. It's a text which comes from the metapsychology of the same period, and which pertains directly to our object – 'Compléments métapsychologiques à la doctrine des rêves',[10] which is translated into French as 'La théorie des rêves'. I'll give it to whoever doesn't mind taking it on himself – for example our dear Perrier, for whom this will be the chance to comment on the subject of schizophrenics.

The two narcissisms

THE NOTION OF DRIVE

THE IMAGINARY IN ANIMALS AND IN MAN

SEXUAL BEHAVIOUR IS PARTICULARLY PRONE TO THE LURE

THE URICH

'On narcissism: an introduction' dates from the beginning of the 1914 war, and it is quite moving to think that it was at that time that Freud was developing such a construction. Everything which we include under the metapsychological rubric emerges between 1914 and 1918, following the publication in 1912 of Jung's work translated into French under the title Métamorphoses et Symboles de la Libido.[1]

Jung's approach to the mental illnesses had an entirely different perspective from Freud's, since his experience was with the gamut of schizophrenias, whereas Freud's was with the neuroses. His 1912 work puts forward a grandiose unitary conception of psychic energy, fundamentally different in its inspiration, and even in its definition, from the notion developed by Freud under the name of libido.

Nevertheless, the theoretical difference is still recalcitrant enough to state for Freud to be struggling with difficulties which one can sense throughout the article.

The point, for him, is to maintain a clearly demarcated usage – these days we would say operational – of the notion of libido, which is essential to sustaining his discovery. On what, in short, is the Freudian discovery based – if not on this fundamental realisation that the symptoms of the neurosis reveal an indirect form of sexual satisfaction. Freud had very concretely demonstrated the sexual function of symptoms with respect to neurotics, by means of a series of equivalents, the last of which is a therapeutic sanction. With this as a foundation, he always maintained that it wasn't a new, totalising conception of the world that he was offering, but a well defined theory, based on a clearly, yet entirely new, demarcated field, comprising several human realities, particularly psychopathological ones – subnormal phenomena, that is to say those which normal psychology does not study, dreams, slips, mishaps, which disturb some of the so-called higher functions.

The problem which Freud faced at this point in time was that of the structure of the psychoses. How to map out the structure of the psychoses within the framework of the general theory of the libido?

Jung gives the following solution – the profound transformation of reality apparent in the psychoses is due to a metamorphosis of the libido, analogous to that which Freud had caught a glimpse of with respect to the neuroses. Except that, in the psychotic, Jung says, the libido is introverted into the internal world of the subject – a notion left hanging in the greatest ontological uncertainty. It is on account of this introversion that for him reality fades into a twilight. The mechanism of the psychoses is thus perfectly continuous with that of the neuroses.

Being intent on the working out, starting off from experience, of extremely well defined mechanisms, always concerned with its empirical reference, Freud sees analytic theory transformed by Jung into a vast psychic pantheism, a series of imaginary spheres each enveloping the other, which leads to a general classification of contents, of events, of the Erlebnis of the individual's life, and finally to what Jung calls the archetypes. This is not the path down which a clinical, psychiatric working out of the objects of research can be undertaken. And that is why he now attempts to ascertain the relation which the sexual drives are capable of maintaining amongst themselves, those sexual drives to which he had given such prominence owing to their having been hidden and to their having been revealed by his analysis, and the ego drives, which up to that point he had not brought to the fore. Can one say, yes or no, whether the one is the shadow of the other? Is reality constituted by this universal libidinal projection which is at the heart of the Jungian theory? Or is there on the contrary a relation of opposition, a relation of conflict, between the ego drives and the libidinal drives?

With his usual honesty, Freud makes it clear that his determination to maintain this distinction is based on his experience of the neuroses, and, after all, that is only a limited experience. That is why he says no less clearly that one may postulate, at a primitive stage, prior to that which psychoanalytic investigation permits one to penetrate, a condition of narcissism, in which it is impossible to distinguish the two fundamental propensities, the Sexuallibido and the Ichtriebe.[2] They are inextricably mixed together, beisammen,[3] confused, and are not distinguishable - ununterscheidbar – by our coarse analysis. Nonetheless he explains why he strives to maintain the distinction.

[3] 'beisammen' usually means 'together (in the same place)'.

First of all there is the experience of the neuroses. Next, he says, the fact that the distinction between the ego-drives and the sexual drives lacks clarity at the moment should perhaps be attributed simply to the fact that the drives constitute, for our theory, the final point of reference. The theory of drives is not at the base of the construction, but right up at the top. It is eminently abstract, and Freud later was to call it our mythology. That is why, with the concrete always within his sights, always putting his own speculative projects in their place, he underlines their limited value. He compares the notion of drive to the highest-level notions from physics, matter, force, attraction, which have only been developed in the course of the historical evolution of the science, and whose initial form was uncertain, in truth confused before they were purified and then applied.

We are not following Freud, we are accompanying him. The fact that an idea occurs somewhere in Freud's work doesn't, for all that, guarantee that it is being handled in the spirit of the Freudian researches. As for us, we are trying to conform to the spirit, to the watchword, to the style of this research.

Freud backed up his theory of the libido with what the biology of his time made available to him. The theory of instincts cannot but take into account a fundamental bipartition between the final ends of the preservation of the individual and those of the continuity of the species. What we find in the background is nothing other than Weissmann's theory, of which you must remember something from your time spent in philosophy classes. This theory, which hasn't been definitely proved, posits the existence of an immortal substance made up of sexual cells. These would make up a unique sexual line of descent through continuous reproduction. The germ-plasm would, still according to this theory, be what preserves the existence of the species, and what is perpetuated from one individual to the next. In contrast, the somatic plasm would be like an individual parasite which, from the point of view of the reproduction of the species, would have carried on growing in a lateral fashion, with the sole aim of being the vehicle for the eternal germ-plasm. Freud immediately makes it clear that his own construction does not pretend to be a biological theory. Whatever value he attaches to this reference, on which he decided to rely until further notice and with reservations, he would not hesitate to abandon it, if an examination of the facts within the domain specific to analytic investigation were to render it useless and detrimental.

Similarly there is no reason, he says, to swamp the Sexualenergie in the as yet unexplored field of psychic facts. The point is not to seek for the libido a universal kinship with every single psychic manifestation. That would be as if, he says, in a question of inheritance, someone were to invoke, as a proof to the lawyer of his rights, the universal kinship which, according to the monogenetic hypothesis, links all men together.[4]

I'd like to make a remark here, which may perhaps seem to you to contrast sharply with those we usually make. But you will see that it will help us with our task, which is to clarify Freud's ongoing discussion, whose obscurities and impasses he in no way keeps from us, as you have already seen, if only through our commentary on the first few pages of this article. He doesn't offer a solution, but opens up a series of questions, into which we must try to penetrate.

At the time Freud was writing, there was, as he himself says somewhere, no ready-made,[5] ready-to-wear theory of instincts. Even today, it hasn't been brought to completion, but some progress has been made since the work of Lorenz and Tinbergen – which justifies these perhaps over-speculative remarks that I'm now going to make.

What follows from endorsing the Weissmannian notion of the immortality of the germ-plasm? If the individual which develops is quite distinct from the fundamental living substance which the germ-plasm constitutes, and which does not perish, if the individual is parasitic, what function does it have in the propagation of life? None. From the point of view of the species, individuals are, if one can put it this way, already dead. An individual is worth nothing alongside the immortal substance hidden deep inside it, which is the only thing to be perpetuated and which authentically and substantially represents such life as there is.

Let me clarify this. From the psychological point of view, what exactly is this individual led to propagate, by the infamous sexual instinct? – the immortal substance enclosed in the germ-plasm in the genital organs, represented in vertebrates by spermatozoa and ova. Is that all? – obviously not, since what is propagated is, after all, an individual. Only, it doesn't reproduce as an individual, but as a type. It only manages to reproduce the type already brought into being by the line of its ancestors. In this respect, not only is it mortal, but it is already dead, since properly speaking it has no future. It isn't this or that horse, but the prop, the embodiment of something which is The Horse. If the concept of species is valid, if natural history exists, it is because there are not only horses, but also The Horse.

This really is where the theory of instincts ends us up. In fact, what serves as support for the sexual instinct on the psychological plane?

What is the basic mainspring determining the setting into motion of the gigantic sexual mechanism? What is its releasing mechanism, as Tinbergen puts it, following Lorenz?[6] It isn't the existence of the sexual partner, the particularity of one individual, but something which has an extremely intimate relation with what I have been calling the type, namely an image.

[6] The French term here translated 'releasing mechanism' is 'déclencheur', which means 'trigger, starter (as in starter for a car)'. It was thought best to make this term consistent with English language works in ethology, despite the connotations, which Lacan exploits, borrowed from other semantic fields.

In the functioning of pairing mechanisms, ethologists have proved the dominance of the image, which appears in the guise of a transitory phenotype through modification of the external appearance and whose manifestation serves as a signal, of a constructed signal, that is to say a Gestalt, which sets the reproductive behaviour in motion. The mechanical throwing into gear of the sexual instinct is thus essentially crystallised in a relation of images, in – I now come to the term you're expecting – an imaginary relation.

This is the framework within which we must articulate the Libidotriebe and the Ichtriebe.

The libidinal drive is centred on the function of the imaginary.

Try as an idealist and moralising transposition of analytic doctrine might to make us believe, this does not mean that the subject makes his way in the imaginary towards an ideal state of genitality which would be the ultimate sanction and final source for the installation of the real. So we now have to define more precisely the relations of the libido with the imaginary and the real, and to resolve the problem as to the real function that the ego has in the psychic economy.

O. MANNONI: Can I put in a word? For some time I've been perplexed by a problem that seems to me simultaneously to complicate and simplify matters. It is that the investment of objects by the libido is at bottom a realist metaphor since it only invests the image of objects. Whereas the investment of the ego can be an intra-psychic phenomenon, whereby the ontological reality of the ego is invested. If the libido has become object-libido, it can then only invest something symmetrical to the ego's image. Such that we will have two narcissisms, according to whether it is a libido which intra-physically invests the ontological ego, or an object-libido which invests something which may perhaps be the ego-ideal, and is in any case an image of the ego. We would then have a well-founded distinction between primary narcissism and secondary narcissism.

You do know, don't you, that, step by step, I want to take you somewhere. We are not proceeding entirely aimlessly, although I am open to welcome discoveries that we make along the way. I am happy to see our friend Mannoni taking an elegant jump[7] into the subject – one needs to make one every now and then – but let us first go back to where we left off.

What am I trying to get at? – to get to grips with this fundamental experience made available to us by the contemporary development of the theory of instincts in relation to the cycle of sexual behaviour, which reveals that the subject is there essentially prone to the lure.

For example, the male stickleback has to have beautiful colours on its belly and back, before the copulation dance with the female can get going. But we can quite easily make a cut-out which, even when poorly put together, will have exactly the same effect on the female, provided that it possesses certain markings – Merkzeichen. Sexual behaviour is quite especially prone to the lure. This teaches us something which is important in working out the structure of the perversions and the neuroses.

Since we've got to this point, I am going to introduce a complement to the schema that I gave you during that little course on the topic of the imaginary.

I pointed out to you that this model faithfully follows Freud's very wishes. He spelled out in several places, particularly in the Traumdeutung and the Abriss, that the fundamental psychic agencies should be primarily conceived of as representing what takes place in a camera, namely as images, which are either virtual or real, produced through its functioning. The organic apparatus represents the mechanism of the camera, and what we apprehend are the images. Their functions are not homogeneous, because a real image and a virtual image are not the same thing. The agencies that Freud constructs should not be taken to be substantial, nor epiphenomenal in relation to the modification of the apparatus itself. Hence the agencies should be interpreted by means of an optical schema. A conception that Freud drew attention to on many occasions, but which, in his hands, never materialised.

On the left you see the concave mirror, thanks to which the phenomenon of the inverted bouquet is produced, which I have here transformed since it is more convenient, into that of the inverted vase. The vase is in the box, and the bouquet is on top.

Through the play of reflection of light rays, the vase will be reproduced in the form of a real, and not virtual, image, to which the eye can accommodate. If the eye becomes accommodated to the level of the flowers that we have placed there, it will see the real image of the vase encompassing the bouquet, and will give a style and unity to it – a reflection of the unity of the body.

For the image to have some consistency, it must be a genuine image. What is the definition of an image in optics? – to every point on the object there must correspond a point on the image, and all the rays issuing from a point must intersect again somewhere in a unique point. An optical apparatus is uniquely defined by a univocal or bi-univocal convergence of rays – as one says in axiomatics.

If the concave apparatus is placed here where I am, and the conjurer's little set-up in front of the desk, the image cannot be seen with clarity sufficient to produce an illusion of reality, a real illusion. You have to be positioned at a certain angle. Obviously, depending on the various positions of the eye doing the looking, we might distinguish a given set of circumstances which could perhaps allow us to understand the different positions of the subject in relation to reality.

To be sure, a subject is not an eye, I've told you that. But this model can be applied because we are in the imaginary, where the eye has a great importance.

Someone raised the question of the two narcissisms. You are well aware that this is what is at issue - the relation between the constitution of reality and the relation with the form of the body, which Mannoni, more or less felicitously, called ontological.

First let us go back to the concave mirror, on to which, as I've pointed out to you, we could probably project all manner of things whose meaning is organic, in particular the cortex. But let's not turn it into a substance too quickly, because the point here isn't, as you will see more clearly from what follows, the pure and simple exposition of the theory of the little-man-inside-the-man. If I wanted to use it to redo the-little-man-inside-the-man, there would be no point in my criticising it all the time. And if I am giving in on that, it's because there is a reason why I'm giving in.

The eye now, this hypothetical eye I've been telling you about, let us put it somewhere between the concave mirror and the object.

For this eye to have precisely the illusion of the inverted vase, that is to say for this eye to see it under optimal conditions, as clearly as if it were at the end of the room, one thing only is both necessary and sufficient – that there be a plane mirror in the middle of the room.

To put it another way, if one put a mirror in the middle of the room, while I turn my back on the concave mirror, I would see the image of the vase as clearly as if I were at the end of the room, even though I wouldn't see it in a direct manner. What am I going to see in the mirror? Firstly, my own face, there where it isn't. Secondly, at a point symmetrical to the point where the real image is, I am going to see this real image appear as a virtual image. Are you with me? It isn't difficult to understand – when you get home, set yourself in front of a mirror, put your hand in front of you . . .

This little schema is only a very simple elaboration of what I've been trying to explain to you for years with the mirror stage.

Just now, Mannoni mentioned the two narcissisms. First of all, there is, in fact, a narcissism connected with the corporeal image. This image is identical for the entirety of the subject's mechanisms and gives his Umwelt its form, in as much as he is man and not horse. It makes up the unity of the subject, and we see it projecting itself in a thousand different ways, up to and including what we can call the imaginary source of symbolism, which is what links symbolism to feeling, to the Selbstgefühl, which the human being, the Mensch, has of his own body.

This initial narcissism is to be found, if you wish, on the level of the real image in my schema, in so far as it makes possible the organisation of the totality of reality into a limited number of preformed frameworks.

To be sure, this way of functioning is completely different in man and in animals, which are adapted to a uniform Umwelt. For the animal there is a limited number of pre-established correspondences between its imaginary structure and whatever interests it in its Umwelt, namely whatever is important for the perpetuation of individuals, themselves a function of the perpetuation of the type of the species. In man, by contrast, the reflection in the mirror indicates an original noetic possibility, and introduces a second narcissism. Its fundamental pattern[8] is immediately the relation to the other.

For man the other has a captivating value, on account of the anticipation that is represented by the unitary image as it is perceived either in the mirror or in the entire reality of the fellow being.

The other, the alter ego, is more or less confused, according to the stage in life, with the Ichideal, this ego-ideal invoked throughout Freud's article. Narcissistic identification – the word identification, without differentiation, is unusable – that of the second narcissism, is identification with the other which, under normal circumstances, enables man to locate precisely his imaginary and libidinal relation to the world in general. That is what enables him to see in its place and to structure, as a function of this place and of his world, his being. Mannoni said ontological just now, I'm quite happy with that. What I would precisely say is – his libidinal being. The subject sees his being in a reflection in relation to the other, that is to say in relation to the Ichideal.

Hence you see that one has to distinguish between the functions of the ego – on the one hand, they play for man, as they do for every other living creature, a fundamental role in the structuration of reality – what is more, in man they have to undergo this fundamental alienation constituted by the reflected image of himself, which is the Urich, the original form of the Ichideal as well as that of the relation to the other.

Is this sufficiently clear for you? I had already given you an initial element of this schema, I'm giving you another one today – the reflexive relation to the other. Later on you'll see what use it may serve, this schema. You're right in thinking that it is not for the fun of it that I've made up these delightful constructions. It will be extremely useful, since it will allow you to locate almost all the clinical, concrete questions raised by the function of the imaginary, and in particular in relation to those libidinal investments whose meanings one eventually ceases to understand when handling them.

Reply to Doctor Granoff's intervention concerning the application of the optical schema to the theory of the state of being in love.

The exact equivalence of the object and the ego-ideal in the love relation is one of the most fundamental notions in Freud's work, and one comes across it again and again. The loved object, when invested in love, is, through its captative effect on the subject, strictly equivalent to the ego-ideal. It is for this reason that, in suggestion, in hypnosis, we encounter the state of dependency, such an important economic function, in which there is a genuine perversion of reality through the fascination with the loved object and its overestimation. You're acquainted with the psychology of love which Freud so subtly expounded. We are offered such a large, important slice, that, as you see, we have scarcely come to terms with it today. But you'll find all manner of things on the topic of what he calls the choice of the object.

So, you cannot but see the contradiction that exists between this notion of love and certain mythical conceptions of the libidinal ascesis of psychoanalysis. I know not what vague fusion, or communion between genitality and the constitution of the real is recommended to us as the culmination of affective maturation. I am not saying that there isn't something essential to the constitution of reality in all this, but one must understand what. Because, it is either one or the other – either love is what Freud is describing, an imaginary function in its very foundation, or it is the foundation and the base of the world. Just as there are two narcissisms, so there must be two loves, Eros and Agapè.

Reply to Doctor Leclaire's question about the ambiguities concerning the Ichideal and the Idealich in Freud's text.

We are in a seminar here, we are not professing an ex cathedra teaching. We are trying to find our bearings, and to draw the greatest profit from a text and above all from someone's thinking as it develops.

God knows how others, amongst them the best, Abraham and Ferenczi included, have tried to get the development of the ego and its relations to the development of the libido sorted out. This question is the subject of the latest article brought out by the New York school, but for now let's stay with Ferenczi and Abraham.

Freud relied on the article published in 1913 by Ferenczi on the sense of reality. It is very poor. Ferenczi is the one who started to put the famous stages into everyone's heads. Freud refers to it. At that point in time, we are still at the stage of the very first theoretical attempts to articulate the constitution of the real, and the mere fact of receiving a reply was in itself a great help to Freud. Ferenczi brought him something, and he made use of it.

The article in question had a decisive influence. It's like repressed things, which have all the more importance for being unknown. Similarly, when some chap writes something truly stupid, it's not because no one reads it that it doesn't have consequences. Because, without having read it, everyone repeats it. Some inanities circulate like that, playing on a mixing up of planes which people don't watch out for. Hence, the first analytic theory of the constitution of the real is impregnated with ideas in the air at the time, expressed in more or less mythical terms, concerning the stages of the evolution of the human mind. The idea is to be found everywhere, in Jung also, that the human mind has made decisive progress in very recent times, and that before that we were still at a stage of prelogical confusion – as if it weren't clear that there is no structural difference between the thought of Mr Aristotle and that of some of the others. These ideas bring with them their power of confusion and disseminate their poison. You can see it clearly in the embarrassment which Freud himself experiences when he refers to Ferenczi's article.

When one talks of primitives, of so-called primitives, and of mental patients, it works fine. But where the evolutionary point of view finds complications is with children. There, Freud is forced to say that development is far from being that transparent.

Perhaps it would be better, in fact, not to refer here to falsely evolutionary notions. This probably isn't the place for the fertile idea of evolution. It is a question, rather, of elucidating structural mechanisms, which are at work in our analytic experience, which is centred on adults. Retroactively, one may clarify what happens in children, in a hypothetical and more or less verifiable manner.

In taking up this structural point of view, we are directly following Freud, because that is where he ended up. The final development of his theory distanced itself from analogical evolutionary adventures, embarked on through a superficial use of several shibboleths. Actually, what Freud always insisted upon was exactly the opposite, namely the preservation, at every level, of what may be considered as different stages.

We'll try to go one step further next time. Think of all this as a starter. You will come to see its strict relation with the phenomenon of the imaginary transference.

Ego-ideal and ideal ego

FREUD LINE BY LINE
THE LURES OF SEXUALITY
THE SYMBOLIC RELATION DEFINES THE POSITION OF THE SUBJECT IN THE IMAGINARY

Leclaire, who has worked for us on the difficult text, 'On narcissism: an introduction', is going to continue today to share his reflections and questions with us. Take up the second section again and try to quote a lot.

DR LECLAIRE: It's an impossible text to summarise. One would have to quote almost the whole of it. The first part postulates the fundamental distinction in the libido, with those arguments to which you have paid some attention concerning the germ-plasm. In the second part, Freud tells us that it is unquestionably the study of the dementia praecoxes, which he calls the group of paraphrenias, which continues to provide the surest access to a study of the psychology of the ego. But that is not what he will go on to consider. He mentions several other paths which might lead to reflections concerning the psychology of the ego. He starts off with the influence of organic illness on the distribution of libido, which may be considered an excellent introduction to psycho-somatic medicine. He makes a reference to a discussion that he had had with Ferenczi on this subject, and starts with the observation that, in the course of an illness, of a painful episode, the patient withdraws his libidinal investment in to his ego in order to free it once more when he is cured. He concludes that this is a banal consideration, but nevertheless one which merits examination. During the phase in which he withdraws his libidinal investment from objects, the libido and the ego's interest are once again confused, once again share the same destiny, and become impossible to tell apart.

Do you know Wilhelm Busch? He's a humourist you should drink deep from. There's an unforgettable creation of his called Balduin Bählamm, the poet in shackles. His toothache puts a stop to all his idealist and platonising daydreams, as well as to the promptings of love. He forgets the prices on the stock exchange, taxes, the multiplication table, etc. All the habitual forms of being are suddenly found to be without interest, turned to nothing. And now, in the little hole, lives the molar. The symbolic world of the prices on the stock exchange and the multiplication table is entirely invested in pain.

DR LECLAIRE: Freud then turns to another point, the state of sleep in which there is a similar narcissistic withdrawal of libidinal investments. He then returns to hypochondria, to its differences and points of similarity with organic illness. He thus arrives at the notion that the difference between the two, which is perhaps of no importance, is the existence of an organic lesion. The study of hypochondria and organic illnesses allows him above all to make it clear that, in the hypochondriac, there are doubtless also organic changes of the order of vaso-motor difficulties, of circulatory difficulties, and he expounds on the similarity between the excitation of any bodily zone and sexual excitation. He introduces the notion of erotogenicity,[1] of erogenous zones which can, he says, replace the genitals and behave like them, that is to say, they can be the seat of activity and relaxation. And he tells us that there may be a variation in the libidinal investment of the ego in parallel with each variation of this type in the erotogenicity of an organ. And this raises the psycho-somatic problem again. In any case, following on from the study of erotogenicity, and the possibilities of erotogenization[2] of any part of the body, he is led to suppose that hypochondria may be classified with the neuroses which depend on the libido of the ego, whereas the other actual neuroses depend on object-libido. I had the impression that this passage, which, when the second part is considered as a whole, forms a kind of paragraph, is less important than the second paragraph of the second part, in which he defines the two types of object choice.

Freud's essential point is that it is almost of no importance whether a working over of the libido – you know how difficult it is to translate Verarbeitung and élaboration isn't quite it[3] – is produced with real objects or with imaginary objects. The distinction only appears later, when the libido becomes oriented towards unreal objects. This leads to a Stauung, to a damming of the libido, which brings us to the imaginary character of the ego, since it is its libido which is in question.

O. MANNONI: This German word must mean the construction of a dike. It appears to have a dynamic meaning, and at the same time means a raising of the level, and consequently a greater and greater energy of libido, which is well rendered in English by damming.[4]

[1] 'érogénéité'. Freud's term is 'Erogeneität' (GW X 151; Stud III 51), translated as 'erotogenicity' (SE XIV 84).

[2] A neologism in French (érogénéisation). At the corresponding point in his text, Freud uses the same term as in note 1 above, as does SE.

[3] Verarbeitung is translated in SE as 'working over' (GW X 152; Stud III 52; SE XIV 86).

[4] English in the original.

Damming up,[4] even. In passing, Freud quotes four verses of Heinrich Heine's from the Schöpfungslieder, usually found in collection with the Lieder. It is a very strange little group of seven poems, whose irony and humour reveal many things which touch on the psychology of Bildung. Freud asks himself the question why does man get out of narcissism. Why is man dissatisfied? At this truly crucial moment in his scientific argument, Freud quotes Heine's verses to us. God is speaking, and says, Illness is no doubt the final cause of the whole urge to create. By creating, I could recover. By creating, I became healthy.[5]

DR LECLAIRE: That is to say that this internal work, in which real objects and imaginary objects are equivalent . . .

Freud doesn't say that they are equivalent. He says that at the point we have reached in the formation of the external world, it is a matter of indifference whether one considers them as real or imaginary. The difference only makes its appearance later, when the damming up has had its effects.

DR LECLAIRE: So I come to the second sub-chapter of the second part, in which Freud tells us that another important point in the study of narcissism is to be found in the analysis of the difference in modalities of the love life of man and woman. He thereby comes to the distinction between two types of choice which one may translate by anaclitic and narcissistic, and he studies their genesis. He is led to putting it as follows – A human being has originally two sexual objects – himself and the women who takes care of him.[6] We might start from there.

Himself, that's to say his image. It's absolutely clear.

DR LECLAIRE: He goes into greater detail prior to the genesis, to the form, even, of this choice. He notes that the initial auto-erotic sexual satisfactions serve a function in the preservation of the self. Then, he notes that the sexual drives are at first employed in the satisfaction of the ego-drives, only becoming autonomous later. Thus the child at first loves the object which satisfies the ego-drives, that is to say the person who takes care of him. Finally, he is led to define the narcissistic type of object choice, clearly seen, above all, he says, in those whose libidinal development has been disturbed.

That is to say in neurotics.

DR LECLAIRE: These two basic types correspond - as he had mentioned earlier – to the two basic types, masculine and feminine.

The two types – narcissistic and Anlehnung.

[4] English in the original.

[5] A modification of Strachey's translation (SE XIV 85 n3), following Lacan's more exact and literal French rendering of the German (GW X 151; Stud III 51).

[6] GW X 155; Stud III 55; SE XIV 88.

DR LECLAIRE: Anlehnung has the meaning of support.

The notion of Anlehnung does have some connection with the notion of dependency developed since. But it is a much larger and richer idea. Freud draws up a list of the different types of fixation in love, which has no reference whatsoever to what one might call a mature relationship – that myth of psychoanalysis. First of all, within the field of fixation in love, there is Verliebtheit, the narcissistic type. It is characterised as follows, that one loves – firstly, what one is oneself, that is to say, as Freud specifies in brackets, oneself – secondly, what one was – thirdly, what one would like to be – fourthly, the person who was a part of one's own self. That's the Narzissmustypus.

The Anlehnungstypus is no less imaginary, since it is also based on a reversal of identification. The subject thus takes his bearings on a primitive situation. One loves the woman who feeds and the man who protects.

DR LECLAIRE: Here, Freud puts forward a number of considerations which count as indirect proofs for the conception of the primary narcissism of the child, which he locates essentially – strange as it may seem – in the manner in which parents see their child.

That's the seduction exercised by narcissism. Freud points out what every human being finds fascinating and satisfying in the apprehension of a being whose perceived characteristics are those of this enclosed world, shut in on itself, satisfied, full, which the narcissistic type represents. He compares it to the supreme seduction a beautiful animal exerts.

DR LECLAIRE: He says – His Majesty the Baby. The child is what the parents make of it, in so far as they project the ideal on to it. Freud makes it clear that he will leave to one side the disturbances of the child's primary narcissism, even though that is a subject of great importance, since the question of the castration complex is linked to it. He takes the opportunity to give a more precise sense of where Adler's notion of the masculine protest belongs, by putting it back in its proper place . . .

DR LECLAIRE: . . . yes, it is of great importance, but he links it up with disturbances of the original primary narcissism. We thus come to the following important question – what happens to the ego libido in the normal adult? Are we forced to admit that it is completely subsumed in the object investments? Freud rejects this hypothesis, and reminds us of the existence of repression, which has, in the end, a normalising function. Repression, he says, and this is the essential point in the argument, proceeds from the ego, from its ethical and cultural requirements. The same impressions, experiences, impulses and desires that one man indulges or at least works over consciously will be rejected with the utmost indignation by another, or even stifled before they enter consciousness.[7] We have here a difference in behaviour, depending on the individual, depending on the person. Freud attempts to formulate this difference as follows - We can say that the one man has set up an ideal in himself by which he measures his actual[8] ego, while the other has formed no such ideal. For the ego the formation of an ideal would be the conditioning factor of repression. This ideal is now the target of the self-love which was enjoyed in childhood by the true[9] ego. And he goes on . . .

DR LECLAIRE: The text goes on – Narcissism seems to make its appearance displaced on to this new ideal ego, which finds itself in possession of all the ego's precious perfections, in the same way as the infantile ego was. As always where the libido is concerned, man has here again shown himself incapable of giving up a satisfaction he had once enjoyed. For the first time Freud uses the term 'ideal ego' in this sentence - this ideal ego is now the target of the self-love which was enjoyed in childhood by the true[10] ego. But he then says – He is not willing to forgo the narcissistic perfection of his childhood and [. . .] he seeks to recover it in the new form of an ego-ideal.[11] Here we find the two terms 'ideal ego' and 'ego-ideal'.

Given the rigour of Freud's writing, one of the puzzles of this text, very well brought out by Leclaire, is the coexistence in the same paragraph of the two terms.

DR LECLAIRE: It is amusing to observe how the word 'form' is substituted for the word 'ego'.

Exactly. And Freud makes use there of the Ichideal, which is precisely symmetrical and opposed to the Idealich. It's the sign that Freud is here designating two different functions. What does that mean? We are going to try and clarify it in a moment.

DR LECLAIRE: What caught my attention is that just when he substitutes the term ideal ego for ego-ideal, the ego-ideal is preceded by new form.

Of course.

DR LECLAIRE: The new form of his ego-ideal is what he projects before him as his ideal.

[7] GW X 160; Stud III 60; SE XIV 93. The first sentence of this passage is a loose paraphrase of the original German: 'Repression, we have said, proceeds from the ego; we might say with greater precision that it proceeds from the self-respect of the ego.'

[8] 'aktuelles' in German; 'actual' in SE; 'actuel' in French.

[9] SE gives 'actual'; French has 'véritable'; as Lacan points out the German is 'wirkliche'.

[10] 'wirkliche Ich'. [11] GW X 161; Stud III 61; SE XIV 94.

The next paragraph clears up this difficulty. For once, quite exceptionally in his work, Freud spells out the difference between sublimation and idealisation. Go on.

DR LECLAIRE: So Freud has postulated the existence of the ideal ego, which he then calls the ego-ideal, or form of the ideal ego. He says, from there, there is only one step to the searching out of the relations of the formation of the ideal to sublimation. Sublimation is a process involving object libido. In contrast, idealisation deals with the object which has been ennobled, elevated, and it does so without any modification in its nature. Idealisation is no less possible in the domain of ego libido than in that of object libido.

Once again, that amounts to saying that Freud places the two libidos on the same plane.

DR LECLAIRE: The idealisation of the ego may coexist with a failed sublimation. The formation of the ego-ideal heightens the demands of the ego and encourages repression to the full.

One is on the plane of the imaginary, and the other is on the plane of the symbolic – since the demand of the Ichideal takes up its place within the totality of demands of the law.

DR LECLAIRE: Hence sublimation opens up the expedient of satisfying this demand without involving repression.

That is successful sublimation.

DR LECLAIRE: That's how he rounds off this short paragraph dealing with the relations of the ego-ideal to sublimation. It would not surprise us, he goes on to say, if we were to find a special psychical agency which performs this task of seeing that narcissistic satisfaction from the ego-ideal is ensured and which, with this end in view, constantly watches the actual [aktuelle] ego and measures it by that ideal.[12] This hypothesis of a special psychical agency, which would thus have vigilance and security as its function, will eventually lead us to the super-ego. And Freud supports his argument with an example drawn from the psychoses in which, he says, this agency is clearly visible in delusions of being watched.[13] Before he discusses the syndrome of being watched, he makes it clear that, if such an agency exists, we are not in a position to discover it, but can only presuppose[14] it as such. To me, it seems singularly important that, in this, his first way of introducing the super-ego, he says that this agency does not exist, that one will not discover it, but can only presuppose it.

[12] GW X 162; Stud III 62; SE XIV 95.

[14] Freud's verb, 'agnoszieren', is rendered by Strachey as 'recognise'. The French verb Leclaire employs is 'supposer' (assume, presuppose, suppose). See p. 152 n8 below.

He adds that what we call our conscience fulfils this function, has this characteristic. The recognition of this agency throws light on paranoid symptomatology. A patient of this type complains of being watched, of hearing voices, of having his thoughts known, of being observed. They are right, Freud says, this complaint is justified. A power of this kind, watching, discovering and criticising all our intentions, does really exist. Indeed, it exists in every one of us in normal life. Then we find . . .

That is not quite the intended meaning. Freud says that, if such an agency exists, it is not possible that it is the sort of thing that we would not yet have discovered. That's because he identifies it with the censorship, as the examples he chooses reveal. He comes upon this agency again in delusions of being watched,[15] in which it becomes confused with the person who commands the subject's actions. He then recognises it in what is defined by Silberer as the functional phenomenon. According to Silberer, the subject's internal perception of his own mental states, of his mental mechanisms in so far as they are functions, just when he is sliding into a dream, plays a formative role. The dream symbolically transposes this perception, in the sense in which symbolic simply means imagistic. Here we have a spontaneous form of splitting of the subject. Freud always had an ambiguous attitude towards this conception of Silberer's, saying both that this phenomenon is extremely important, and that it is nonetheless secondary in relation to the manifestation of desire in the dream. Perhaps that is due to the fact, he remarks somewhere,[16] that he himself has a make-up such that this phenomenon does not possess the importance in his own dreams that it may have in other people's. This vigilance of the ego which Freud highlights, ever present in the dream, is the guardian of sleep, placed on the margins, as it were, of the dream's activity, and very often ready to comment on it in its own right. This residual participation of the ego is, like all the agencies which Freud takes account of under the rubric of the censorship, an agency which speaks, that is to say a symbolic agency.

Dr Leclaire: A sort of synthesis then follows, in which he opens up a discussion of the sense of self,[17] in the normal individual and the neurotic. The sense of self has three origins, which are – primary narcissistic satisfaction, the measure of success, that is to say the satisfaction of the desire for omnipotence, and the gratification received from love objects. These are the three roots of the sense of self which Freud seems to retain. It's not necessary, I think, to go into the detail of the discussion here. I would prefer to return to the first of the complementary remarks. What seems to me to be extremely important is this – The development of the ego consists in an estrangement from primary narcissism and gives rise to a vigorous attempt to recover that state. This departure is brought about by means of the displacement of libido on to an ego-ideal imposed from without, and satisfaction is brought about from fulfilling this ideal.[18] So the ego experiences a kind of estrangement, passing via a middle term, which is the ideal, and returns later to its primitive position. This movement seems to me to be the very image of development.

O. MANNONI: Its structuration.

Yes, structuration, that's quite right.

DR LECLAIRE: This displacement of the libido on to an ideal needs to be made more precise because it may be one of two things – either this displacement of the libido is carried out once again on to an image, on to an image of the ego, that is to say on to a form of the ego, which we call an ideal, since it is not similar to the one that is already there, or that was there – or else we will apply the term ego-ideal to something going beyond a form of the ego, to something which is quite properly an ideal, and which comes closer to the idea, to the form.

Agreed.

DR LECLAIRE: It's in this sense that we come to perceive, it seems to me, all of the richness of the sentence. But also its degree of ambiguity in as much as, if one talks of structuration, one then takes the ego-ideal to be the form of the ego-ideal. But that isn't made clear in this text.

M. HYPPOLITE: Could you read Freud's sentence again?

DR LECLAIRE: The development of the ego consists in an estrangement from primary narcissism and gives rise to a vigorous attempt to recover that state.

M. HYPPOLITE: But does one have take that to be the begetting of the ego-ideal?

DR LECLAIRE: No. Freud talks about the ego-ideal before. The estrangement is brought about by means of a displacement of the libido on to an ego-ideal imposed from without. And satisfaction is brought about by fulfilling this ideal. Obviously, to the extent that this ideal is fulfilled . . .

M. HYPPOLITE: . . . incapable of being fulfilled, because when all is said and done that is the origin of transcendence, destructive and fascinating.

DR LECLAIRE: It isn't made explicit, however. The first time that he talks of the ideal ego, it's in order to say that self-love now moves towards this ideal ego.

O. MANNONI: In my opinion, one often gets the impression that we are speaking several different languages. I think that one should perhaps distinguish between a development of the person and a structuration of the ego. Something of this sort will allow us to understand one another, because it is truly an ego which structures, but within a being which is developing.

Yes, we are deep in structuration. Precisely at the point where the entire analytic experience unfolds, at the joint of the imaginary and the symbolic. Just now, Leclaire raised the question about the function of the image and the function of what he called the idea. We know very well that the idea never lives all by itself. It lives with all the other ideas, Plato has already taught us that.

In order to bring a little light to bear, let's get the little apparatus going, the one I have been showing you these last few sessions.

Let's start with the animal, an animal which is also an ideal, that is to say successful – the unsuccessful one is the animal we managed to capture. This ideal animal gives us a vision of completeness, of fulfilment, because it presupposes the perfect fit, indeed the identity of the Innenwelt and the Umwelt. That's what makes this living form seductive, as its appearance harmoniously unfolds.

What does the development of instinctual functioning teach us in this respect? The extraordinary importance of the image. What comes into play in releasing the complementary behaviour of the male and female sticklebacks? Gestalten.

Let us simplify matters, and consider this functioning solely at one given moment. The male or female animal subject is captivated, as it were, by a Gestalt. The subject literally identifies itself with the releasing stimulus. The male is caught up in the zigzag dance on the basis of the relation that is set up between himself and the image which governs the releasing of the cycle of his sexual behaviour. The female is caught up in the same way in this mutual dance. This is not just the external manifestation of something which always has the aspect of a dance, of two-body gravitation. Up to now that has been one of the most difficult problems for physics to solve, but it comes about quite harmoniously in the natural world in the pairing relation. At that moment, the subject is found to be completely identical to the image which governs the complete releasing of a specific motor behaviour, which itself produces and echoes back to the partner, in a certain style, the command which makes it engage in the other part of the dance.

The natural appearance of this closed world of two gives us the image of the conjunction of the object libido and the narcissistic libido. In effect, each object's attachment to the other is produced by the narcissistic fixation on this image, because it is this image, and it alone, that it was expecting. That explains why, in the world of living things, only a partner of the same species – we never pay sufficient attention to this – is able to release this special form which we call sexual behaviour. With very few exceptions, which must be placed within the margin of error which natural events display.

Let us say that, in the animal world, the entire cycle of sexual behaviour is dominated by the imaginary. On the other hand, it is in sexual behaviour that we find the greatest possibilities of displacement occurring, even in animals. We already make use of it for experimental purposes when we present the animal with a lure, a false image, a male partner which is only a shadow bearing the dominant characteristics of the said animal. At the time of the manifestations of the phenotype that, in many species, occur at this biological moment which calls for sexual behaviour, the offering of this lure is sufficient to release the sexual behaviour. The possibility of displacement, the illusory, imaginary dimension, is essential to everything pertaining to the order of sexual behaviour.

Is this true for man, yes or no? This image could be it, this Idealich we've just been talking about. Why not? Still, it wouldn't occur to us to call this lure the Idealich. So where are we going to put it? Here my little apparatus reveals its virtues.

What are its implications? I've already explained to you the physical phenomenon of the real image, which can be produced by the spherical mirror, be seen in its place, be inserted into the world of real objects, be accommodated in it at the same time as real objects, even bringing to these real objects an imaginary disposition, namely by including, excluding, locating and completing them.

This is nothing other than the imaginary phenomenon which I just spelt out in detail for you in the animal. The animal makes a real object coincide with the image within him. And, what is more, as is indicated in Freud's texts, I would add that the coincidence of the image with a real object strengthens it, gives it substance, embodiment. At this moment, behaviour is released, such that the subject will be guided towards its object, with the image as go-between.

Does this happen in man?

In man, as we know, an eminent disorder characterises the manifestations of the sexual function. Nothing in it adapts. This image, around which we, we psychoanalysts, revolve, presents, whether in the neuroses or in the perversions, a sort of fragmentation, of rupture, of breaking up, of lack of adaptation, of inadequation. Here we come upon a game of hide and seek between the image and its normal object – if indeed we adopt the ideal of a norm at all in the functioning of sexuality. From then on how can we find a way of representing the mechanism whereby this disordered imagination finally succeeds, in spite of everything, in fulfilling its function?

I am trying to use simple terms so as to guide your thinking. We could make use of more complicated ones. But you see that this really is the question which analysts distractedly ask themselves, as they vigorously – and publicly – scratch their heads.

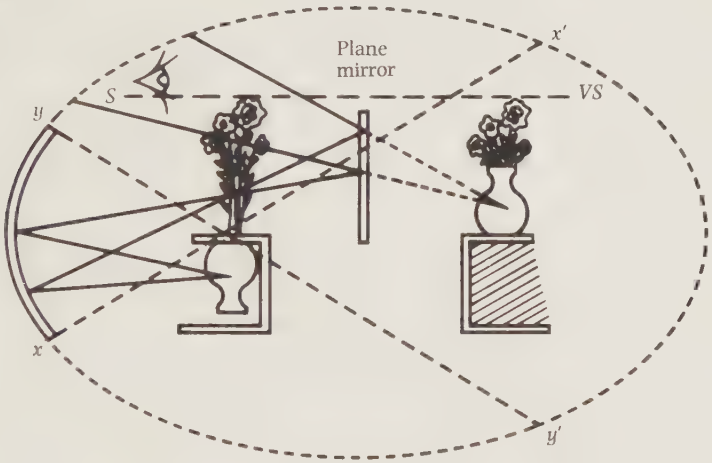
Take up any article, it doesn't matter which, for example the last one, which I read for your sake, by our dear friend Michael Balint – whose forthcoming visit to our Society I'll announce shortly. He asks the question – what is the end of the treatment? For the last session of our course this term, I would like – perhaps I won't do it, I don't know, it will depend whether I'm feeling inspired – I would like to talk to you about the termination of analysis. It's a jump, but doesn't our scrutiny of the mechanisms of resistance and of the transference allow it?

Well, what is the end of the treatment? Is it analogous to the end of a natural process? Genital love – this Eldorado promised to analysts, which we quite imprudently promise to our patients – is it a natural process? Isn't it, on the contrary, simply a series of cultural approximations which are only capable of being realised in certain cases? Is analysis, its termination, thus dependent on all sorts of contingencies?



Simplified schema of the two mirrors

What is the point? – if not to see what the function of the other, of the human other, is, in the adequation of the imaginary and the real.

Here we'll take up the little schema again. The finishing touch I added to it in our last session constitutes an essential element of what I am trying to demonstrate. The real image can only be seen in a consistent fashion within a limited field of the real space of the apparatus, the field in front of the apparatus, as constituted by the spherical mirror and the inverted bouquet.

We have placed the subject at the edge of the spherical mirror. But we know that the seeing of an image in the plane mirror is strictly equivalent for the subject to an image of the real object, which would be seen by a spectator beyond this mirror, at the very spot where the subject sees his image. We can therefore replace the subject by a virtual subject, VS, placed inside the cone which limits the possibility of the illusion – that's the field x'y'. The apparatus that I've invented shows, then, how, in being placed at a point very close to the real image, one is nevertheless capable of seeing it, in a mirror, as a virtual image. That is what happens in man.

What follows from this? A very special symmetry. In fact, the virtual subject, reflection of the mythical eye, that is to say the other which we are, is there where we first saw our ego – outside us, in the human form. This form is outside of us, not in so far as it is so constructed as to captate[19] sexual behaviour, but in so far as it is fundamentally linked to the primitive impotence of the human being. The human being only sees his form materialised, whole, the mirage of himself, outside of himself. This notion doesn't figure as yet in the article we are studying, it only emerges later in Freud's work.

What the subject, the one who exists, sees in the mirror is an image, whether sharp or broken up, lacking in consistency, incomplete. This depends on its position in relation to the real image. Too much towards the edge, and you'll see it poorly. Everything depends on the angle of incidence at the mirror. It's only from within the cone that one can have a clear image.

So whether you see the image more or less clearly depends on the inclination of the mirror. As for the virtual spectator, the one who becomes your substitute through the fiction of the mirror in order to see the real image, all that's necessary is for the plane mirror to be inclined in a specific way for him to be in the field in which one sees very poorly. From this fact alone, you will also see the image in the mirror very poorly. Let's say that this represents the uneasy accommodation of the imaginary in man.

Now let us postulate that the inclination of the plane mirror is governed by the voice of the other. This doesn't happen at the level of the mirror-stage, but it happens subsequently through our overall relation with others – the symbolic relation. From that point on, you can grasp the extent to which the regulation of the imaginary depends on something which is located in a transcendent fashion, as M. Hyppolite would put it – the transcendent on this occasion being nothing other than the symbolic connection between human beings.

What is the symbolic connection? Dotting our i's and crossing our t's, it is the fact that socially we define ourselves with the law as go-between. It is through the exchange of symbols that we locate our different selves [mois] in relation to one another – you, you are Mannoni, and me Jacques Lacan, and we have a certain symbolic relation, which is complex, according to the different planes on which we are placed, according to whether we're together in the police station, or together in this hall, or together travelling.

In other words, it's the symbolic relation which defines the position of the subject as seeing. It is speech, the symbolic relation, which determines the greater or lesser degree of perfection, of completeness, of approximation, of the imaginary. This representation allows us to draw the distinction between the Idealich and the Ichideal, between the ideal ego and the ego-ideal. The ego-ideal governs the interplay of relations on which all relations with others depend. And on this relation to others depends the more or less satisfying character of the imaginary structuration.

A schema like this one shows you that the imaginary and the real act on the same level. To understand this, all we have to do is to make another little improvement in the apparatus. Think of the mirror as a pane of glass. You'll see yourself in the glass and you'll see the objects beyond it. That's exactly how it is – it's a coincidence between certain images and the real. What else are we talking about when we refer to an oral, anal, genital reality, that is to say a specific relation between our images and images? This is nothing other than the images of the human body, and the hominisation of the world, its perception in terms of images linked to the structuration of the body. The real objects, which pass via the mirror, and through it, are in the same place as the imaginary object. The essence of the image is to be invested by the libido. What we call libidinal investment is what makes an object become desirable, that is to say how it becomes confused with this more or less structured image which, in diverse ways, we carry with us.

So this schema allows you to represent to yourself the difference which Freud always carefully drew, and which often remains puzzling to readers, between topographical regression and genetic, archaic regression, regression in history as we are also taught to designate it.

Depending on the inclination of the mirror, the image in the spherical mirror is more or less successfully set up at the centre or on the edges. One might even conceive of it being modified. How does the primitive mouth get transformed, in the end, into a phallus? – it would perhaps be easy to knock up a little model of entertaining physics for this problem. This shows you that, in man, no truly effective and complete imaginary regulation can be set up without the intervention of another dimension. Which is what analysis, mythically at least, aims at.

What is my desire? What is my position in the imaginary structuration? This position is only conceivable in so far as one finds a guide beyond the imaginary, on the level of the symbolic plane, of the legal exchange which can only be embodied in the verbal exchange between human beings. This guide governing the subject is the ego-ideal.

This distinction is absolutely essential, and it allows us to make sense of what happens in analysis on the imaginary plane, which we call transference.

To get hold of it – this is the value of Freud's text – one has to understand what Verliebtheit is, what love is. Love is a phenomenon which takes place on the imaginary level, and which provokes a veritable subduction of the symbolic, a sort of annihilation, of perturbation of the function of the ego-ideal. Love reopens the door – as Freud put it, not mincing his words – to perfection.

The Ichideal, the ego-ideal, is the other as speaking, the other in so far as he has a symbolic relation to me [moi], which, within the terms of our dynamic manipulation, is both similar to and different from the imaginary libido. Symbolic exchange is what links human beings to each other, that is, it is speech, and it makes it possible to identify the subject. That isn't a metaphor – the symbol begets intelligent beings, as Hegel says.

The Ichideal, considered as speaking, can come to be placed in the world of objects on the level of the Idealich, that is, on the level where this narcissistic captation which Freud talks about over and over again throughout this text can take place. You can rest assured that when this confusion occurs, the apparatus can't be regulated any longer. In other words, when you're in love, you are mad, as ordinary language puts it.

I would like at this point to give an illustration of love at first sight. Remember the first time Werther sees Lotte, as she is cuddling a child. It's an entirely satisfying image for the Anlehnungstypus on the anaclitic plane. It is the way the object coincides with Goethe's hero's fundamental image that triggers off[20] his fatal attachment – next time we must clarify why this attachment is fundamentally fatal. That's what love is. It's one's own ego that one loves in love, one's own ego made real on the imaginary level.

People go crazy thinking about this problem – how can a transference be so easily generated in neurotics, when they are so fettered when it comes to love? The production of transference has an absolutely universal character, truly automatic, whereas the demands of love are, on the contrary, as everyone knows, so specific . . . It's not every day that you come upon something which is constructed so as to give you the very image of your desire. How is it, then, that within the analytic relation, the transference, which has the same nature as love – Freud says it in the text which I gave Granoff to go through – arises, one can say even before the analysis has started? To be sure, it isn't perhaps quite the same thing before and during analysis.

I see that the clock ticks on, and I don't want to keep you after quarter to two. I will start off with these questions next time – how does the function of transference, triggered off[20] almost automatically in the analysand/analyst relation – before it has even begun, on account of the presence and function of analysis – how does it allow us to bring into play the imaginary function of the Idealich?

THE IMAGE OF DEATH
THE SLEEPER'S REAL SELF
THE NAME, THE LAW
FROM THE FUTURE TO THE PAST

It was Alain who pointed out that no one counts the number of columns on his mental image of the Pantheon. To which I would have liked to have answered him – except the architect of the Pantheon. So here we are, ushered through this little gateway, into the relations between the real, the imaginary and the symbolic.

M. HYPPOLITE: Can one ask a question about the structure of the optical image? I want to ask for some material specifications. If I've correctly understood the material structure, there is a spherical mirror, and the real image of the object is inverted in the middle of the mirror. This image would be on a screen. Instead of being formed on a screen, we can look at it with the eye.

Exactly. Because it's a real image, in as much as the eye accommodates itself within a specific plane, designated by the real object. In the amusing experiment which I drew inspiration from, there was an inverted bouquet which was placed in the neck of a real vase. In so far as the eye accommodates itself to the real image, it sees it. It is clearly delineated in as much as the light rays all converge on the same point in virtual space, that is to say in as much as, for every point on the object, there corresponds a point on the image.

M. HYPPOLITE: If the eye is placed within the luminous cone, it sees the image. If not, it doesn't see it.

The experiment proves that, for it to be perceived, the observer must be not very far removed from the axis of the spherical mirror, within a sort of continuation of the outward curvature of this mirror.

M. HYPPOLITE: In that case, if we introduce a plane mirror, the plane mirror gives a virtual image of the real image we are considering as the object.

Everything which can be directly seen can also be seen in a mirror. It is exactly the same as if it were seen as making up a set composed of symmetrical parts, one real, the other virtual, corresponding to one another. The virtual part corresponds to the opposed real part, and inversely, in such a manner that the virtual image in the mirror is seen in the same way as the real image would be by an imaginary, virtual observer, who occupies the symmetrical position in the mirror, the real image functioning on this occasion as the object.

M. HYPPOLITE: I've gone back to construction sets again, just as in the days of exams or prelims.[1] But here, there's also an eye which looks in the mirror in order to see the virtual image of the real image.

As long as I can see the real image, I will see it just as well, placing the mirror at a half-way point, either appearing from where I am, that is at a place which may vary between the real image and spherical mirror, or even behind it. What I'll see appearing in the mirror, if it is appropriately positioned, that is to say if it is perpendicular to the axis of a moment ago, is the self-same real image outlined against the confused background given by the concavity of a spherical mirror in a plane one.

M. HYPPOLITE: When I look in the mirror, I simultaneously perceive the virtual bouquet of flowers and my virtual eye.

Yes, as long as my real eye exists, and isn't itself an abstract point. For I've emphasised that we aren't eyes. And, in saying this, I'm beginning to slip into abstraction.

M. HYPPOLITE: So, I've properly understood the image. There remains the symbolic correspondence.

That is what I am going to try to explain a bit to you.

M. HYPPOLITE: What play of correspondences is there between the real object, the flowers, the real image, the virtual image, the real eye and the virtual eye? Let's start with the real object – what do the real flowers represent for you?

The point of this schema is, of course, that it can be put to a variety of uses. Freud had already constructed something similar, and quite specifically pointed out to us in the Traumdeutung and the Abriss that the psychic agencies should be conceived of on the basis of imaginary phenomena. In the Traumdeutung he made use of the schema of layers, in which perceptions and memories are inscribed, the former forming the conscious, the latter the unconscious, which comes to be projected on to consciousness, eventually closing the stimulus-response circuit, with which one tried to explain the organism's circuit at that time. We can see in it something like the superposition of photographic films. But it is quite clear that his schema is imperfect. Because . . .

M. HYPPOLITE: I've already got the hang of your schema. I am looking for the initial correspondences.

The original correspondences? To clarify matters, we can give the real image, which has the function of containing and, at the same time, of excluding several real objects, the signification of the limits of the ego. However, if you give such a function to one element of the model, other elements necessarily take on other functions. All that counts here is the way the relations are put to use.

M. HYPPOLITE: Could one, for example, say that the real object signifies the Gegenbild, the sexual replica of the ego? In the animal schema, the male finds the Gegenbild, that is to say his complementary counterpart in the structure.

Since you need a Gegenbild . . .

M. HYPPOLITE: The word is Hegel's.

The very term Gegenbild implies correspondence with an Innenbild, which boils down to the correspondence of the Innenwelt with the Umwelt.

M. HYPPOLITE: Which prompts me to say that if the real object, the flowers, represents the real object correlative to the perceiving animal subject, then the real image of the flower pot represents the reflected imaginary structure of this real structure.

You couldn't have put it better. That's exactly what happens when one is dealing with an animal. And that is what happens in my first construction, where there is only the spherical mirror, when the experiment is limited to showing how the real image is mixed in with real things. That, in fact, is one way of representing the Innenbild which allows the animal to seek out its specific partner, in the manner in which the key seeks out a keyhole, or the keyhole seeks out the key, directing its libido where it has to be for the propagation of the species. I've pointed out to you that, from this point of view, we can already grasp in an impressionistic way the essentially transitory character of the individual in relation to the type.

Not only the cycle of the species, but the fact that the individual is so much a captive of the type that, in relation to this type, it is annihilated. It is, as Hegel would say – I don't know if he said it – already dead in relation to the eternal life of the species.

M. HYPPOLITE: I made Hegel say this sentence, in commenting on your image – that in fact, knowledge, that is to say humanity, is the failure of sexuality.

That's going a bit too far.

M. HYPPOLITE: For me what is important is that the real object can be understood as the real counterpart, which pertains to the order of the species, of the real individual. But then a development in the imaginary takes place, which allows this counterpart in the single spherical mirror also to become a real image, an image which fascinates, as such, in the very absence of the real object which is projected into the imaginary, an image which fascinates the individual and captates[2] him right up to the plane mirror.

You know what a delicate matter it is to measure what is and what isn't perceived by an animal, because, for it just as for man, perception seems to extend much further than one is able to bring out in experimental, that is to say artificial behaviour. Sometimes we realise that it is capable of making choices with the help of things the existence of which we did not suspect. Nonetheless, we know that, when it is engaged in a cycle of behaviour of the instinctual type, there takes place in it a thickening, a condensation, a dulling, of its perception of the external world. The animal is then so stuck within a number of imaginary conditions that we can lure it most easily, just when it would be of the greatest use for it not to be fooled. Libidinal fixation on certain terms here appears as a kind of funnel.

That is our starting point. But, if it is necessary to construct an apparatus which is a little more complex and tricky for man, it is because, for him, it doesn't happen like that.

Since you have been kind enough to get me started again today, I don't see why I shouldn't begin by reminding you of the fundamental Hegelian theme – man's desire is the desire of the other.

That is exactly what is made plain in the model by the plane mirror. That is also where we again come upon Jacques Lacan's classical mirror phase, this turning point [moment de virage] in development, in which the individual makes a triumphant exercise of his own image in the mirror, of himself. Through certain correlations in his behaviour, we can understand that what occurs here for the first time, is the anticipated seizure of mastery.

Here we are also touching on something else, which I've called the Urbild, using Bild in a different sense from the way you used it just now – the first model in which man's delay, the unsticking of man in relation to his own libido, is noticeable. This gap means that there's a radical difference between the satisfaction of a desire and the pursuit of the fulfilment of desire – desire is essentially a negativity, introduced at a point in time which is not especially primary, but which is crucial, a turning-point [tournant]. Desire is first grasped in the other, and in the most confused form. The relativity of human desire in relation to the desire of the other is what we recognise in every reaction of rivalry, of competition, and even in the entire development of civilization, including this sympathetic and fundamental exploitation of man by man whose end is by no means yet in sight, for the reason that it is absolutely structural to, and constitutes, as Hegel acknowledged once and for all, the very structure of the idea of labour. To be sure, it is no longer a question of desire here, but of the total mediation of activity in so far as it is specifically human, in so far as it has taken the path of human desires.

The subject originally locates and recognises desire through the intermediary, not only of his own image, but of the body of his fellow being. It's exactly at that moment that the human being's consciousness, in the form of consciousness of self, distinguishes itself. It is in so far as he recognises his desire in the body of the other that the exchange takes place. It is in so far as his desire has gone over to the other side that he assimilates himself to the body of the other and recognises himself as body.

Nothing allows us to assert that the animal has a consciousness separated from its body as such, that its corporeality is an objectifiable entity for it . . .

M. Hyppolite: Statutory, in both senses.

Exactly. Whereas it is certain that, if there is for us a fundamental given even before the register of the unhappy consciousness has emerged at all, it's precisely the distinction between our consciousness and our body. This distinction makes our body into something factitious, from which our consciousness is entirely incapable of detaching itself, but on the basis of which it conceives itself – these are not perhaps the most adequate terms – as distinct.

The distinction between consciousness and body is set up in this abrupt interchange of roles which takes place in the experience of the mirror when the other is involved.

Mannoni yesterday evening remarked that, in interpersonal relations, something factitious is always brought in, namely the projection of others on to ourselves. This is no doubt because we recognise ourselves as body in so far as these others, who are indispensable for the recognition of our desire, also have bodies, or more exactly, in so far as we have one like them.

M. Hyppolite: What I fail to understand, is not so much the distinction between oneself and the body, as the distinction between two bodies.

Of course.

M. HYPPOLITE: Since the self represents itself as the ideal body, and since there is also the body I feel, there are two . . .?

No, certainly not. That's where the Freudian discovery acquires its full importance – man, in his initial stages, does not from the first in any way accede to a surmounted desire. What he recognises and fixes in this image of the other is a fragmented desire. And the apparent mastery of the mirror image is given to him, at least virtually, as complete. It is an ideal mastery.

M. HYPPOLITE: That is what I call the ideal body.

It is the Idealich. As for his desire, that, in contrast, is not constituted. What the subject finds in the other is first of all a series of ambivalent planes, of alienations of his desire – of a desire still in pieces. Everything we know about the evolution of instincts yields us its schema, since Freud's libido theory is built upon the preservation, upon the progressive compounding of a number of partial drives, which may or may not succeed in leading to a mature desire.

M. HYPPOLITE: I think that we are in complete agreement. Yes? But, you were saying no just now. We are in complete agreement. If I say two bodies, that simply means that what I see as being constituted either in the other, or in my own image in the mirror, is what I am not, and in fact is what is beyond me. That is what I call the ideal, statutory body, or statue. As Valéry says in La Jeune Parque – But my statue quivers at the same time,[3] that is to say disintegrates. Its disintegration is what I call the other body.

The body as fragmented desire seeking itself out, and the body as ideal self, are projected on the side of the subject as fragmented body, while it sees the other as perfect body. For the subject, a fragmented body is an image essentially dismemberable from its body.

M. HYPPOLITE: The two project themselves on to each other in the sense that, all at once, it sees itself as statue and dismembers itself at the same time, projecting the dismembering on to the statue, within a dialectic which cannot be brought to an end. I apologise for repeating what you have said, just to be sure that I've really understood.

In a moment, if you want, we'll go one step further.

After all, the real is obviously right here, on this side of the mirror. But what is beyond it? First of all, there is, as we have already seen, the primitive imaginary of the specular dialectic with the other.

This fundamental dialectic already introduces the fatal dimension of the death instinct, in two senses. Firstly, the libidinal captation has an irremediably fatal significance for the individual, in so far as it is subjected to the x of eternal life. Secondly – and this is the point emphasised by Freud's thought, but isn't fully made out in Beyond the Pleasure Principle – the death instinct in man takes on another signification in that his libido is originally constrained to pass through an imaginary stage.

In addition, this image of an image is what disrupts the maturity of the libido in man, disrupts the smooth fitting together of reality and the imaginary which should in principle exist, according to our hypothesis – since, after all, what do we know about it? – in animals. In animals, the securing of the guide-rails is so much more in evidence that it is precisely what has given rise to the great fantasy of natura mater, the very idea of nature, in relation to which man portrays his original inadequacy to himself, which he expresses in a thousand different ways. You can spot it, in a perfectly objectifiable manner, in his quite special impotence at the beginning of life. This prematurity of birth hasn't been invented by the psychoanalysts. Histologically, the apparatus which in the organism plays the role of nervous system, still a matter for debate, is not complete at birth. Man's libido attains its finished state before encountering its object. That is how this special fault is introduced, perpetuated in man in the relation to the other who is infinitely more fatal for him than for any other animal. This image of the master, which is what he sees in the form of the specular image, becomes confused in him with the image of death. Man can be in the presence of the absolute master. He is in his presence from the beginning, whether he has been taught this or not, in so far as he is subjected to this image.

M. Hyppolite: The animal is bound by death when he makes love, but he doesn't know anything about it.

Whereas man knows it. He knows it and feels it.

M. Hyppolite: That amounts to saying that he himself takes his own life. Through the other he wants his own death.

We are all completely agreed that love is a form of suicide.

Dr Lang: There's one point you have insisted on, and I haven't fully grasped the significance of your insistence. It is the fact that one has to be within a certain field in relation to the apparatus we're studying.

I see that I haven't shown you enough petticoat, since you've seen the frills but not how they're tied on.

What's at issue here can once again come into play on several planes. We can interpret things at the level of structuration, or of description, or of the management of the cure. It is particularly useful to have a schema such that the apparition of the image at a given moment be dependent upon the activation of a plane of reflection – the subject remaining always in the same place. Only from a specific virtual point of observation can one see the image with sufficient completeness. You can shift this virtual point around as you wish. Now, when the mirror veers round, what changes?

It will not only be the backdrop, that is, what the subject can see at the back, for example himself – or an echo of himself, as M. Hyppolite has observed. In fact, when you move a plane mirror, there comes a point when a certain number of objects leave the field. Clearly the closest ones are the last to leave, which may already be useful in explaining some of the ways in which the Idealich is placed in relation to something else which for the moment I leave in an enigmatic form, and which I have called the observer. Quite obviously it's not just an observer. In the end what is involved is the symbolic relation, namely the point from which one speaks, it is spoken.

But it is not only this which changes. If you put the mirror at an angle, the image itself changes. Without the real image moving, simply because the mirror changes, the image that the subject, placed on the side of the spherical mirror, will see in this mirror, will pass from having the form of a mouth to that of a phallus, or from a more or less complete desire to that type of desire which a moment ago I called fragmented. In other words, this mode of functioning allows us to see what was always Freud's idea, namely the possible correlations between the notion of topographical [topique] regression and the regression he called zeitlich-Entwicklungsgeschichte – which clearly shows how embarrassed by the temporal relation he himself was. He says zeitlich, that's to say temporal, then a hyphen, and – history of development, whereas you're well aware what an internal contradiction there is between the term Entwicklung and the term Geschichte.[4] He joins these three terms together, then, sort that one out for yourselves!

But if we didn't have to sort it out, we wouldn't need to be here. And that would be a great pity.

Go on, Perrier, with the 'Metapsychological supplements to the theory of dreams'.

Did this text seem a bit of a problem to you?

DR PERRIER: As a matter of fact, yes. I think the best thing to do would without doubt be to make a schema of it. It's an article that Freud opens by telling us that it is instructive to set out a parallel between certain morbid symptoms and the normal prototypes which allow us to study them, for example, mourning and melancholia, the dream, sleep and certain narcissistic states.

[4] The passage Lacan is referring to, (1917d) GW X 418; Stud III 184; SE XIV 227, reads 'zeitlichen oder entwicklungsgeschichtlichen' ('zeitlichen' emphasised in the original).

By the way, he uses the term Vorbild, which has much the same meaning as the term Bildung, to designate the normal prototype.

Dr Perrier: Freud comes to the study of the dream with an aim which comes clear at the end of the article, of going more deeply into the study of those phenomena which one comes across in the narcissistic disorders, in schizophrenia for example.

The normal prefigurations in a morbid disorder, Normalvorbilder krankhafter Affektionen.[5]

Dr Perrier: So, he says that sleep is a state of psychic undressing, which restores the sleeper to a state analogous to the primitive foetal state, and which in the same way brings him to divest himself of an entire part of his psychic organisation, just as one takes off a wig, false teeth, clothes, before going to sleep.

With regard to this image of the subject's narcissism which he gives us, and which he takes to be the fundamental essence of sleep, it's rather funny to see Freud add the remark, which doesn't quite seem to fit within a straightforwardly physiological perspective, that it is not true for all human beings. Sure, you usually do take off your clothes, but you put on others. Look at the picture that he paints all of a sudden, of taking off one's glasses – some of us are endowed with infirmities which make them necessary – but also one's false teeth, one's false hair. A hideous picture of a disintegrating being. We thus come upon this partially decomposable, collapsible character of the human ego, whose limits are so imprecisely defined. Surely false teeth are not a part of my ego, but to what extent are my real teeth? – if they are so easily replaced. The idea of the ambiguous, uncertain character of the limits of the ego is put to the fore here, in the portico of the introduction to the metapsychological study of the dream. The preparation for sleep reveals its importance.

Dr Perrier: In the next paragraph, Freud takes up something which appears to be the short cut to everything he is going to study from then on. He recalls that when one studies the psychoses, in every case one finds oneself in the presence of temporal regressions, that is to say of those points in the stages of its own evolution to which every case returns.[6] He then says that one comes across similar regressions, one in the evolution of the ego, and the other in the evolution of the libido. The regression of the evolution of the libido in the dream[7] which corresponds to all of this will, he says, lead to the re-establishing of primitive narcissism. The regression of the evolution of the ego in the dream will in the same way lead to the hallucinatory satisfaction of desire. This, a priori, doesn't seem to be particularly clear, at least not to me.

It might be a bit clearer with our schema.

DR PERRIER: You can already get an inkling of it, in seeing how Freud starts with temporal regressions, of regressions in the subject's history. Consequently, regression in the evolution of the ego leads to this completely elementary, primordial, unelaborated state, which is the hallucinatory satisfaction of desire. He will, first of all, enjoin us to go over with him once again the study of the dream-processes, and in particular, the study of the narcissism of sleep, in terms of what takes place in it, that is to say the dream. First of all he talks about the dream's egoism, which is a term which shocks a bit when comparing it with narcissism.

How does he justify the egoism of the dream?

DR PERRIER: He says that in the dream, the principal protagonist is always the sleeper.

Who also plays the leading role. Who can tell me exactly what agnoszieren means? It's a German term which I haven't been able to find. But its meaning is not in doubt – it's a question of this person who must always be recognised as the person himself, als die eigener [Person] zu agnoszieren.[8] Can someone give me some idea of the use of this word? Freud doesn't use anerkennen, which would imply the dimension of recognition in the sense in which we always understand it in our dialectic. The person of the sleeper is to be recognised, at which level, that of our interpretation or that of our mantic? It is not quite the same thing. Between anerkennen and agnoszieren, there's all the difference between what we understand and what we know, a difference which nonetheless bears the mark of a fundamental ambiguity. See how Freud himself analyses for us the celebrated dream of the botanical monograph in the Traumdeutung. The further we get the more we see how inspired these initial approaches towards the meaning of the dream and its scenario actually were.

Mme X, can you give us a hint about this agnoszieren?

MME X: Sometimes Freud uses Viennese words. This word is no longer used in German, but the meaning you have given is correct.

Indeed, it's interesting, the significance of the Viennese milieu.

In this connection, Freud gives us a very deep sense of his relation with the fraternal character, with this friend-enemy, who he says is a character absolutely fundamental to his existence – there must always be someone masked by this sort of Gegenbild. But, at the same time, it is with this character as go-between, embodied by his colleague from the laboratory – I've mentioned this character in earlier seminars, right at the beginning, when we talked a bit about the first stages of Freud's scientific life – it is in relation to and through the intermediary of this colleague, of his acts, of his feelings, that Freud projects, brings to life in this dream what is its latent desire, namely the claims of his own aggression, of his own ambition. Such that this eigene Person is entirely ambiguous. It is right at the heart of the dream's consciousness, more exactly at the heart of the mirage of the dream that we have to search, in the person who plays the leading role, for the sleeper's own person. But the point is that, it is not the sleeper, it is the other.

[8] GW X 413; Stud III 180; SE XIV 223. Agnoszieren is used in the passage which Lacan and Leclaire commented upon (pp. 134 n14 above) – there, it is rendered into French as 'supposer' (assume, suppose), the sense that Leclaire highlights, opposing it to 'discover'. Lacan emphasises the fact that it is impossible that we haven't yet discovered it. On both occasions, SE translates 'agnoszieren' as 'recognise'.

Dr Perrier: He then asks if narcissism and egoism are not in fact one and the same thing. And he tells us that the word narcissism serves only to underline the libidinal character of egoism. In other words, narcissism may be considered as the libidinal complement of egoism. In a parenthetical clause, he talks about the diagnostic capacity of the dream, by reminding us that one often perceives in dreams, in a way that is completely unapparent in the waking state, organic modifications which allow one to offer a diagnosis of something still unapparent in the waking state. At this point, the problem of hypochondria makes its appearance.

Here, then, is something a bit crafty, a bit more clever. Think hard about what it means. I talked to you about the exchange that takes place between the subject's image and the image of the other in so far as it is libidinalised, narcissised, in the imaginary situation. By the same token, in the same way as in animals, certain parts of the world are rendered opaque and become fascinating, it too is rendered thus. We have the capacity to agnoszieren in the dream the sleeper's own person in a pure state. The power of understanding of the subject is expanded in proportion. On the contrary, in the waking state, at least if he hasn't read the Traumdeutung, he won't be able to perceive in its sufficiency those bodily sensations capable of telling him, while he is sleeping, about something internal, something coenaesthetic. It is precisely in so far as the libidinal obscuring in the dream is on the other side of the mirror, that his body is, not felt any the less, but perceived better, understood by the subject.

Do you grasp the mechanism here?

In the waking state, the body of the other is reflected back to the subject, he thus fails to recognise lots of things about himself. That the ego is a capacity to fail to recognise [méconnaissance] is the very foundation of the technique of analysis.

This goes a very long way. As far as structuration, organisation and by the same token scotomisation – here, I am happy enough to use the term – and all manner of things, which are so many pieces of information which can be passed from ourselves to ourselves – a special game which reflects back to us our corporeality, that corporeality which also has an alien origin. Even as far as – They have eyes in order not to see. You must always take the phrases of the Evangelist literally, if you don't it's obvious you won't understand anything – people think that it is ironic.

Dr Perrier: The dream is also a projection, an externalisation of an internal process. Freud reminds us that the externalisation of an internal process is a means of defence against waking. In hysterical phobias, there is the same projection, which is itself a means of defence, and which replaces an internal function. Except, he says, why does the intention to sleep find itself thwarted? It can be either through a stimulus coming from outside, or through an excitation coming from within. The case of the internal obstacle is the more interesting, that is the one we are going to study.

One must go over this passage carefully, because it allows one to introduce a bit of rigour into the usage, in analysis, of the term projection. It is continually employed in the most confused way. In particular, we slide all the time into the classical usage of the term, in speaking of the projection of our feelings on to our fellow beings. That is not quite what is involved when we are obliged, by force of circumstance, that is to say by the law of the system's coherence, to make use of the term in analysis. If we manage to get to the Schreber case and the question of the psychoses next term, we will have to spell out in its fine detail the meaning to be given to projection.

If you followed what I said just now, you must see that what is here called the internal process always comes from the outside. It is first recognised through the intermediary of the outside.

Dr Perrier: This is a problem that I encountered with Father Beirnaert and Andrée Lehmann, who helped me yesterday evening – the preconscious desire of the dream, what is it?

What Freud calls the desire of the dream is the unconscious element.

Dr Perrier: Exactly. Freud says that first the preconscious desire of the dream is formed, in the waking state I presume, which allows the unconscious drive to express itself, thanks to the material, that is to say, in the preconscious residues of the previous day. That's the point at which my perplexing question arose. Having used the term preconscious desire of the dream, Freud says that there was no need of its presence in the waking state, and it may already possess the irrational character peculiar to everything which is unconscious. One translates it in terms of the conscious.

Which is important.

Dr Perrier: One must be careful, he says, not to confuse the dream's desire with everything that pertains to the order of the preconscious.

That's it!

See how one usually understands this after having read it. One says – here's the manifest and there's the latent. Then one gets caught up in a number of complications. What is manifest is the composition. The work on the dream makes it possible – through a very pretty turnaround of its initial aspect, as memory – for the subject to evoke for you what is manifest. But what makes up the dream is something which we must look for, and which truly belongs to the unconscious. This desire, we find it or we don't find it, but we only ever see it silhouetted at the back. The unconscious desire is like the directing force which has forced all the Tagesresten, these vaguely lucid investments, to become organised in a certain way. This composition results in the manifest contents, that is to say in a mirage which in no way corresponds to what we are obliged to reconstruct, which is the unconscious desire.

How can we represent this with my little schema? M. Hyppolite, in a timely manner, made me pull out all the stops at the beginning of this session. We won't be able to settle this question today. But we must at least make some headway.

At this point, it is indispensable to bring in what one might call the controls of the apparatus.

So, the subject becomes aware of his desire in the other, through the intermediary of the image of the other which offers him the semblance of his own mastery. Just as we quite frequently reduce the subject to an eye in our scientific reasoning, we could just as well reduce him to an actor momentarily caught up in the anticipated image of himself, quite independently of his development. But there's no escaping the fact that he's a human being, born in a state of impotence, and, very early on, words, language were what he used to call with, and a most miserable call it was, when his food depended on his screams. This primitive mothering has already been related to his states of dependency. But really that is no reason to hide the fact that, no less early, this relation to the other is named, and is so by the subject.

That a name, however confused it may be, designates a specific person, is exactly what makes up the transition to the human state. If one has to define the moment at which man becomes human, we can say that it is the moment when, however little it be, he enters into the symbolic relation.

As I've already emphasised, the symbolic relation is eternal. And not simply because effectively there must always be three people – it is eternal because the symbol introduces a third party, an element of mediation, which brings the two actors into each other's presence, leads them on to another plane, and changes them.

I want to take up this point again, and at length, even if that means breaking off in the middle today.

M. Keller, who is a gestalt philosopher, and who, by virtue of this, believes himself to be very much superior to the mechanicist philosophers, is very ironical about the theme of the stimulus-response. Somewhere he says the following – it really is odd to receive from Mr So-and-so, a publisher in New York, an order for a book, because if we were in the register of stimulus-response, one would believe that I had been stimulated by this order and that my book is the response. Oh, dear me, says Keller, appealing to our so well founded everyday intuitions, things aren't so simple. I am not just satisfied to reply to this request, I also find myself in a state of terrible tension. My equilibrium – a gestalt notion – will only be restored when this tension has taken on the form of a realisation of the text. This call I have received produces a dynamic state of disequilibrium in me. It will only be satisfied when it has been assumed, that is to say, when the circle has been closed, that circle which here and now is anticipated by the very existence of this call for a full response.[9]

This is by no means a sufficient description. Keller assumes that a preformed model of the right response exists in the subject, and introduces an element of the already-there. At the limit, it's having a response to everything through a dormative power. He is satisfied with postulating that the register of relations which generate any action means that the subject hasn't actualised the model which is already entirely inscribed within him. That is only the transcription, at a slightly more developed level, of the mechanistic theory.

No, you must not misconceive [méconnaître] the symbolic register here, through which the human being as such is constituted. In fact, from the moment that M. Keller receives the order, has replied yes, has signed a contract, M. Keller is not the same M. Keller. There's another Keller, a contracted Keller, and also another publishing house, a publishing house which has one more contract, one more symbol.

I am using this crude, obvious example because it brings us to the heart of the dialectic of labour. Simply as a result of having defined myself in relation to some man as his son, and of my having defined him as my father, something happens which, however intangible it may appear to be, weighs just as heavily as the carnal procreation which unites us. And, practically speaking, within the human order, it weighs even more heavily. Because, even before I am capable of pronouncing the words father and son, and even if he is gaga and can no longer pronounce these words, the entire human system around us already defines us, with all the impending consequences that that brings with it, as father and son.

So, the dialectic of the ego and the other is transcended, is placed on a higher plane, in relation to the other, solely through the function of language, in so far as it is more or less identical, and at all events is fundamentally linked up with what we should call the rule, or better still, the law. At each instant of its intervention, this law creates something new. Every situation is transformed by its intervention, whatever it is, except when we talk to no purpose.

[9] The French word 'réponse' covers both the English 'response' (as in 'stimulus-response') and the term 'reply' (as in 'reply' to a call from the other).

But even this, as I've explained elsewhere, has its meaning. This realisation of language, now only serving as an effaced coin passed from hand to hand in silence – a phrase I quoted in my Rome report, which comes from Mallarmé – indicates the pure function of language, which is to assure us that we are, and nothing more.[10] That one is capable of speaking to no purpose is just as significant as the fact that, when one speaks, in general it is for a purpose. What is striking is that there are many instances when one speaks although one might just as well remain silent. Ah, but to keep silent just then is precisely what is most cunning.

Here we are, introduced to this elementary level where language immediately adheres to our first experiences. Because it is a vital necessity which makes of man's environment a symbolic one.

In my little model, in order to conceive of the incidence of the symbolic relation, all you have to do is assume that it is the introduction of linguistic relations which produces the swings of the mirror, which will offer the subject, in the other, in the absolute other, the various aspects of his desire. There is a connection between the imaginary dimension and the symbolic system, so long as the history of the subject is inscribed in it – not the Entwicklung, the development, but the Geschichte, that is, that within which the subject recognises himself, correlatively in the past and in the future.

I know that I am saying these words quickly, but I will go over them again more slowly.

The past and the future correspond precisely to one another. And not any old how – not in the sense that you might believe that analysis indicates, namely from the past to the future. On the contrary, precisely in analysis, because its technique works, it happens in the right order – from the future to the past. You may think that you are engaged in looking for the patient's past in a dustbin, whereas on the contrary, it is as a function of the fact that the patient has a future that you can move in the regressive sense.

I cannot tell you why just now.

All human beings share in the universe of symbols. They are included in it and submit to it, much more than they constitute it. They are much more its supports than its agents. It is as a function of the symbols, of the symbolic constitution of his history, that those variations are produced in which the subject is open to taking on the variable, broken, fragmented, sometimes even unconstituted and regressive, images of himself. That is what we see in the normal Vorbilden in the subject's everyday life, just as we see it, in a more controlled manner, in analysis.

[10] Lacan is referring to a phrase of Stéphane Mallarmé's: 'To relate, to teach, even to describe is all right and although perhaps enough for each one to exchange human thought, by taking or putting a coin silently in someone else's hand, the elementary use of talk serves the universal reportage of which, with the exception of literature, everything among the different kinds of contemporary partakes.' (Mallarmé, The Poems, trans. and introduction by Keith Bosley, Harmondsworth: Penguin, pp. 44–7)

What are the unconscious and the preconscious in all this?

I can't satisfy you today. But even so you should recognise that the first approximation we can give of it, from today's point of view, is that what is at issue are certain differences or more exactly certain impossibilities linked to the subject's history, in as much as his development is in fact inscribed in it.

We will now reappraise Freud's ambiguous formula, zeitlich-Entwicklungsgeschichte. But let's limit ourselves to history, and let's say that it's on account of certain peculiarities in the subject's history that some parts of the real image or some abrupt phases exist. We thus are dealing with a mobile relation.

In the intra-analytic game, certain phases or faces – let us not baulk at plays on words – of the real image can never be given as the virtual image. On the contrary, whatever is accessible through the simple mobility of the mirror in the virtual image, whatever you are able to see of the real image in the virtual image, should be located rather in the preconscious. Whereas the parts of the real image which can never be seen, those places where the apparatus seizes up, where it blocks up – having pushed the metaphor this far, we needn't shy away from pushing further – that is the unconscious.

If you think you have understood, you are bound to be wrong. You will see the difficulties that this notion of the unconscious gives rise to, and my only ambition is to show you them. On the one hand, the unconscious is, as I have just defined it, something negative, something ideally inaccessible. On the other hand, it is something quasi real. Finally, it is something which will be realised in the symbolic, or, more precisely, something which, thanks to the symbolic progress which takes place in analysis, will have been. I'll show you, following Freud's texts, that the notion of the unconscious must satisfy these three conditions.

But just now I am going to illustrate the third of them, whose irruption may seem surprising to you.

Don't forget this – Freud initially explains repression as a fixation. But at the moment of the fixation, there is nothing which could be called repression – that of the Wolf-man happens a long time after the fixation. The Verdrängung is always a Nachdrängung. How then should one explain the return of the repressed? As paradoxical as it may seem, there is only one way to do it – it doesn't come from the past, but from the future.

To give you a fair idea of what the return of the repressed is in a symptom, one must take up the metaphor that I've gleaned from the cyberneticists – this spares me from having to invent it myself, because one shouldn't invent too many things.

Wiener posits two beings each of whose temporal dimension moves in the opposite direction from the other. To be sure, that means nothing, and that is how things which mean nothing all of a sudden signify something, but in a quite different domain. If one of them sends a message to the other, for example a square, the being going in the opposite direction will first of all see the square vanishing, before seeing the square. That is what we see as well. The symptom initially appears to us as a trace, which will only ever be a trace, one which will continue not to be understood until the analysis has got quite a long way, and until we have discovered its meaning. In addition, one can say that, just as the Verdrängung is only ever a Nachdrängung, what we see in the return of the repressed is the effaced signal of something which only takes on its value in the future, through its symbolic realisation, its integration into the history of the subject. Literally, it will only ever be a thing which, at the given moment of its occurrence, will have been.

You'll see it better with the help of my little apparatus. I'm going to let you in on a secret – I add a little bit to it every day. I don't bring it here all finished, like Minerva emerging from the head of a Jupiter which I am not. We'll stay with it right to the day when it begins to seem a bit tiresome to us, then we'll drop it. Until then, it will help us reveal the construction of these three necessary facets of the notion of the unconscious so that we understand it, by eliminating all these contradictions which Perrier is encountering in the text he's presenting.

Let's leave it there for today. I still haven't shown you why the analyst is to be found where the virtual image is. The day you will have understood why the analyst is to be found there, you will have understood almost everything that happens in analysis.

The see-saw of desire

CONFUSION OF TONGUES IN ANALYSIS

BIRTH OF THE I

MISRECOGNITION [MÉCONNAISSANCE] IS NOT IGNORANCE

THE MYSTIQUE OF INTROJECTION

ON PRIMARY MASOCHISM

We are beginning a third term which, thank God, is going to be short.

I had thought to start on the Schreber case before we went our separate ways this year. I would really have liked that, especially since I am getting the original work of President Schreber translated, for whatever purpose it may serve. It is a book Freud worked on and he advised us to consult it. A recommendation made in vain up to now, since it is impossible to find this work – I know of only two copies in Europe. I managed to get hold of one of them from which I have had two microfilms made up, one for my own use, the other I've given to the library of the Société Française de Psychanalyse.

Reading Schreber is entrancing. In it one finds everything one needs in order to write a complete treatise on paranoia and to supply a rich commentary on the mechanism of the psychoses. M. Hyppolite said that my knowledge started off from paranoiac knowledge – if it started there, I hope that it hasn't stayed there.

There's a gap here. But we are not going to fall into it straightaway, because we might easily remain imprisoned there.

Up to now, we have been making our way through Freud's Papers on Technique. I believe that it is now impossible not to push a bit further the comparison that I have implicitly always been making with present-day analytic technique, with what one can call, in inverted commas, its most recent advances. I've been referring implicitly to the teaching that is given you in supervisions, according to which analysis is analysis of resistances, analysis of the systems of the ego's defences. This conception remains poorly centred, and we can only refer to specific, but unsystematised, and sometimes even unformulated teachings.

Despite the paucity, which everyone remarks upon, of analytic literature dealing with technique, a few authors have addressed the topic. When they have not written a book, strictly speaking, they have written articles – some of them, strangely enough, remain working papers, and these are among the most interesting. There is here, in fact, a considerable corpus to work through. I hope that at this point I'll be able to count on the collaboration of some of you, to whom I'll lend several of these texts.

First of all, there are the three articles of Sachs, Alexander and Rado, taken from the Salzburg symposium.[1] You must know them if you have looked through Fenichel's book.

Then at the Marienbad Congress, you'll find the symposium on the results – as they call them – of analysis. In reality, it's less a question of the result than of the procedure which leads to these results. You can already see there the beginnings, and even the blossoming forth, of what I call the confusion of tongues in analysis, namely the extreme diversity of conceptions, whichever one holds, concerning active methods in the analytic process.

The third stage is what is happening now. There are good grounds for emphasising the recent development of the theory of the ego by the American troika, Hartmann, Loewenstein and Kris. These writings are sometimes quite disconcerting in the way they disengage concepts. They are always referring to the desexualised libido – they almost get to the point of saying delibidinised – or of deaggressivated aggression. The function of the ego more and more plays there the problematical role it already has in the writings of Freud's third period – which I have left outside our field of investigation, which I've limited to the median period 1910–1920 during which what was to be the final theory of the ego begins, with the notion of narcissism, to be developed. Read the volume which in its French edition is called Essais de Psychanalyse, which brings together Beyond the Pleasure Principle, Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego, and The Ego and the Id. We cannot analyse it this year, but it is indispensable for anyone who wants to understand the developments that the authors I have been talking about have brought to the theory of the cure. The theories of treatment which have been brought forward since 1920 have always centred around the final formulations of Freud. With great clumsiness most of the time, which stems from the very great difficulty of understanding what Freud is saying in these truly monumental articles, if one hasn't got to the bottom of the very genesis of the notion of narcissism. That is what I've tried to draw your attention to regarding the analysis of resistances and transference in the Papers on Technique.

Essentially, mine is a discursive path. Starting from the Freudian texts, I try to put before you here a problematic. But, from time to time, we have to focus on a didactic formula and bring into line the diverse formulations of these problems to be found in the history of analysis.

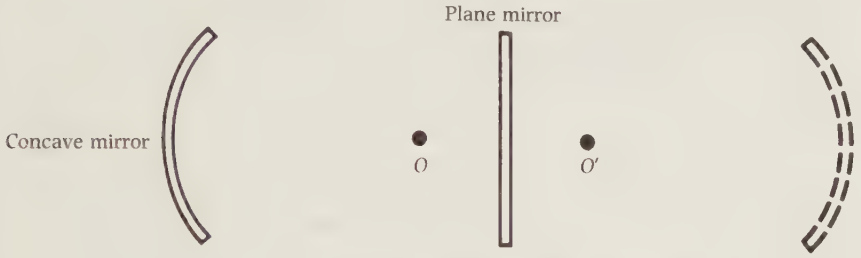
I'm adopting a middle way in placing before you a model, which doesn't pretend to be a system, but only a pictorial reference. That's why I've led you step by step to the optical schema we've started to construct here.

This apparatus is now beginning to become familiar to you. I've showed you how we may imagine that the real image formed thanks to the concave mirror is produced inside the subject, at a point which we call O. The subject sees this real image as a virtual image in the plane mirror, at O', in so far as he finds himself placed in the virtual symmetrical position in relation to the plane mirror.



Simplified schema of the two mirrors

Here we have two points O and O'. Why O and O'? Because a little girl – a virtual woman, hence a being much more engaged in the real than males – one day came up with this pretty phrase – Oh, you musn't think my whole life will unfold in O and in O'.[2] Poor little thing! Your life will unfold in O and in O', the same as for everyone else. But still, by this she is telling us what she aspires to. In her honour I will call these points O and O'.

With that, one can already manage to do something.

You have to start, against all odds, from O and from O'. You already know that what is at issue relates to the constitution of the Idealich, and not the Ichideal – in other words, to the fundamentally imaginary, specular origin of the ego. That's what I am trying to make you understand using several texts, the principal one being 'Zur Einführung des Narzissmus'.

I hope you have grasped the strict relation that exists, in this text, between the formation of the object and that of the ego. It is because they are strictly correlative and because their appearance is truly contemporaneous that the problem of narcissism arises. At this point in Freud's thinking, the libido seems to be subject to a dialectic other than its own – that, I would say, of the object.

Narcissism is not the biological individual's relation to his natural object.

[2] 'Ah! il ne faut pas croire que toute ma vie se passera en O et en O'.' which is then made richer and more variously complicated. There is a special narcissistic investment. It is a libidinal investment in something which should be conceived of as different from an image of the ego.

I'm putting things very crudely at this stage. I could put them in more sophisticated, philosophical language, but I want to make you see them clearly. What is absolutely certain is that from a certain point on in the development of the Freudian experience, attention becomes centred around the imaginary function of the ego. After Freud, the entire history of psychoanalysis becomes confused with a return to the academic, and not the traditional, conception of the ego as the psychological function of synthesis. Now if the ego has a contribution to make in the psychology of human beings, it can only be conceived of in a trans-psychological plane, or, as Freud says it explicitly – because Freud, despite the difficulties that he had with the conception of the ego, never lost the thread – metapsychological.

What does that mean, if not that it is beyond psychology?

What is it to say I? Is it the same thing as the ego, the analytic concept? One must start here.

When you use it, you cannot fail to recognise that the I has above all a psychological reference, in the sense in which one starts doing psychology when it is a question of observing what goes on in a human being. How does he learn to say it, this I?

I is a verbal term, whose use is learned through a specific reference to the other, which is a spoken reference. The I is born through the reference to the you. Everyone knows that the psychologists have used this to erect a scaffolding of remarkable things, the relation of reciprocity for example, which is either consolidated or isn't, and which determines I know not what stage in the intimate development of the child. As if one could, just like that, be sure of it, and deduce it from the initial clumsiness of the child in sorting out the personal pronouns. The child repeats the sentence one says to him using you instead of inverting it with the I. There is a hesitation in the learning of language. We don't have the right to go beyond that. But it is enough to warn us that the I is constituted at first in a linguistic experience, in reference to the you, and that this takes place within a relation in which the other shows him, what? – orders, desires, which he must recognise, his father's, mother's, educators', or his peers' and mates'.

It is clear that at the beginning, the chances are extremely slight that he will achieve recognition for his own, for his desires, except in the most immediate manner. We don't know anything, at least when we begin, about the precise point of resonance where, in the little subject's way of thinking, the individual is to be found. It is precisely that which makes him so unhappy.

Besides, how would he achieve recognition for his desires? He hasn't got a clue about them.[3] Let's say that we have every reason for believing that he hasn't got a clue about them. That is what our experience of adults shows us, us analysts. The adult, in fact, has to search out his desires. Otherwise he wouldn't need analysis. Which is enough to show us that he is cut off from what's related to his ego, namely from what of himself he is capable of securing recognition for.

I say – he hasn't got a clue about them. A vague formula, but analysis teaches us things in stages – which incidentally is the point of following the development of Freud's work. Let us now clarify this formula.

What is ignorance? Certainly it is a dialectical notion, since it is only within the perspective of truth that it is constituted as such. If the subject does not refer himself to the truth, there is no ignorance. If the subject doesn't begin to ask himself the question what is and what is not, there is no reason for there to be a true and a false, nor even, beyond that, reality and appearance.

Careful. We are beginning to get deep into philosophy. Let us say that ignorance is constituted in a polar fashion in relation to the virtual position of a truth to be attained. So it is a state of the subject in so far as he speaks.

In analysis, starting from the point when we implicitly engage the subject in a search for the truth, we are beginning to constitute his ignorance. It is we who create this situation, and hence this ignorance. When we say that the ego hasn't a clue about the subject's desires, it is because the examination of the experience in Freud's work teaches us that. So this particular ignorance is not ignorance pure and simple. It is what is concretely expressed in the process of Verneinung, and which, in the subject's static totality, is called misrecognition [méconnaissance].

Misrecognition is not ignorance. Misrecognition represents a certain organisation of affirmations and negations, to which the subject is attached. Hence it cannot not be conceived without correlative knowledge. If the subject is capable of misrecognising something, he surely must know what this function has operated upon. There must surely be, behind his misrecognition, a kind of knowledge of what there is to misrecognise.

Take someone who is deluded, who lives in a state of misrecognition of the death of someone close to him. One would be wrong to believe that he confuses him with a living being. He misrecognises, or refuses to recognise, that he is dead. But everything in the way he behaves indicates that he knows that there is something that he doesn't want to recognise.

So what is this misrecognition implied behind the function of the ego, which is essentially that of knowledge? That will be our point of entry into the question of the ego. That is, perhaps, the effective, concrete origin of our experience – we are led into devoting ourselves, in the presence of what is analysable, to an operation employing a mantic, in other words a translation, whose aim is to loosen up, beyond the subject's language, ambiguous as it is on the plane of knowledge, a truth. To make progress in this register, one must ask oneself what is the knowledge which guides and directs the misrecognition.

In animals, knowledge is a coaptation, an imaginary coaptation. The structuration of the world in the form of the Umwelt is accomplished through the projection of a certain number of relations, of Gestalten, which organise it, and specify it for each animal.

In fact, the psychologists of animal behaviour, the ethologists, define certain mechanisms of structuration, certain paths of discharge as innate in the animal. Its world is the environment in which it evolves, which weaves and separates out from the indistinctness of reality these paths which are preferred from the outset, to which its behavioural activities are committed.

In man, there is nothing of the kind. The anarchy of his elementary drives is demonstrated by analytic experience. His partial behaviour-patterns, his relation to the object – to the libidinal object – is subject to all sorts of risks. Synthesis miscarries.

So what corresponds in man to this innate knowledge which in the animal is quite simply its guide in life?

Here one should separate out the function which the image of his own body possesses in man – all the while noting that in animals it also assumes enormous importance.

Here I jump on a bit because I presume that we have already gone over these steps together.

You know that the attitude of the infant between six and eighteen months in front of a mirror informs us about the fundamental relation to the image of the human individual. Last year, I was able to show you the infant's jubilation in front of the mirror throughout the whole of this period in a film made by M. Gesell, who, however, had never so much as heard of my mirror stage, and has never asked himself any question of an analytical nature, believe you me. This makes the fact that he has so well isolated the significant moment even more impressive. Certainly, he does not himself underline its fundamental feature, which is its exalting character. Because it isn't the appearance of this behaviour at six months which is the most important thing, but rather its dissolution at eighteen months. All of a sudden, the behaviour changes completely, as I showed last year, so as to be nothing more than an appearance, Erscheinung, one experience amongst others upon which is exerted the action of control and of instrumental play. All the signs so clearly accentuated in the previous period disappear.

To explain what happens, I will make use of a term which some of your reading must at least have made familiar to you, one of those terms which we use in a confused manner, but which all the same corresponds in us to a mental schema. You know that at the moment of the dissolution of the Oedipus complex, something happens which we call introjection.

I beg you not to be hasty in giving this term too definite a meaning. Let us say that it is used when something like a reversal takes place – what was the outside becomes the inside, what was the father becomes the super-ego. Something takes place at the level of this invisible, unthinkable subject, which is never named as such. Is it at the level of the ego, of the id? Somewhere between the two. That's why we call it the super-ego.

So one then embarks on this quasi-mythology for specialists, with which our minds usually busy themselves. After all, these schemata are acceptable, we perpetually inhabit a world whose schemata are acceptable. But if one asked a psychoanalyst – Do you really believe, then, that the child devours his father, that it gets into his stomach, and that that becomes the super-ego?

We operate as if all that goes without saying. There are innocuous ways of using the term introjection, which go a long way. Suppose there's an ethnologist who had never heard anyone speak of this godforsaken analysis, and suddenly turns up here to listen to what's going on. He would say – Very peculiar primitives, these analysands, who bit by bit devour their analysts.

So look at the treatise of Balthasar Gracián, whom I consider to be a fundamental author – Messrs Nietzsche and La Rochefoucauld are rather insignificant alongside The Oracle and Criticón. As long as one believes in the communion, there is no reason for not thinking that one eats Christ, and hence his dainty ear-lobe as well. Why not make the communion a communion à la carte? Well, that would be fine for those who believe in transubstantiation. But what about the rest of us, the reasonable analysts, the analysts concerned with science? What we discover above Stekel's signature, and that of other authors, is only, when all is said and done, a measured introjection of the analyst and an outside observer could but transpose it on to the mystical plane of communion.

All the same it is a long way from what we really think – in so far as we think. Thank God, we don't, which is our excuse. That is the great mistake that is always made – to imagine that people think what they say.

We do not think, but that is not a reason for not trying to understand why such manifestly senseless words have been uttered.

Let us pick up the thread again. The point at which the mirror stage vanishes is analogous to the moment of see-sawing which occurs at certain points in psychic development. We can observe it in these phenomena of transitivism in which one finds the infant taking as equivalent his own action and that of the other. He says – François hit me, whereas it was him who hit François. There's an unstable mirror between the child and his fellow being. How are we to explain these phenomena?

There's a moment when the infant in jubilation assumes a mastery which he has not yet attained, through the mediation of the image of the other. Now, the subject shows himself entirely capable of assuming this mastery within himself. See-saw.

To be sure, he can only do it in a state of empty form. This form, this envelope of mastery, is something so certain that Freud, who came to it along paths quite different from mine, along the paths of the dynamic of libidinal investment, could find no other way of putting it – read The Ego and the Id. When Freud speaks of the ego, it is not at all a question of something so incisive, so determining, so imperative, that it gets confused with what in academic psychology are called the higher agencies. Freud underlines that it must have an intimate connection with the surface of the body. Not the sensitive, sensory, impressionistic surface, but this surface in so far as it is reflected in a form.[4] There is no form which lacks a surface, a form is defined by the surface – by difference in the identical, that is to say the surface.

The image of the other's form is assumed by the subject. Thanks to this surface, situated within the subject, what is introduced into human psychology is this relation between the outside and the inside whereby the subject knows himself, gets acquainted with himself as body.

Besides, it is the sole truly fundamental difference between human and animal psychology. Man knows himself as body, whereas there is, after all, no reason why he should know himself, since he is inside it. The animal is also inside it, but we have no reason for thinking that he represents it to himself.

It is within the see-saw movement, the movement of exchange with the other, that man becomes aware of himself as body, as the empty form of the body. In the same way, everything which is then within him in a pure state of desire, original desire, unconstituted and confused, which finds expression in the wailing of the child – he will learn to recognise it through its inversion in the other. He will learn, because he has not yet learned, in as much as we have not brought communication into play.

This anteriority is not chronological, but logical, and here we are only performing a deduction. It is no less fundamental for all that, since it allows us to distinguish the planes of the symbolic, of the imaginary and of the real, without which one can only make progress in the analytic experience by using expressions bordering on the mystical.

Before desire learns to recognise itself – let us now say the word – through the symbol, it is seen solely in the other.

At first, before language, desire exists solely in the single plane of the imaginary relation of the specular stage, projected, alienated in the other. The tension it provokes is then deprived of an outcome. That is to say that it has no other outcome – Hegel teaches us this – than the destruction of the other.

The subject's desire can only be confirmed in this relation through a competition, through an absolute rivalry with the other, in view of the object towards which it is directed. And each time we get close, in a given subject, to this primitive alienation, the most radical aggression arises – the desire for the disappearance of the other in so far as he supports the subject's desire.

[4] See (1923b) GW XIII 253; Stud III 294; SE XIX 26.

Here we meet up again with what the simple psychologist can observe in the behaviour of subjects. Saint Augustine, for example, notes, in a phrase I've often repeated, this all-consuming, uncontrollable jealousy which the small child feels for his fellow being, usually when the latter is clinging to his mother's breast, that is to say to the object of desire which is for him essential.

This is a key function. The relation of the subject to his Urbild, his Idealich, through which he enters into the imaginary function and learns to recognise himself as a form, can always see-saw. Each time the subject apprehends himself as form and as ego, each time that he constitutes himself in his status, in his stature, in his static, his desire is projected outside. From whence arises the impossibility of all human coexistence.

But, thank God, the subject inhabits the world of the symbol, that is to say a world of others who speak. That is why his desire is susceptible to the mediation of recognition. Without which every human function would simply exhaust itself in the unspecified wish for the destruction of the other as such.

Inversely, each time that, in the phenomenon of the other, something appears which once again allows the subject to reproject, to recomplete, to feed, as Freud says somewhere, the image of the Idealich, each time that the jubilant assumption of the mirror stage is retrieved along similar lines, each time that the subject is captivated by one of his fellow beings, well, then the desire revives in the subject. But it is revived verbally.

In other words, each time that the object identifications of the Idealich come about, so this phenomenon of Verliebtheit occurs, to which I've drawn your attention from the beginning. The difference between Verliebtheit and transference is that Verliebtheit does not happen automatically – there have to be certain conditions for it, as determined by the subject's development.

In the article on The Ego and the Id – which is read so sloppily, because attention is paid solely to the famous, idiotic schema,[5] with the stages, the little bob, the irrelevancies, the gadget he brings in which he calls the super-ego, what got into him, to come up with that, when he must have had other schemata – Freud writes that the ego is constructed out of its successive identifications with the loved objects which allowed it to acquire its form. The ego is constructed like an onion, one could peel it, and discover the successive identifications which have constituted it.[6] He writes in a similar vein in the articles I mentioned to you just now.

The perpetual reversion of desire to form and of form to desire, in other words of consciousness and body, of desire in so far as it is a part of the loved object, in which the subject literally loses himself, and with which he is identified, is the fundamental mechanism around which everything relating to the ego turns.

We really must understand that this game is, in its essence, an all-consuming one, and leads to immediate extermination, as soon as the subject is capable of doing something. And, believe me, he is capable of it very quickly.

The little girl I mentioned earlier, who wasn't particularly awful, found refuge in a country garden, where she became very peaceably absorbed, at an age when she was scarcely walking on her feet, in the application of a good-sized stone to the skull of a little playmate from next door, who was the person around whom she constructed her first identifications. The deed of Cain does not require very great motor sophistication to come to pass in the most spontaneous, I must even say in the most triumphant, of fashions. She had no sense of guilt – Me break Francis head. She spoke that with assurance and peace of mind. Nonetheless, I still don't predict a criminal future for her. She simply displayed the most fundamental structure of the human being on the imaginary plane – to destroy the person who is the site of alienation.

What were you trying to say, Granoff?

Dr Granoff: How then should one understand the masochistic outcome of the mirror stage?

Give me time. That's what I'm here for, to explain it to you. As soon as you start to call it the masochistic outcome, you won't be able to see the wood for the trees.

The masochistic outcome – I never fold when raised, even if it holds up my argument for a bit – we cannot understand it without the dimension of the symbolic. It is located at the juncture between the imaginary and the symbolic. What, in its structurating form, is generally called primary masochism is located at this juncture. That is also where one must locate what is usually called the death instinct, which is constitutive of the fundamental position of the human subject.

Don't forget that, when Freud described primary masochism, he found its most precise embodiment in the play of a child. He was exactly eighteen months old, that child. For the painful tension engendered by the inevitable fact of the presence and absence of the loved object, he substituted, Freud tells us, a game, in which he himself manipulated the absence and presence in themselves and took pleasure in controlling them. He achieved it by means of a little reel at the end of a thread, which he threw away and pulled back.

Since at this point I am not myself engaged in a dialectic, but am trying to respond to Freud, to clarify the basic elements of his thought, I will emphasise what Freud does not underline, but which is implicit in it – as always, his observations enable one to complete the theorisation. This game with the cotton-reel is accompanied by a vocalisation which from the linguist's point of view is characteristic of the very foundation of language [langage], and which is the only way one may grasp the problem of a language [langue], namely a simple opposition.

What is important is not that the child said the words Fort/Da, which, in his mother tongue, amounts to far/here – besides, he pronounced them in an approximate fashion. It is rather that here, right from the beginning, we have a first manifestation of language. In this phonematic opposition, the child transcends, brings on to the symbolic plane, the phenomenon of presence and absence. He renders himself master of the thing, precisely in so far as he destroys it.

Since from time to time we read a bit of Freud's text, for the first time we are going to turn to one of Jacques Lacan's texts. I read it again recently, and I found that it was comprehensible. But it is true that I was in a privileged position.

I wrote[7] – These are the games of occultation which Freud, in a flash of genius, revealed to us so that we might recognise in them that the moment when desire becomes human is also the moment when the child is born into language. We can now thereby grasp that that subject does not just in this master his privation in assuming it – that's what Freud says – but he also raises his desire to a second power. For his action destroys the object that it causes to appear and disappear in the provocation – in the true sense of the word, through the voice – in the anticipating provocation of its absence and its presence. It thus renders negative the field of forces of desire, in order to become its own object for itself. And this object, by quickly taking shape in the symbolic couple of the two elementary exclamations, announces in the subject the diachronic integration of the dichotomy of the phonemes – that simply means that it is the gate of entry into what already exists, the phonemes making up a language – whose synchronic structure the existing language offers to his assimilation; for that matter he is already engaged in the system of the concrete discourse of his surroundings, in reproducing more or less approximately in his Fort and his Da the vocables that he has received from these surroundings – so, it is from outside that he receives it, the Fort/Da – it is in fact already in his solitude that the desire of the little man has become the desire of an other, of an alter ego, who dominates him and whose object of desire is henceforth his own affliction.

Whether the child now turns to an imaginary or a real partner, he will see him obeying equally the negativity of his discourse and his call – because don't forget that, when he says Fort, it is because the object is here, and when he says Da the object is absent – and since his call has the effect of making him slip away, he will search in a banishing affirmation – very early on he will learn the force of refusal – the provocation of the return which brings his object back to this desire.

So you see here that – already before the introduction of the no, of the refusal of the other, when the subject learns to constitute what M. Hyppolite showed us the other day – the negativation of the simple call, the appearance of a simple pair of symbols when confronted with the contrasted phenomenon of presence and absence, that is to say the introduction of the symbol, reverses the positions. Absence is evoked in presence, and presence in absence.

This seems foolish, and to go without saying. But you still have to say it and reflect on it. Because it is in so far as the symbol allows this inversion, that is to say cancels the existing thing, that it opens up the world of negativity, which constitutes both the discourse of the human subject and the reality of his world in so far as it is human.

Primal masochism should be located around this initial negativation, around this original murder of the thing.

Just a word by way of conclusion.

We haven't got as far as I had hoped. Nonetheless, I have been able to get you to grasp the fact that desire, alienated, is perpetually reintegrated anew, reprojecting the Idealich outside. It is in this way that desire is verbalised. Here there is a game of see-saw between two inverted relations. The specular relation of the ego, which the subject assumes and realises, and projection, which is always ready to be renewed, in the Idealich.

The primary imaginary relation provides the fundamental framework for all possible erotism. It is a condition to which the object of Eros as such must be submitted. The object relation must always submit to the narcissistic framework and be inscribed in it. Certainly it transcends it, but in a manner which it is impossible to realise on the imaginary plane. That is what introduces for the subject the necessity of what I would call love.

A creature needs some reference to the beyond of language, to a pact, to a commitment which constitutes him, strictly speaking, as an other, a reference included in the general or, to be more exact, universal system of interhuman symbols. No love can be functionally realisable in the human community, save by means of a specific pact, which, whatever the form it takes, always tends to become isolated off into a specific function, at one and the same time within language and outside of it. That is what we call the function of the sacred, which is beyond the imaginary relation. We will come back to it.

Perhaps I am going a bit too quickly. Bear this in mind, that desire is only ever reintegrated in a verbal form, through symbolic nomination – that is what Freud called the verbal nucleus of the ego.

Through that, we come to understand analytic technique. In analysis one lets go of all the moorings of the speaking relationship, one eschews courtesy, respect, and dutifulness towards the other. Free association, this term is a very poor one for defining what is involved – we try to cut off the moorings of the conversation with the other. From then on, the subject finds himself relatively mobile in relation to this universe of language in which we engage him. While he adjusts his desire in the other's presence, this oscillation of the mirror occurs on the imaginary plane, allowing those imaginary and real things, which are not in the habit of co-existing for the subject, to encounter one another in a relative simultaneity, or in specific contrasts.

Here we find an essentially ambiguous relationship. What do we try to show to the subject in analysis? Where do we try to guide him to in authentic speech? All our attempts and instructions have as their aim, at the moment when we free the subject's discourse, to deprive him of every possible genuine function of speech – so through what paradox do we manage to rediscover it? This paradoxical path consists in extracting speech from language. Given this, what will the full significance of the phenomena which take place in the interval be? Such is the horizon of the question which I am trying to spread out in front of you.

Next time I will show you the results of this experiment in unanchored discourse, the oscillation of the mirror which allows the play of the see-saw between O and O', at the end of properly conducted analyses. Balint gives us a terrific definition of what we usually obtain at the end of those rare analyses which may be considered to be terminated – it is he who puts it like that. Balint is one of the rare souls who know what they are saying, and what he depicts as happening is quite alarming, as you will see. Now, what we're talking about here is a properly conducted analysis . . .

Besides this, there is analysis as it is usually practised, which I have shown you to be improper. Analysis of resistances – that is a legitimate rubric, but it isn't a practice, as I will show you, implied by the premises of analysis.

The fluctuations of the libido

AGGRESSIVITY ≠ AGGRESSION

THE WORD ELEPHANT

THE MOORINGS OF SPEECH

TRANSFERENCE AND SUGGESTION

FREUD AND DORA

Let's go back to where we left off. Can someone start off with a question?

DR PUJOL: You say the desire of the other. Is it the desire which is in the other? Or the desire that I have for the other? For me, they are not the same thing. In what you said last time at the end, it was desire in the other, and which the ego can recapture by destroying the other. But at the same time it is a desire which it has for the other.

Isn't it the original, specular foundation of the relation to the other, in so far as it is rooted in the imaginary?

The first alienation of desire is linked to this concrete phenomenon. If play is of value to the child, it is because it constitutes the plane of reflection in which he sees appearing in the other an activity which anticipates his own, in that it is that little bit more perfected, better mastered, than his own, his ideal form. From that point on the first object has value.

The pre-development of the child already shows that the human object differs fundamentally from the object of the animal. The human object is originally mediated through rivalry, through the exacerbation of the relation to the rival, through the relationship of prestige and physical presence. It is already a relation belonging to the order of alienation since it is initially in the rival that the subject grasps himself as ego [comme moi]. The original notion of the totality of the body as ineffable, as lived, the initial outburst of appetite and desire comes about in the human subject via the mediation of a form which he at first sees projected, external to himself, and at first, in his own reflection.

Second point. Man knows that he is a body – although he never perceives it in a complete fashion, since he is inside it, but he knows it. This image is the ring, the bottle-neck, through which the confused bundle of desires and needs must pass in order to be him, that is to say in order to accede to his imaginary structure.

The formula man's desire is the desire of the other has to be, like all formulae, used in the right context. It is not valid in only one sense. It is valid on the plane on which we started, that of imaginary captation. But, as I said to you at the end of the last session, it doesn't stop there. Were that not the case, as I pointed out in a mythical way, the only inter-human relation that would be possible would be this mutual and radical intolerance of the coexistence of consciousnesses, as Mr Hegel puts it – every other remaining essentially what frustrates the human being, not only of his object, but of the very form of his desire.

Here we have a destructive and fatal relation between human beings. Moreover, it is always there, subjacent. Lots of things have been made to fit within the political myth of the 'struggle for life'.[1] If it was Darwin who wrought it, that was because he came of a nation of privateers, for whom racism was the basic industry.

In fact, everything tells against this thesis of the survival of the fittest species. It is a myth which goes against the facts. Everything goes to prove that there are points of invariability and of equilibria proper to each species, and that species live in a sort of coordinated way, even amongst eaters and eaten. It never gets to the point of radical destruction, which would quite simply lead to the annihilation of the eating species, who would no longer have anything to eat. The strict inter-adjustment which exists in the living world is not brought about by the struggle to the death.

We must gain a deeper appreciation of the notion of aggressivity, which we use in such a brutal fashion. People believe that aggressivity is aggression. It has got absolutely nothing to do with it. At the limit, virtually, aggressivity turns into aggression. But aggression has got nothing to do with the vital reality, it is an existential act linked to an imaginary relation. That is a key which enables one to think through a great many problems anew, and not just our own, in an entirely different register.

I asked you to bring up a question. You did well to raise it. Are you satisfied, however? It seems to me that we got further last time.

In the human subject, desire is realised in the other, by the other – in the other,[2] as you put it. That is the second moment, the specular moment, the moment when the subject has integrated the form of the ego. But he is only capable of integrating it after a first swing of the see-saw when he has precisely exchanged his ego for this desire which he sees in the other. From then on, the desire of the other, which is man's desire, enters into the mediation of language. It is in the other, by [par] the other, that desire is named. It enters into the symbolic relation of I and you, in a relation of mutual recognition and transcendence, into the order of a law which is already quite ready to encompass the history of each individual.

[1] English in the original. [2] 'chez l'autre', which could be rendered as 'that the other has'.

I talked about the Fort and Da with you. It is an example of the way in which the child enters naturally into this game. He starts to play with the object, to be more exact, with the simple fact of its presence and its absence. So it is a transformed object, an object with a symbolic function, a devitalised object, already a sign. When the object is there he chases it away, when it isn't there he calls it. Through these first games, the object passes, as if naturally, on to the plane of language. The symbol comes into being and becomes more important than the object.

I've repeated this time and again. If you can't get it into your heads . . .

For the human being the word or the concept is nothing other than the word in its materiality. It is the thing itself.[3] It is not just a shadow, a breath, a virtual illusion of the thing, it is the thing itself.[3]

Think for a moment in the real. It is owing to the fact that the word elephant exists in their language, and hence that the elephant enters into their deliberations, that men have been capable of taking, in relation to elephants, even before touching them, decisions which are more far-reaching for these pachyderms than anything else that has happened to them throughout their history – the crossing of a river or the natural decimation of a forest. With nothing more than the word elephant and the way in which men use it, propitious or unpropitious things, auspicious or inauspicious things, in any event catastrophic things have happened to elephants long before anyone raised a bow or a gun to them.

Besides, it is clear, all I need do is talk about it, there is no need for them to be here, for them really to be here, thanks to the word elephant, and to be more real than the contingent elephant-individuals.

M. Hyppolite: That is Hegelian logic.

Is it liable to attack on that account?

M. Hyppolite: No, it is not liable to attack. Just now Mannoni said that it was politics.

O. Mannoni: That is how human politics comes about. In the broad sense. If men don't act like animals, it is because they exchange their knowledge by means of language. As a consequence, it is politics. The politics of elephants is possible thanks to the word.

M. Hyppolite: But not only that. The elephant himself is affected. That's the Hegelian logic.

All this is pre-political. I simply want to help you be clear about the importance of the name.

[3] 'la chose même'.

Here we are simply entering on to the plane of the name. There isn't even any syntax yet. But really, it is quite clear that this syntax originates at the same time. The child, as I have already hinted, articulates taxic[4] elements before phonemes. The if sometimes appears all by itself on occasion. To be sure, this does not allow us to decide upon a logical anteriority, because we are only dealing with the emergence, properly speaking, of a phenomenon.

Let me sum up. The projection of the image is invariably succeeded by that of desire. Correlatively, there is a reintrojection of the image and a reintrojection of desire. Swing of the see-saw, a play of mirrors.[5] To be sure, this articulation doesn't happen only once. It is repeated. And, in the course of the cycle, the child reintegrates, and reassumes his desires.

I will now place the accent on the manner in which the symbolic plane connects up with the imaginary plane. In fact, as you see, the desires of the child initially pass via the specular other. That is where they are approved or reproved, accepted or refused. And that is how the child serves his apprenticeship in the symbolic order and accedes to its foundation, which is the law.

This also has its experimental sureties. Susan Isaacs mentions in one of her texts – and the Koehler school also highlights it – that very early on, at an infans age still, between eight and twelve months, the child simply does not react in the same way to an accidental knock, to a fall, a brutal mechanical act related to a piece of clumsiness, and, on the other hand, to a slap with a punitive intention. In this instance we can distinguish two entirely different reactions of the child, well before the exteriorised appearance of language. That is because the child already has an initial appreciation of the symbolism of language. Of the symbolism of language and of its function as a pact.

Now we are going to try to grasp what the function of speech is in analysis.

Speech is the mill-wheel whereby human desire is ceaselessly mediated by re-entering the system of language.

I emphasise the register of the symbolic order because we must never lose sight of it, although it is most frequently forgotten, although we turn away from it in analysis. Because, in the end, what do we usually talk about? What we go on and on about, often in a confused, scarcely articulate fashion, are the subject's imaginary relations to the construction of his ego. We talk all the time about the dangers, the commotions, the crises that the subject undergoes at the level of his ego's construction. That is why I started by explaining the relation O-O', the imaginary relation to the other.

On its first emergence, the genital object is no less premature than everything else that one observes in the development of the child, and it founders. Except that the libido which is related to the genital object is not on the same level as the primitive libido, whose object is the subject's own image. That is a crucial phenomenon.

It is in so far as the child comes into the world in a structurally premature state, from top to bottom and from end to end, that he has a primitive libidinal relation to his image. The libido here at issue is the one whose resonances you know, which belongs to the order of Liebe, of love. It is the grand X of the entire theory of analysis.

You think it's a bit much to call it the grand X? I would have no difficulty showing you the texts, and from the best analysts – because you don't demonstrate something by searching out references in the writings of people who don't know what they are talking about. I will ask someone to read Balint. What is it, this supposedly accomplished genital love? It remains entirely problematical. The question of knowing whether it is a natural process or a cultural achievement has not yet been, so Balint tells us in the text, decided upon by analysts. That is a quite extraordinary ambiguity, which remains at the very heart of everything which is apparently most openly accepted in our circles.

However that may be, if the primitive libido is relative to prematuration, the nature of the second libido is different. It goes beyond, it responds to an initial maturation of desire, if not of organic development. That at least is what we have to assume if the theory is to hold up and if an explanation of our experience is to be given. Here there is a complete change of level in the relation of the human being to the image, to the other. It is the pivotal point of what is called maturation, upon which the entire Oedipal drama turns. It is the instinctual correlative of what, in Oedipus, takes place on the situational plane.

So what happens? In so far as the primitive libido comes to maturity, the relation to the narcissistic image, to use the final edition of the Freudian vocabulary, passes on to the plane of Verliebtheit. The captivating narcissistic image, which is alienating on the imaginary plane, finds itself invested with Verliebtheit, which phenomenologically speaking pertains to the register of love.

To explain things in this way means that the filling up, even the overflowing, of the primitive gap of the immature subject's libido depends on an internal maturation linked to the organic development of the subject. The pre-genital libido is the sensitive spot, the moment of mirage between Eros and Thanatos, between love and hate. That is the simplest way to render comprehensible the crucial role played by the so-called desexualised libido of the ego in the possibility of reversion, of instantaneous swerving of hate into love, of love into hate. That is the problem whose solution apparently gave Freud the greatest of difficulties – go and take a look in his work, The Ego and the Id.[6] In the text I'm discussing, he even seems to turn it into an objection to the theory which postulates as distinct the death instincts and life instincts. I think, on the contrary, that this fits in perfectly – on condition that we have an adequate theory of the imaginary function of the ego.

If you found this too difficult, I can give you an illustration of it right away.

The aggressive reaction to Oedipal rivalry is related to one of these changes of level. At first, the father constitutes one of the most conspicuous of the imaginary figures of the Idealich, and as such is invested with a Verliebtheit which is clearly isolated, named and described by Freud. It is in so far as a regression of the libidinal position takes place that the subject reaches the Oedipal phase, between three and five years of age. Then the aggressive feeling of rivalry and hate towards the father makes its appearance. A very slight change of libidinal level in relation to a specific threshold transforms love into hate – moreover, it oscillates for a while.

Now let us take up the thread where I left it last time.

I pointed out to you that the imaginary relation definitively provides the frameworks within which the libido will fluctuate. And I left open the question of the symbolic functions in the cure. What use do we make of language and of speech in the cure? In the analytic relation there are two subjects linked by a pact. This pact is set up on levels which are very diverse, even very confused, at the beginning. It isn't, in essence, any the less a pact. And we do everything, via the preliminary rules, to establish this aspect quite firmly at the beginning.

Within this relation, the initial task is to untie the moorings of speech. In his way of speaking, in his style, in his manner of addressing himself to his allocutor,[7] the subject is freed of the obligation, not only to be polite, to be courteous, but even to be coherent. One lets go of a certain number of the moorings of speech. If we think that there is a direct, permanent link between the way in which a subject expresses himself, achieves recognition, and the genuine, experiential dynamic of his relations of desire, we are forced to see that this alone introduces a certain uncoupling, a floating, a possibility of oscillation in the mirror relation to the other.

That is the why and the wherefore of my model.

For the subject, the uncoupling of his relation to the other causes the image of his ego to fluctuate, to shimmer, to oscillate, renders it complete and incomplete. So that he can recognise all the stages of his desire, all the objects which have given consistency, nourishment and body to this image, he has to perceive it in its completeness, to which he has never had access. Through the successive identifications and revivals, the subject must constitute the history of his ego.

[6] 'Le Moi et le Soi'.

[7] 'allocutaire' – according to Robert, a recent neologism in lingustics, meaning the person who receives the message of the speaker.

The floating, spoken relation with the analyst tends to produce, in the self-image, sufficiently repeated and wide-ranging variations, albeit infinitesimal and limited, for the subject to perceive the captating images which lie at the base of the constitution of his ego.

I have talked about small oscillations. I don't need to enlarge on what makes up their smallness right now. Clearly there is some braking, several occasions when things grind to a halt, which technique teaches us to surmount, to fill in, even, sometimes, to reconstruct.

Such a technique produces in the subject an imaginary mirage relation with himself above and beyond anything everyday experience may procure him. It tends to create artificially, as a mirage, the fundamental condition for any Verliebtheit.

It is the breaking of the moorings of speech which allows the subject to see, at least as a sequence, the diverse parts of his image, and to procure what we can call a maximal narcissistic projection. In this respect analysis is still rather rudimentary, since at the beginning it consists, we must admit, in letting everything go, to see what will happen. Things could have been, could be handled differently – it is not inconceivable. The fact remains that it can only tend to produce, at best, narcissistic revelation on the imaginary plane. And that is precisely the fundamental condition of Verliebtheit.

Being in love, when it happens, happens in an entirely different way. There has to be a surprising coincidence there, because it doesn't happen with just any partner or with just any image. I have already alluded to the maximal conditions for Werther's love at first sight.

In analysis, the point around which the subject's identification at the level of the narcissistic image focuses is what we call the transference. The transference, not in the dialectical sense which I explained to you in the Dora case for example, but the transference such as it is commonly understood as an imaginary phenomenon.

I am going to show you the moot point to which the handling of the imaginary transference leads. It leads to a point where, in terms of technique, there's a parting of the ways.

Balint is one of the most self-aware of analysts. His description of what he does is extremely lucid. At the same time, it offers one of the best examples of the tendency to which the entire technique of analysis has little by little become committed. He simply says in a more coherent and more open manner what in others is entangled in scholasticism where one cannot see the wood for the trees. So, this is exactly what Balint says – the entire development of analysis consists in the tendency of the subject to rediscover what he calls 'primary love'.[8]

The subject feels the need to be the object of love, of care, of affection, of the interest of another object without his having any regard for the needs or even the existence of this object. That is what Balint quite clearly spells out, and I am grateful to him for spelling it out – which doesn't mean that I approve of it.

Locating the entire activity of analysis on such a plane, with no qualification, with no other element, is startling in itself. However this conception is right in the mainstream of that development of analysis which places the accent more and more on relations of dependency, on instinctual satisfactions, even on frustration – which is the same thing.

Given that, how does Balint describe what we observe at the end of analysis, at the end of a completed analysis, one that is truly terminated – by his own admission, that amounts to no more than a quarter. A state of narcissism is induced in the subject, he says quite explicitly, which reaches the point of an unrestrained exaltation of his desires. The subject becomes intoxicated with a quite illusory sensation of absolute mastery over reality, but which he has a need of in the post-termination period. He must free himself of it by progressively putting the nature of things back into place. As for the final session, it never fails to elicit, in both partners, the strongest desire to cry. That is what Balint writes, and this is valuable as extremely precious testimony as to the high point of a whole segment of the analytic movement.

Don't you have the feeling that that is an extremely unsatisfactory game, a Utopian ideal? – which something in us is bound to be disappointed by.

One way of understanding analysis, or to be more precise, of not understanding some of its essential mainsprings, quite certainly must lead to a conception like this one and to results like these.

I will leave this question hanging for the moment. We'll comment on Balint's texts later on.

Now I am going to make use of an example which you are already familiar with, since I have gone over it dozens of times – the case of Dora.

What is overlooked in analysis is quite obviously speech as a function of recognition. Speech is that dimension through which the desire of the subject is authentically integrated on to the symbolic plane. It is only once it is formulated, named in the presence of the other, that desire, whatever it is, is recognised in the full sense of the term. It is not a question of the satisfaction of desire, nor of I know not what primary love,[9] but, quite precisely, of the recognition of desire.

Remember what Freud does with Dora. Dora is a hysteric. At that point in time, Freud is not sufficiently aware – he wrote it, re-wrote it, repeated it everywhere in notes, and even in the text – of what he calls the homosexual component – which means nothing, but still, it is a label. It comes down to this – he didn't perceive what Dora's position was, that is to say who Dora's object was. He didn't perceive, in a word, that for her O' is occupied by Frau K.

How does Freud conduct his intervention? He tackles Dora on the plane of what he himself calls resistance. What does that mean? I have already explained it to you. It is absolutely obvious that Freud brings into play his ego, the conception he himself has of what girls are made for – a girl is made to love boys. If something isn't right, if something torments her, something repressed, in Freud's eyes it can only be this – she loves Herr K. And perhaps, by the same token, she loves Freud a little. Once you look at things this way, it is entirely self-evident.

For reasons which are likewise linked to his erroneous starting point, Freud doesn't even interpret for Dora the signs of her so-called transference to him – which at least spares him from erring here. Quite simply, he talks to her about Herr K. What does that mean? – save that he is speaking to her at the level of the experience of others. It is at this level that the subject has to recognise her desires and get them recognised. And if they are not recognised, they are forbidden as such, and that is indeed where repression begins. So, when Dora is still at the stage at which, if I can put it this way, she has learnt to understand nothing, Freud intervenes at the level of the recognition of desire, at a level which corresponds point by point with the experience of chaotic, even aborted, recognition, which had already made up her life.

Here's Freud, saying to Dora – You love Herr K. It so happens, what is more, that he says it clumsily enough for Dora to break off immediately. If he had at that time been initiated into what we call the analysis of resistances, he would have spoon-fed her slowly, he would have started by teaching her which things in her were defences, and, by dint of this, he would in fact have removed an entire set of minor defences. He would thus, strictly speaking, have employed an act of suggestion, that is to say he would have introduced into her ego a supplementary element, a supplementary motivation.

Somewhere Freud writes that the transference is just that. And to a certain extent, he is right, it is just that. Except you have to know at which level. Because he might have been able to modify Dora's ego sufficiently for her to have married Herr K. – a marriage as unhappy as any other marriage.

If, on the contrary, the analysis had been handled properly, what should have happened? What would have happened if, instead of making his speech intervene in O', that is to say putting his own ego into play with the aim of remoulding, of modelling that of Dora, Freud had pointed out to her that it was Frau K. whom she loved?

In fact, Freud intervened just when, in the swing of the see-saw, Dora's desire is in O', when she desires Frau K. The whole of Dora's story is to be found in this oscillation whereby she does not know if she loves only herself, her image as magnified in Frau K., or if she desires Frau K. It is precisely because this oscillation occurs again and again, because there is a perpetual see-sawing, that Dora can't get out of it.

It is when the desire is in O' that Freud had to name it, because, at that particular moment, it can be realised. If the intervention is repeated often enough, in a complete enough manner, the Verliebtheit, which is misrecognised [méconnue], broken, continually refracted, like an image on water which one can never quite keep a hold of, can be realised. At that moment, Dora could have recognised her desire, the object of her love, as being in fact Frau K.

That is an illustration of what I was saying to you just now – if Freud had revealed to Dora that she was in love with Frau K., she would then have actually have been so. Is that the aim of analysis? No, that is only the first stage. And, if you have bungled it, either you wreck the analysis, like Freud did, or you are engaged in something different, an orthopaedics of the ego. But you are not doing an analysis.

There is no reason why analysis, conceived of as a process of fleecing, of peeling away the systems of defence, should not work. That is what analysts call finding an ally in the healthy part of the ego. In effect they manage to pull over on to their side a half of the subject's ego, then a half of a half, etc. And why doesn't it happen like that with the analyst, since that is how the ego is constituted in real life? Except, the point is to know whether that is what Freud has taught us.

Freud has shown us that speech must be embodied in the very history of the subject. If the subject has not embodied it, if this speech is muzzled and is to be found latent in the subject's symptoms, do we, or do we not, have to release it, like Sleeping Beauty?

If we don't have to release it, let us then engage in a resistances type of analysis. But that is not what Freud meant when he first started talking about the analysis of resistances. We will see what the legitimate meaning of this expression is.

If Freud had intervened by allowing the subject to name her desire – because he didn't have to name it for her himself – the state of Verliebtheit would have been produced in O'. But one should not overlook the fact that the subject would have been very well aware that it was Freud who had given her this object of Verliebtheit. The process doesn't come to an end there.

Once this see-saw is accomplished, whereby the subject, at the same time as his speech, reintegrates the analyst's speech, recognition of his desire becomes possible for him. This doesn't happen in one go. Because the subject sees this so precious completeness approaching, he forges ahead into the storm-clouds, as towards a mirage. And it is in as much as he makes a fresh conquest of his Idealich that Freud can then take his seat at the level of the Ichideal.

We will leave it there for today.

The relationship of the analyst and the Ichideal raises the question of the super-ego. Besides, you know that Ichideal is sometimes taken to be a synonym for the super-ego.

I chose to climb the mountain. I could have taken the slope that leads down and straightaway asked the question – what is the super-ego? Only now are we coming to it. Because the reply seems to be self-evident, but it is not. Up to now, all the analogies which have been proposed for it, the references to the categorical imperative, to the moral conscience, are extremely confused. But let us leave matters there.

The first phase of analysis is accomplished in the passage from O to O′ – from what, in the ego, is unknown to the subject to this image in which he recognises his imaginary investments. Each time, this projected image awakens in the subject the feeling of an exaltation without limit, of a mastery of every outcome, which is already laid down at the beginning of the experience of the mirror. But now, he can name it, because he has since learnt to speak. If he hadn't, he wouldn't be here, in analysis.

That is the first stage. It appears to be strictly analogous to the point where Balint breaks off. What is this narcissism without restraint, this exaltation of desires? – if not the point Dora could have reached. Are we going to leave her there, in this contemplation? At some point in the case-history, we see her lost deep in contemplation of this painting – the image of the Madonna, before which a man and a woman stand in adoration.

How should we conceive of the rest of the process? To take the next step, we will have to get to the bottom of the function of the Idealich, whose place you see the analyst occupy for a while, in so far as he intervenes in the right position, at the right time, at the right place.

So the next chapter will bear on the handling of the transference. I am leaving it open.

The nucleus of repression

NAMING DESIRE
THE PRÄGUNG OF THE TRAUMA
THE FORGETTING OF FORGETTING
THE SUBJECT IN SCIENCE
THE SUPER-EGO, A DISCORDANT STATEMENT

To the extent that we are making any progress this year, which is beginning to take on the form of a year as it wanes, I find it satisfying to have received confirmation, through the questions which have been put to me, that some of you are beginning to understand that what I am in the process of teaching you involves the whole of psychoanalysis, involves the very meaning of your action. I am thinking of those of you who have understood that one can only propose a technical rule given the meaning of analysis.

Everything isn't as clear as it could be as yet, in what I am spelling out to you little by little. But have no doubt that nothing less is at stake here than taking a fundamental stand on the nature of psychoanalysis, which will later animate your activity, since it transforms your understanding of the existential position of the analytic experience and its ends.

Last time, I tried to give you a picture of that process which we are always bringing, in an enigmatic manner, into analysis, which in English is called working-through. In French, it is translated, not without some difficulty, by élaboration, or travail. It is this dimension, at first glance mysterious, which requires us to go over our work with our patient hundreds of times,[1] so that some progress, some subjective breakthroughs, come about.

What is embodied in the mill-wheel's turning, as expressed by these two arrows, from O to O′, and from O′ to O, in this game of coming and going, is the shimmering of the before and the beyond of the mirror, which the subject's image goes through. The point is to bring it, in the course of the analysis, to its completion. At the same time, the subject reintegrates his desire. And each time the completion of this image is brought a step nearer, the subject sees his desire suddenly emerging within him in the form of a particularly heightened tension. The completion of a single cycle does not bring this movement to a halt. There are as many cycles as it takes for the different phases of imaginary, narcissistic, specular identification – the three adjectives are equivalent when it comes to representing these matters in theory – to give an image in focus.

That does not exhaust the phenomenon, since in any case, nothing can be conceived of without the intervention of this third element, which I introduced last time – the speech of the subject.

That is when desire is sensed by the subject – which cannot happen without the conjunction of speech. And it is a moment of pure anxiety, and nothing but. Desire emerges in a confrontation with the image. Once this image which had been rendered incomplete is completed, once the imaginary facet which was non-integrated, suppressed, repressed, looms up, anxiety then makes its appearance. That is the fertile moment.

Some authors have wanted to specify it. Strachey tried to delimit what he calls the transference-interpretation, more precisely the mutative interpretation. See volume XV of the International Journal of Psycho-analysis, for 1934, numbers 2 and 3. In fact, he emphasises that interpretation is only capable of having positive effect at a precise point in time in the analysis. Such moments are not frequent, and cannot be grasped in just an approximate manner. It is neither around, nor roundabout, neither before, nor after, but at the exact moment when what is close to bursting open in the imaginary is then also present in the verbal relation with the analyst, that the interpretation must be given so that its decisive value, its mutative function, can have an effect.

What does that mean? – save that that is the moment when the imaginary and the real of the analytic situation are confused. That is what I am trying to explain to you. The subject's desire is there, in the situation, both present and inexpressible. To name it, so Strachey says, is what the analyst's intervention must confine itself to. It is the only occasion when his word should be added to that which the patient foments in the course of his long monologue, a mill-wheel of speech the movement of whose arrows on the schema would be a good enough justification for the metaphor.

To illustrate it, last time I reminded you of the function of Freud's interpretations in the Dora case, the sense in which they were inadequate and the blockage which resulted from them, the mental wall. That was only a first stage in the Freudian discovery. One must follow it as it moves on. Did some of you come, two years ago, to my commentary on the Wolfman? . . . not many. I would like one of them – Father Beirnaert? – to treat himself to another reading of this text of Freud's. You will see how helpful the schema I've given you is.

The Wolfman comes across as having what we would today call a character neurosis, or maybe a narcissistic neurosis. As such, this neurosis offers considerable resistance to treatment. Freud chose, quite deliberately, to give us an exposition of a part of it. In fact, the infantile neurosis – that is the title of the Wolfman in the German edition – was then of great use to him for raising certain theoretical questions concerning the function of trauma.

So we are in 1913, hence in the middle of the years 1910 to 1920, which are the object of our commentary this year.

The Wolfman is indispensable for understanding what Freud is working out at that particular point in time, namely the theory of trauma, unsettled then by Jung's persistent comments. There are a great many things in this study, not to be found anywhere else in Freud, certainly not in his purely theoretical writings – here we find essential complements to his theory of repression.

Firstly, I will remind you that repression is, in the Wolfman's case, bound up with a traumatic experience, that of the spectacle of his parents copulating in an a tergo position. The patient was never able to evoke, to remember, this scene directly, and it is reconstructed by Freud. The copulatory position could only be restored on the basis of the traumatic consequence it had on the actual behaviour of the subject.

To be sure, we have here patient historical reconstructions, which are remarkably surprising. Freud here proceeds as if with monuments, with archival documents, employing textual criticism and exegesis. If, at a certain point, an element comes to light in complex guise, it is certain that the point at which it appears in a less elaborated form is prior to it. In this way Freud manages to determine the date of the copulation in question. He fixes it unhesitatingly, with an absolute rigour, at a date defined by $n + \frac{1}{2}$ years. Now n cannot be higher than 1, because it could not have happened at two and a half for reasons which must be conceded on account of the consequences for the young subject of this spectacular revelation. It is not impossible that it happened at six months, but Freud sets this date aside because it appeared to him, given his thinking at that time, a trifle violent. I would just like to remark in passing that he does not exclude the possibility of it having occurred at six months. And, in truth neither do I. I must say that I'm rather inclined to think that it's the correct date, rather than at one and a half. I might tell you why later on.

Let us get back to the essentials. The traumatic force of the imaginary break-in produced by this spectacle is under no circumstances to be located immediately after the event. The scene acquires traumatic significance for the subject between the ages of three years three months and four years. We know the exact date because the subject was born on Christmas Day, a coincidence which is, furthermore, decisive for his history. It is in anticipation of the events of Christmas, for him as for all children invariably accompanied by the arrival of presents coming to him from a descending being, that for the first time he has the anxiety-dream, the pivot of this case-history. This anxiety-dream is the first manifestation of the traumatic significance of what a moment ago I called the imaginary break-in. To borrow a term from the theory of instincts such as it has been developed in recent times, in a manner that is certainly more meticulous than in Freud's day, especially for birds, it is the Prägung – this term possesses resonances of striking, striking a coin – the Prägung of the originating traumatic event.[2]

This Prägung – Freud explains in the most clearcut fashion – is at first located in a non-repressed unconscious – we will render this approximate expression more precise later. Let us say that the Prägung has not been integrated into the verbalised system of the subject, that it has not even reached verbalisation, and not even, one might say, attained signification. This Prägung, strictly limited to the domain of the imaginary, re-emerges in the course of the subject's progress into a symbolic world which is more and more organised. That is what Freud is explaining in telling us the subject's entire history, as it then unfolds out of his statements, between x the original moment and the age of four, where he locates the repression.

Repression only occurs to the extent that the events of the early years of the subject are historically sufficiently turbulent. I cannot tell you the whole story - his seduction by his older sister, who is more virile than he is, the object both of rivalry and of identification – his drawing back and his refusal in the face of this seduction, for which, at that early age, he had neither the resources nor the elements – then his attempt to approach and actively seduce the governess,[3] the famous Nania, a seduction that is normatively directed along the line of a primary genital Oedipal development, but whose opening move is warped because of the sister's initial captivating seduction. From the terrain on which he was engaged, the subject is thus forced back towards the sado-masochistic positions, whose register and ensemble of elements Freud supplies us with.

Now I will show you two signposts.

Firstly, all the outcomes, the most favourable outcomes which can be hoped for, stem from the subject's introduction to the symbolic dialectic. Furthermore, the symbolic world will not cease to exert a determining attraction throughout the entire development of this subject since, as you know, later on there will be occasions when the solution found is a happy one, in so far as the elements that are educative in the strict sense of the word enter into his life. The whole of the dialectic of rivalry with the father, which renders him passive, will become, at a given point in time, quite relaxed, through the intervention of prestigious individuals, this or that teacher, or, earlier on, through the introduction of the religious register. What Freud shows us then is the following – it is in as much as the subjective drama is integrated into a myth which has an extended, almost universal human value, that the subject brings himself into being.

[2] Translated in ethological works in English as 'imprinting'. Lorenz and others also employ the term 'Objektbindung' (translated as 'object-fixation').

[3] 'gouvernante', usually the term for 'governess'. See (1918b) GW XII 42–5; Stud VIII 139–41; SE XVII 19–21 and GW XII 48; Stud VIII 144; SE XVII 24.

On the other hand, what happens in this period between three years one month and four years? – save that the subject learns how to integrate the events of his life into a law, into a field of symbolic significations, into a human field which universalises significations. That is why, at least at this point in time, this infantile neurosis is exactly the same thing as a psychoanalysis. It plays the same role as a psychoanalysis, namely it accomplishes the reintegration of the past, and it brings into the play of symbols the Prägung itself, which here is only attained through an effect that is retroactive, nachträglich, as Freud puts it.

To the extent that, in the course of events, it becomes integrated in the form of a symbol, in history, the stamp comes very close to emerging. Then, when it does in fact emerge exactly two and a half years after having entered into the life of the subject – and perhaps, given what I've said, three and a half years later – on the imaginary plane it takes on its status as trauma, as a result of the form of the first symbolic integration, a form that was especially shocking for the subject.

The trauma, in so far as it has a repressing action, intervenes after the fact [après coup], nachträglich. At this specific moment, something of the subject's becomes detached in the very symbolic world that he is engaged in integrating. From then on, it will no longer be something belonging to the subject. The subject will no longer speak it, will no longer integrate it. Nevertheless, it will remain there, somewhere, spoken, if one can put it this way, by something the subject does not control.

In other words, there is no essential difference between this moment in the analysis which I have described to you, and the intermediary moment, between the stamp and the symbolic repression.

There is just one difference, which is that at that particular moment, there is no one there to give him his cue. Repression begins, having constituted its original nucleus. Now there is a central point around which symptoms, successive repressions, and by the same token – since repression and the return of the repressed are the same thing – the return of the repressed will later be organised.

Aren't you amazed that the return of the repressed and repression are the same thing?

Dr X: Oh, nothing amazes me any longer.

It amazes some people. Though X tells us that, as far as he's concerned, nothing amazes him any more.

O. MANNONI: That gets rid of the notion one sometimes comes across of successful repression.

No, it doesn't get rid of it. To show you this, we would have to go into the entire dialectic of forgetting. Every successful symbolic integration involves a sort of normal forgetting. But that would take us a very long way into the Freudian dialectic.

O. MANNONI: A forgetting without the return of the repressed, then?

Yes, without the return of the repressed. Integration into history evidently brings with it the forgetting of an entire world of shadows which are not transposed into symbolic existence. And if this symbolic existence is successful and is fully taken on by the subject, it leaves no weight behind it. One would then have to bring in Heideggerian notions. In every entry of being into its habitation in words, there's a margin of forgetting, a λήθη[4] complementary to every ἀλήθεια.[5]

M. HYPPOLITE: It is the word successful in Mannoni's formula that I don't understand.

It is a therapist's expression. Successful repression is essential.

M. HYPPOLITE: Successful could mean the most profound forgetting.

That is what I am talking about.

M. HYPPOLITE: So this successful means, in certain respects, total failure. To arrive at the integration of being, man must forget the essential. This successful is a failure. Heidegger would not accept the word successful. You can only say successful from the therapist's point of view.

It is a therapist's point of view. Nonetheless, the margin of error there is to be found in every realisation of being is always, it seems, reserved by Heidegger to a sort of fundamental λήθη, or shadow of the truth.

M. HYPPOLITE: The therapist's success – nothing could be worse for Heidegger. It is the forgetting of the forgetting. Heideggerian authenticity consists in not being engulfed by the forgetting of the forgetting.

Yes, because Heidegger made a sort of philosophical law out of this return to the sources of being.

Let us take up the question again. To what extent can a forgetting of the forgetting be successful? To what extent must every analysis open out on to a resurgence into being? Or on to a certain recoil into being, opted for by the subject with regard to his own destiny? Since I always jump at any opportunity that comes my way, I am going to forestall somewhat those questions which might be raised. If the subject starts off from point O, the point of confusion and innocence, where is the dialectic of the symbolic reintegration of desire going to lead? Is it enough simply for the subject to name his desires, for him to have permission to name them, for the analysis to be terminated? That is the question that I may perhaps raise at the end of this session. You will also see that I will not leave it there.

At the end, right at the end of analysis, after having gone through a specific number of circuits and brought about the complete integration of his history, will the subject still be at O? or else, a bit further over there, towards A?[6] In other words, will a part of the subject still remain on the level of this sticking-point which we call his ego? Does the analysis only deal with what we consider to be a given, namely the subject's ego, the internal structure which could be improved by exercise?

That is how someone like Balint and one whole trend of analysis have come to think that, either the ego is strong, or else it is weak. And if it is weak, they are obliged, by the internal logic of their position, to think it has to be strengthened. As soon as one holds the ego to be the straightforward exercising of self-mastery by the subject, the high point of the hierarchy of the nervous functions, one is completely committed to the task of teaching it to be strong. From whence the notion of education through practice, through learning,[7] even, as a mind as clear-headed as Balint's has written, through performance.

With respect to the strengthening of the ego in the course of the analysis, Balint goes so far as to comment on the extent to which the ego is perfectible. Only a few years ago, he says, what was considered in any given exercise or sport to be the world record is now just about good enough to qualify an athlete as average. So the human ego, when it is made to compete with itself, accomplishes more and more extraordinary feats. Considering which, one is led to deduce – we have no proof of it, and for good reasons – that an exercise such as analysis could structure the ego, could introduce into its functions a training which will strengthen it and will render it capable of tolerating a greater amount of excitation.

But what could render analysis – a verbal game – fit for whatever goes on in this type of training?

The fundamental fact which analysis reveals to us and which I am in the process of teaching you, is that the ego is an imaginary function. If you blind yourself to this fact, you'll find yourself in step with the line that the whole, or nearly the whole of analysis, has taken.

If the ego is an imaginary function, it is not to be confused with the subject.

[6] The diagram in the French edition, reproduced here on p. 139, does not have A: the very similar diagram on E 674 names the plane mirror A. [7] English in the original.

What do we call a subject? Quite precisely, what, in the development of objectivation, is outside of the object.

One might say that the ideal of science is to reduce the object to what can be closed and fastened within a system of interacting forces. In the end, the object is only ever like that for science, and there is only ever one subject – the scientist who considers the whole, and hopes one day to reduce everything to a determinate play of symbols encompassing all the interactions between objects. Except, when it comes to organised beings, the scientist finds himself obliged after all always to imply that action exists. Certainly one can always consider an organised being as an object, but as long as one grants it the status of organism, one retains, if only implicitly, the idea that it is a subject.

During analysis, for example of a piece of instinctual behaviour, one can ignore the subjective position for a while. But this position can under no circumstances be ignored when it comes to the speaking subject. We are necessarily obliged to admit the speaking subject as subject. But why? For one simple reason – because he can lie. That is, he is distinct from what he says.

Well, the dimension of the speaking subject, of the speaking subject qua deceiver, is what Freud uncovered for us in the unconscious.

In science, the subject is only sustained, in the end, on the plane of consciousness, since the subject x in science is in fact the scientist. It is whoever possesses the system of the science that sustains the dimension of the subject. He is the subject, in so far as he is the reflection, the mirror, the support of the objectal world. In contrast, Freud shows us that in the human subject there is something which speaks, which speaks in the full sense of the word, that is to say something which knowingly lies, and without the contribution of consciousness. That restores – in the obvious, strict, experimental sense of the term – the dimension of the subject.

By the same token, this dimension is no longer confused with the ego. The ego is deprived of its absolute position in the subject. The ego acquires the status of a mirage, as the residue, it is only one element in the objectal relations of the subject.

Are you with me?

That is why I took up on the way what Mannoni was putting forward. The question is indeed whether, in analysis, it is solely a matter of enlarging the correlative objectivations of the ego, when considered as a centre that is completely given, but which is more or less restricted – that is how Miss Anna Freud puts it. When Freud writes – Where id was, there ego must be – must we take it to mean that the task is to enlarge the field of consciousness? Or is it a matter of displacement? Where id was, there . . . – don't think that it is there.[8] It is in a great many places. For example, in my schema, the subject is looking at the mirror game in A. For a moment, let us identify the id with the subject. Are we to understand that there where the id was, in A, the ego must be? That the ego must move to A and, at the end of the most refined of ideal analyses, no longer be there at all?

[8] The word 'là', here translated as 'there', is to be found in the standard French translation of Freud's dictum, 'Wo Es war, soll Ich werden' – 'Là où le ça était, l'ego doit être.' See Freud (1933a) SE XXII 80, which gives 'Where id was, there ego shall be.' The 'shall' [soll] has been corrected to 'must', but 'there' (which is not to be found in the German) has been retained to correspond to the French 'là'. See the more extensive discussion in E 128–9, 299–300.

That is quite conceivable, since everything pertaining to the ego must be realised in what the subject recognises as himself. That, in any case, is the question I am putting to you. I hope that this is sufficient indication of the direction I am taking. I haven't exhausted it.

However that may be, given the point I've reached with my remarks about the Wolfman, I think that you see the usefulness of the schema. In conformity with the best analytic traditions, it unifies the original formation of the symptom, the signification of repression itself, with what takes place in the analytic process, considered, at least in its beginnings, as a dialectical process.

With this simple beginning, I will leave it up to Reverend Father Beirnaert to take his time in once again reading the case-history of the Wolfman, to give us someday a résumé, indeed to highlight some questions when he has drawn together the elements that I have brought out for you in this text.

Since we will leave the subject of the Wolfman there, I want to make a little further progress towards understanding what is the therapeutic procedure, the source of therapeutic action, in analysis. What, precisely, does the naming, the recognition of desire signify, at the point where it is arrived at, in O? Does everything have to stop there? Or is it necessary to go a step further?

I am going to try and get you to understand the meaning of this question.

There is an absolutely essential function in the process of the symbolic integration of his history by the subject, a function in relation to which, as everyone has long noticed, the analyst occupies a significant position. This function is called the super-ego. It is impossible to understand anything about it if you don't relate it to its origins. The super-ego at first appeared in the history of Freudian theory in the form of the censorship. I could just as well a moment ago have directly illustrated the remark I made you by saying that, from the beginning, we are placed, with the symptom and just as much with all of the unconscious functions of daily life, in the dimension of speech. The task of censorship is to deceive through lying, and it is not for nothing that Freud chose the term of censorship. Here we are dealing with an agency which splits the subject's symbolic world, cuts it in two, into one accessible part, which is recognised, and one inaccessible, forbidden part. It is this idea that we rediscover, hardly transformed, with almost the same emphasis, in the register of the super-ego.

Straightaway I am going to emphasise what brings the idea of the super-ego, one of whose facets I am reminding you of, into opposition with the idea we commonly make use of.

In general, the super-ego is always thought of within the register of a tension, and this tension is within a hair of being reduced down to purely instinctual principles, like primary masochism for example. Such a conception is not alien to Freud. Freud goes even further. In the article Das Ich und das Es, he maintains that the more the subject suppresses his instincts, that is to say, if you wish, the more moral his conduct is, and the more the super-ego exacerbates its pressure, the more severe, demanding and imperious it becomes.[9] That clinical observation is not universally true. But Freud here lets himself get carried away by his object, which is neurosis. He goes so far as to consider the super-ego to be one of these toxic products which, through their organic activity, would release other toxic substances which, under given conditions, would bring their reproductive cycle to an end. That is pushing things very far. But you will rediscover this idea implicit within a whole conception of the super-ego prevalent in analysis.

As a counter to this conception, the following may be apt. In a general fashion, the unconscious is, in the subject, a schism of the symbolic system, a limitation, an alienation induced by the symbolic system. The super-ego is an analogous schism, which is produced in the symbolic system integrated by the subject. This symbolic world is not limited to the subject, because it is realised in a language which is the common language, the universal symbolic system, in so far as it establishes its empire over a specific community to which the subject belongs. The super-ego is this schism as it occurs for the subject – but not only for him – in his relations with what we will call the law.

I am going to illustrate this with an example, because what you are taught in analysis familiarises you so little with this register, that you are going to think that I am overstepping its limits. Nothing of the kind.

It concerns one of my patients. He had already been in analysis with someone else before coming to me. He had quite peculiar symptoms connected with the use of the hand, an organ of some significance for those entertaining activities on which analysis has shed so much light. An analysis conducted along classical lines did its utmost, without success, to organise, at any cost, his various symptoms around, obviously, infantile masturbation, and the prohibitions and the repressions that it would have brought with it in his environment. These prohibitions did exist, since they still exist. Unfortunately, it explained nothing, nor did it resolve anything.

This subject was – I can't dissimulate this element of his history, although it is always a delicate matter to bring particular cases into teaching – of the Islamic religion. But one of the most striking elements of the story of his subjective development was his estrangement from, his aversion to the Koranic law. Now, this law is something infinitely more complete than we can imagine, in our cultural sphere, defined as it is by Render unto Caesar the things which be Caesar's, and unto God the things which be God's. In the Islamic sphere, on the contrary, the law has a totalitarian character which will on no account permit the isolation of the juridical from the religious plane.

So this subject manifested a failure to recognise [méconnaissance] the Koranic law. In a subject who belonged, through his ancestry, his functions, his future, to this cultural sphere, this was something which struck me in passing, in line with the idea, which I believe to be sound enough, that one should not fail to recognise the symbolic appertinances of a subject. This put us hot on the trail of what was at issue here.

In fact, the Koranic law decrees the following, with respect to the person who is found guilty of theft – The hand will be cut off.

Now, the subject had, in his childhood, been caught up in a whirlwind both private and public, which amounted to the following, that he had heard it said – and it was quite a scene, his father being a civil servant and having lost his position – that his father was a thief and must therefore have his hand cut off.

To be sure, for a long time now the prescription has not been put into effect – no more than that belonging to the laws of Manu,[10] whosoever has committed incest with his mother must tear off his genitals and, carrying them in his hand, will go towards the West. But it does not remain any the less inscribed in the symbolic order which founds interhuman relations, and which is called the law.

This proposition was for this subject thus isolated off from the rest of the law in a privileged manner. And it became lodged in his symptoms. All the other symbolic references of my patient, all these primitive arcana around which such a subject finds his most fundamental relations to the universe of the symbol organised, were forfeited on account of the particular emphasis that this prescription had acquired for him. For him it lies at the centre of an entire series of inadmissible, conflictual, symptomatic unconscious expressions, linked to this primal childhood experience.

In the course of analysis, as I have pointed out to you, it is when the traumatic elements – grounded in an image which has never been integrated – draw near that holes, points of fracture appear in the unification, the synthesis, of the subject's history. I have pointed out how it is in starting from these holes that the subject can realign himself within the different symbolic determinations which make him a subject with a history. Well, in the same way, for every human being, everything personal which can happen to him is located in the relation to the law to which he is bound. His history is unified by the law, by his symbolic universe, which is not the same for everyone.

Tradition and language diversify the reference to the subject. A discordant statement, unknown in law, a statement pushed into the foreground by a traumatic event, which reduces the law down to a point with an inadmissible, unintegrable character – this blind, repetitive agency is what we usually define in the term super-ego.

I hope that this little case will have been striking enough to give you an idea of a dimension analysts are not often to be found reflecting upon, but which they cannot manage to ignore entirely. Every analyst, in fact, is a witness to the fact that no resolution of an analysis is possible, whatever the diversity, the iridescence of the archaic events that it brings into play, if it does not end by knotting itself around this legal, legalising coordinate, which is called the Oedipus complex.

The Oedipus complex is so essential to the very dimension of the analytic experience that its pre-eminence is revealed right from the start of Freud's work and is sustained right up to its end. That is because the Oedipus complex occupies a privileged position, in the present state of Western civilization.

Just now I alluded to the division into several planes of the register of the law in our cultural sphere. God knows that the multiplicity of planes does not make life very easy for the individual, because conflicts ceaselessly are bringing them into opposition. In as much as the different languages of a civilisation gain in complexity, its tie to the most primitive forms of the law comes down to this essential point – this is Freudian theory at its purest – which is the Oedipus complex. That is what, in the life of the individual, resonates with the register of the law, as one discovers in the neuroses. It is the most uniform point of intersection, the minimum requirement.

That is not to say that it is the only one, nor that it would amount to straying outside of the field of psychoanalysis to refer to the totality of the symbolic world of the subject, which can be extraordinarily complex, even antinomic, and to his own personal position, which is a function of his place in society, of his future, of his projects, in the existential sense of the term, of the education and tradition which is his.

We are in no way relieved of the problems raised by the relations of the subject's desire – which emerges there, at point O – to the totality of the symbolic system in which the subject is called, in the full sense of the term, to take up his place. The fact that the structure of the Oedipus complex is an ubiquitous requirement does not exempt us, for all that, from perceiving that other structures belonging to the same level, to the plane of the law, can, in a given case, play just as decisive a role. That is what we just now encountered in this last clinical case.

Once the number of cycles necessary for the subject's objects to appear have been accomplished, and his imaginary history is completed, once the successive tensed-up, suspended, anxiety-provoking desires of the subject are named and reintegrated, all is not, for all that, brought to term. What was initially there, in O, then here, in O′, then again in O, has to be referred to the completed system of symbols. The very outcome of the analysis requires it.

Where should this adjournment come to a stop? Do we have to extend analytic intervention to the point of becoming one of those fundamental dialogues on justice and courage, in the great dialectical tradition?

That is a question. It is not easy to answer, because in truth, modern man has become singularly unused to broaching these grand themes. He prefers to resolve things in terms of conduct, of adaptation, of group morale and other twaddle. From whence the gravity of the problem posed by the analyst's education in humanity.

That is where I will leave you today.

Preliminary interventions on Balint

THEORY OF LOVE
DEFINITION OF CHARACTER
OBJECTIVATION

It's all very fine saying that theory and technique are the same thing. Do let us get something out of it. Let us try and understand each individual's technique, when his theoretical ideas are sufficiently articulated to allow us to make some assumptions about it.

Except, the theoretical ideas pushed to the fore by some minds, even fine minds, are not on that account usable. Those people who work with concepts are not always clearly aware of what they are saying. In contrast, in certain cases, one has a strong feeling that the concepts truly express something of the experience, and that is the case with our friend Michael Balint.

I wanted to seek the support of someone who is, in lots of ways, close, even congenial to us, and who without question has an orientation which converges with some of the demands we are here making explicit as to what the intersubjective relation in analysis must be. At the same time, the way in which he expresses himself gives us the feeling that he has come under the sway of the dominant mode of thought.

In order to render palpable what I will call a certain contemporary deviationism in relation to the fundamental analytic experience which is my constant point of reference, it would be all too easy to pick out crude, even obviously crazy people. It is when they are subtle, and when they attest less to a clearcut aberration than to a specific way of missing the point, that one should take them up.

This is how I wanted to put to the test what has to be the point of any teaching, namely that one follows it. I have entrusted this to Granoff, who, as he has made crystal-clear, is unquestionably to be numbered as one of those most interested in the path along which I am trying to lead you, so that he may communicate to us today what he has been able to gather from his reading of Balint's book, Primary Love and Psycho-analytic Technique.

According to what he himself says, Balint started his career around about 1920. This book is a collection of articles written between 1930 and 1950. It is a very interesting book, extremely pleasurable to read, clear, lucid, often bold, full of humour. It will be in all your interests to get to grips with it – when you have the time, because it is holiday reading, like a prize at the end of term. Treat yourselves to a copy, because our Société is not rich enough this year to give you all one.

Interventions in the course of Dr Granoff's presentation.

Two modalities of love are being opposed. First of all there is the pregenital mode. An entire article, entitled 'On love and hate', has as its axis the notion that what is involved is a love in which the object possesses absolutely no interests of its own. Absolute unselfishness[1] – the subject does not recognise any of its demands, any of its own needs. Everything which is good for me is right for you – that is the implicit formula which the subject's behaviour expresses. Primary love,[2] the later stage, is always characterised as the rejection of any kind of reality, the refusal to recognise the partner's requirements. That is what contrasts it to genital love.[2] As you'll see, I have massive objections to this conception; my objections will show how it literally dissipates everything which analysis has contributed.

You are entirely right, Granoff, to point out that Balint's conception is centred on a theory of love which is more than just normative, or moralising. Quite rightly, you highlight that it leads to this question – is what we consider to be normal a natural state or is it a cultural end-product, something artificial, indeed something which he calls a happy chance?[3] And, further on, he asks – what should we call health, when analysis is terminated? Is the analytic cure a natural or an artificial process? Are there processes in the mind which, if they are not halted, disturbed, will lead development towards equilibrium? Or, on the contrary, is health a happy chance, an improbable event? About that, Balint remarks, the ambiguity of the analytic chorus is complete. Which may lead one to think that the question has not been put very clearly.

You are not bringing out clearly enough the Balintian definition of character, which is, however, extremely interesting.

Character controls man's relations to his objects. Character always signifies a more or less extensive limitation of the possibilities of love and of hatred. So character signifies limitation of the capacity for love and enjoyment.[4] The dimension of enjoyment [joie], which is extremely extensive, goes well beyond the category of jouissance in a way that one should spell out. Enjoyment [joie] implies a subjective plenitude which well deserves being expanded on.[5]

[4] Last four words in English in the original.

If the article didn't date from 1932, I would say that it is responsible for the promulgation of a certain puritanical moral ideal. In Hungary there are Protestant historical traditions, which have precise historical parallels with the history of Protestantism in England. Hence, we see a peculiar convergence of the thought of this student of Ferenczi's, guided by his master along trails which I am going to make you follow today, with his destiny, which has eventually integrated him so well into the English community.

Character is for him preferable in its strong form, the one which brings with it all its limitations. The weak character[6] is someone who lets himself be overrun. There's no need to add that this results in complete ambiguity between what he calls character analysis, and, something he feels no qualms in venturing out in the same context, logical character. He does not seem to see that these are completely different characters – on the one hand, character is the reaction to the libidinal development of the subject, the web within which this development is caught, and limited, on the other, there are innate elements which, for the characterologists, divide individuals into classes, which are constitutional.

Balint thinks that analytic experience will tell us more about this. I myself have pretty well been brought round to think so too, but on condition that one realises that analysis can profoundly modify character.

Quite rightly you highlight Balint's remark to the effect that, beginning in 1938–40, an entire vocabulary disappeared from analytical articles, while the orientation which centres psychoanalysis upon object relations was being consolidated. This vocabulary is the one whose connotation, Balint says, is too libidinal – the term sadistic, for example, disappears.

This confession is very revealing. That really is what's going on, the growing puritanism of the analytic atmosphere.

Balint fully realises that there must be something that exists between two subjects. Since he is completely lacking in the conceptual apparatus necessary for introducing the intersubjective relation, he is led to speak of a two-body psychology.[7] He thinks that is the way out of one-body psychology.[7] But it is clear that two-body psychology is still a relation of object to object.

Theoretically, this would not be serious, if it did not have technical consequences in the concrete, therapeutic exchange with the subject. The point is that in actual fact it is not a relation of object to object. Balint is, as you put it so well just now, entangled in a dual relation, and denying it. We won't be able to find a more felicitous formula, and I congratulate you on it, for saying how the explanation of the analytic situation is usually expressed.

To make any advances, all knowledge [connaissance] must objectify the parts which are objectifiable. How does an analysis make progress? – if not through the interventions which impel the subject to objectify himself, to take himself as object.

Balint objectifies the subject, but in a different sense. He proposes what I would call a recourse to a call on the real, which is only an effacement, through a failure to recognise, as you put it just now, the symbolic register. In fact, this register disappears completely in the object relation, and by the same token the imaginary register as well. That is why the objects take on an absolute value.

Balint tells us how to act – create an atmosphere, your own atmosphere, a comfortable atmosphere. That is all he has to say. It is extremely uncertain, hesitating on the edge of the unsayable, and he then brings in reality, what he calls the event. Clearly, analysis is not set up so that we fall into our patient's arms, and he into ours. The limitation of the analyst's means raises the question as to what plane his action occurs on. Balint is induced to call to attention all the registers of the real.

It is not for nothing that the real is always in the background, and that I never refer to it directly in our commentaries here. It is, quite precisely, and quite properly speaking, excluded. And Balint, no more than anyone else, will not make it come back. But that is the implication of his recourse to the call. A failure of the theory which corresponds to this deviation in technique.

It is late now. I don't want to go beyond a quarter to two.

I think we can give Granoff full marks. He has achieved everything I hoped of him, and has given you a full presentation of all the problems raised by this book of Balint's, his one and only book, which is the fruit of his reflections as well as of his professional practice.

Some questions may have emerged from it for you. I will come back to them next time. What I want to highlight now is the article which you didn't talk about, 'Transference of emotions', from 1933. Is it emotions which are transferred? Nobody seems scandalised by a title like that.

It isn't an article specifically addressed to analysts, it is also addressed in part to those who aren't, so that they grasp the phenomenon of tranference which, he says, gives rise to many misconceptions, and of which the scientific world in general had a less adequate conception at that time than of the phenomenon of resistance. He gives several examples. You'll see, it is quite delightful.

I will start off with this hole which Granoff left at the heart of his presentation so as to throw light once again on the rest. Because Balint lacks a correct definition of the symbol, the latter is necessarily everywhere.

In this same article, he tells us that the interpretation of their own experience by analysts is naturally a psychology, or a characterology of the psychoanalyst himself. So it is not me who says it, it is him who makes the remark. The author himself offers us the belief that one should undertake the psychoanalysis of the theoretician analyst so as to locate some of the modern tendencies of theory and of practice.

Till next Wednesday.

The object relation and the intersubjective relation

BALINT AND FERENCZI
THE SATISFACTION OF NEED
THE MAP OF TENDERNESS
INTERSUBJECTIVITY IN THE PERVERSIONS
SARTRIAN ANALYSIS

So let us look at this conception which we call Balint's, which is, in fact, linked to a very specific tradition, which may be said to be Hungarian in so far as it has been, quite incidentally, dominated by the personality of Ferenczi. Certainly we will have to broach, in many little anecdotal ways, the relations between Freud and Ferenczi. It is all rather diverting.

Ferenczi was to some extent considered, up to 1930, to be the enfant terrible of psychoanalysis. In relation to the analytic group in general, he remained a free-wheeler. His way of raising questions showed no concern for couching itself in a manner which was, at that time, already orthodox. Hence, on a number of occasions, he raised questions which can be classified under the rubric active psychoanalysis – and, having said this, which seems so crucial, we think we have understood something.

Ferenczi started by asking himself what role, at any given moment of the analysis, the analyst's initiative, in the first instance, and later on, the analyst's being, should play. One has to see under what terms any intervention is made, before qualifying it as active. For example, yesterday evening you heard the question regarding prohibitions raised, apropos of the case which Dr Morgan reported to us. As I reminded you yesterday evening, that is a question which is already sounded out in Freud's Papers on Technique. Freud always took it to be absolutely self-evident that, in certain cases, one must know how to intervene in an active way by imposing prohibitions – Your analysis cannot continue if you indulge in that activity which, through in some way saturating the situation, sterilises, in the full sense of the term, what might happen in the analysis.

Starting from where we are, and going back in history from Balint on, we will try to see what the notion of active psychoanalysis means for Ferenczi, who is credited with its introduction.

I'll point out to you in passing that, in the course of his life, Ferenczi changed his position several times. He reconsidered some of his attempts, concluding that experience had shown them to be excessive, almost unfruitful, even injurious.

Balint thus belongs to this Hungarian tradition which blossomed around the questions raised by the relation of the analysand and analyst, conceived of as an interhuman situation involving persons and, as a consequence, implying a certain reciprocity. Today these questions are spoken of in terms of transference and counter-transference.

Around about 1930, the personal influence of Ferenczi came to an end. From then on, it is that of his pupils which makes itself felt.

Balint is to be located in this period extending from 1930 to today, which is marked by the growing influence, within analysis, of the notion of the object relation. I believe that that is the central point in the conception of Balint, of his wife, and of their collaborators who took an interest in animal psychology. That is what comes across in a book which, even though it is only a collection of rather variable, disparate articles, spread over a period of twenty years, is nevertheless characterised by a remarkable unity, which one can extract.

I presume that the terrain has been reconnoitred, because Granoff's presentation has enabled you to locate, in their gross outlines, the problems that Balint raises. So let us start off with the object relation. It lies at the heart of all the problems, as you will see.

Let us go straight to the knot. Balint's main focus in the elaboration of the notion of the object relation comes down to this – the object relation is one which conjoins to a need an object which satisfies it.

In his conception, an object is first and foremost an object of satisfaction. This is not about to surprise us, since analytic experience moves within the order of libidinal relations, within the order of desire. Does that mean that defining the object, in human experience, as what saturates a need is a valid point of departure, from which one will be able to develop, to group together and to explain what experience teaches us is encountered in analysis?

For Balint, the fundamental object relation satisfies what one can call the full form, the typical form. It assumes its most characteristic form in what he calls primary love,[1] namely the relations between mother and infant. The key article on this point is 'Mother's love and love for the mother', by Alice Balint. According to the latter, what is specific to the infant's relation to the mother is that the mother as such satisfies all the needs of the infant. This doesn't mean, obviously, that that's how things always turn out. But it is a structural feature of the human infant's situation.

Here the entire animal backdrop is implicit. The little human being, like the little animal for a limited period, is stitched into the maternal companionship which saturates a certain primitive need he has, while he takes his very first steps in life. But he is much more so than any other, on account of the backwardness of his development. You are aware that one can say that the human being is born with foetalised traits, that is to say deriving from premature birth. Balint scarcely touches on this point, and only in an aside. But he notes it, and he has good reason to.

However that may be, the mother-child relation is so fundamental for him that he goes so far as to say that, if it comes to pass in a happy manner, problems can only arise by accident. This accident may be the rule – that doesn't change anything, it is an accident with respect to the essentials of the relation. If there is satisfaction, which is the desire of this primary relation, this primary love[2] doesn't even have to come to light. Nothing does. So everything pertaining to it which becomes manifest is simply a hitch in the fundamental set-up, the enclosed, two-sided relation.

I cannot linger over this, but I must just say that Alice Balint's paper develops this conception to the point of heroism. Let us follow its reasoning.

For the infant, everything which is good for it, coming from the mother, goes without saying. There is nothing to imply that this partner is autonomous, nothing to imply that it is another subject. The need is imperious. And everything in the object relation tends, all by itself, towards the satisfaction of need. If there thus exists a pre-established harmony, an enclosing of the first object relation of the human being, a tendency towards perfect satisfaction, in all strictness exactly the same has to hold for the other side, for the mother's side. Her love for her offspring has exactly the same characteristic of pre-established harmony on the primitive plane of need. For her as well, the care, the contact, the breast-feeding, everything which links her in an animal fashion to her offspring satisfies a need, complementary to the first one's.

Hence Alice Balint is obliged to prove – and this is the extreme heroism of her demonstration – that maternal need displays exactly the same limits as every vital need, namely that when one no longer has anything to give, well one takes. One of the most clinching points she puts forward is that, in any given so-called primitive society – this term is less an allusion to the social or communitarian structure of these societies than it is to the fact that they are much more exposed to terrible crises in the realm of need, whether it is a question of eskimos or tribes wandering in an abject state across the Australian deserts – when there is nothing left to eat, you eat your child. This forms part of the same system, the register of the satisfaction of vital needs, there is no gap between feeding and eating – you are all his and, by the same token, he is all yours. Consequently, when there is no longer any other way of getting by, it is easy enough to gulp him down. Absorption is a part of inter-animal relations, of object relations. In the normal run of events, the infant feeds on his mother, absorbing her to the extent that he can. The inverse is true. When the mother can no longer do otherwise she tucks into him.

Balint goes to great lengths in supplying extraordinarily suggestive ethnographic detail. I do not know if they are accurate – one should always be wary of reports from afar. Nevertheless, ethnographers recount that, in times of hardship, during the atrocious famines which form a part of the rhythms of isolated populations, which have remained at a very primitive stage, in certain Australian tribes for example, the pregnant women are capable, with that remarkable dexterity which is a characteristic of some primitive behaviour, of inducing abortion so as to feed on the object of the pregnancy, born prematurely in this fashion.

In short, the infant-mother relation is here presented as the starting-point of a complementarity of desire. There is a direct stitching together of desires, which dovetail together, bind together. Any discordances, gaps are only accidental.

This definition, the starting-point and pivot of the Balint conception, is in contradiction with the analytic tradition on one essential point, concerning the development of instincts. In fact, the definition of the infant-mother relation runs counter to the positing of a primitive stage of so-called auto-erotism, which is however vouchsafed, to a great extent, by Freud's texts, although not without considerable qualifications – very important qualifications which always leave matters subject to a certain ambiguity.

In the classical, Viennese conception of libidinal development, there is a stage in which the infantile subject knows only its need, in the sense in which it has no relation with the object which satisfies it. It knows only its sensations, and it reacts on the plane of stimulus-response. It does not have a pre-determined primary relation, only the feeling of its pleasure or its unpleasure. The world is the world of sensations. And these sensations direct, dominate, govern its development. One doesn't have to take account of its relation to an object, since no object yet exists for it.

It is this classic thesis – that Wälder sets out in his article 'Earliest stages', which appeared in the International Journal for 1937, page 416 – which made the Viennese circle particularly impermeable to what was beginning to emerge in the English circle. It was highlighting what emerged later on in Kleinian theory, namely the idea of original traumatic elements, linked to the notion of the good and the bad object, to primitive projections and introjections.

What are the consequences of the Balint conception of the object relation? To begin with, let us postulate the following – it is clear that Balint and those who follow him are on the track of a truth. Who can seriously deny, if he has observed a baby of fifteen to twenty days at the breast, that it takes an interest in specific objects? So, the traditional idea that the original vicissitude of the libido is auto-erotism has to be interpreted. It is certain that it has some value, but it is false if we locate it on the behaviourist plane of the relation of the living organism with its Umwelt, since observation shows us that there really is an object relation. Such theoretical developments, which are spliced on to the theory of analysis, figure as a deviation in relation to the fundamental inspiration of the conception of the libido. For the moment, a large section, the largest section, of the analytic movement is pursuing it.

So Balint defines the object relation through the satisfaction of a need to which the object corresponds in a closed, completed fashion, in the form of a primary love, the original model of which is found in the mother-infant relation. I could have introduced you to Balint's thought via another path. But, because it is a coherent body of thought, whichever entrance gains you access to it, you will always find the same blind alleys and the same problems in it. If one starts off with an object relation like this, there is no getting away from it. The libidinal relation, whatever its progressive steps, its stages, its breakings of limits, its phases, its metamorphoses, will always be defined in the same way.

Once such a definition of the object has been given, however varied the qualities of desire are in passing from the oral to the anal, and then to the genital, there will just have to be an object to satisfy and saturate it.

So, the genital relation, in its completed aspects, in its fulfilment on the instinctual plane, is theorised in the same manner as the infant-mother relationship. In the achievement of genital satisfaction, the satisfaction of the one, I won't say is concerned for the satisfaction of the other, but is saturated in this satisfaction. And it goes without saying that the other is satisfied in this essential relation. That is the axis of the Balints' conception of genital love.[3] It is the same as that for primary love.[3]

Balint cannot conceive of matters in any other way, once the object is defined as an object of satisfaction. As it is clear that this becomes much more complicated when the adult human subject has actually to put into effect his capacities for genital possession, what he needs here is an extension. But it is never anything more than an extension, that is, one does not understand where the subject's initiative could arise from, his perception of the existence or the reality, as one says, of the partner.

What makes genital love[4] different from primary love[4] is acceding to the reality of the other as a subject. The subject takes into account the existence of the other subject as such. He concerns himself, not only with the enjoyment [jouissance] of his partner, but with many other requirements which are associated with it. All of this isn't a matter of course. For Balint, this is part of the given. That's the way it is because an adult, well, is far more complicated than a child. Fundamentally, the register of satisfaction is the same. There is a closed satisfaction, for two, in which the ideal is that each finds in the other the object which satisfies his desire.

But these faculties for appreciating the needs and requirements of the other, which are necessary at the genital stage, where are you going to get them from? What can introduce the recognition of others into the closed system of the object relation? Nothing can, and that is what is striking.

Yet they do have to come from somewhere, these elements which he calls tenderness, idealisation, which are these mirages of love with which the genital act is draped – the map of Tenderness.[5] Balint cannot deny this dimension, since clinical work demonstrates it. So, he says – and this is where his theory comes apart, from top to bottom – the origin of all this is pregenital.

That is incredible. It means that he is forced to build on to primary love[6] an original dimension of the genital stage, which brings with it this extremely complex relation to others through which copulation becomes love. Now, up to that point he has devoted himself to defining primary love[6] as an object relation which is closed in on itself, without intersubjectivity. The genital once reached, he wants the stuff on which the intersubjective relation is made to emerge out of this same primary love.[6] That is the contradiction of his doctrine.

Balint thinks of the pregenital as formed in an object relation, let us say an animal one, in which the object is not selfish,[6] is not subject. The term is never used, but the very formulae he does use show clearly what is at issue. In the pregenital, there is no self[7] at all, besides the one which organically exists. The object is there so as to saturate its needs. When we arrive at the level of the genital relation, one cannot escape from such a definition of the object relation, there is no way of making it develop any further, since, change as desire might, the object will still always have to be complementary to it. Yet Balint does find himself obliged to say – without being able to fill in the gap which results from doing so – that intersubjectivity, that is to say the experience of the selfishness of the other, stems from this pregenital stage from which he had previously excluded it. It is true. One can see this perfectly palpable fact revealing itself in the analytic experience. But this contradicts the entire theory of primary love.[6] And it is here, on the very plane of the theoretical statement, that one can see the blind alley one is led into when one takes the object relation to belong to the register of satisfaction.

[7] The term 'self' became accepted into the French language in the mid-twentieth century, first in medicine and then in psychology and psychoanalysis.

DR LANG: It seems to me that there is another contradiction, which also emerges from the presentation you've given. For in the closed world of primary love,[8] need and desire are completely confused. Besides, you yourself have sometimes used the one, sometimes the other term. Perhaps it is in paying attention to this point that we will see where the weakness lies.

Balint uses the two alternately. The basis of his thought is need,[8] and it is accidentally, in lacking, that need makes itself manifest as wish.[8] And that really is what is at issue – is the human wish[8] simply the lack inflicted on need?[8] Does desire emerge only out of frustration? Analysts have gone a long way down this path, in a manner which is far less coherent than Balint, to the point of making frustration the pivot of analytic theory – the primary frustration, secondary, primitive, complex frustrations, etc. You must extricate yourself from this fascination to fall on your feet again. That is what I am going to try to remind you of now.

If analysis has made any positive discovery about libidinal development, it is that the child is a pervert, even a polymorphous pervert.

Before the stage of genital normalisation, first sketched around the Oedipus complex, the child is given over to an entire series of phases connoted by the term component drives. These are its first libidinal relations to the world. On the basis of this sketch, analysis today is engaged in applying the notion of the object relation, which is caught – Lang's idea is extremely fruitful at this point – within that of frustration.

What is this primary perversion? One has to recall that analytic experience started off with a select number of clinical phenomena, amongst which are the perversions. If one introduces the perversions into the pregenital, you must bear in mind what they are when they are seen in a clearcut and delineated fashion.

Is the Balint notion of object relation applicable both in the phenomenology of the perversions, in which the pregenital phase is involved, and in the phenomenology of love?

Quite the opposite! There is not one form of the perverse phenomena whose very structure is not, in every moment of its being lived through, sustained by the intersubjective relation.

Let us leave to one side the voyeuristic and exhibitionistic relations – that's too easy to prove. Let us take as our example the sadistic relation, whether in an imaginary form or in a paradoxical clinical form.

One thing is certain – the sadistic relation can only be sustained in so far as the other is on the verge of still remaining a subject. If he is no longer anything more than reacting flesh, a kind of mollusc whose edges one titillates and which palpitates, the sadistic relation no longer exists. The sadistic subject will stop there, suddenly encountering a void, a gap, a hollow. The sadistic relation implies, in fact, that the partner's consent has been secured – his freedom, his confession, his humiliation. The proof of this is manifest in the forms which one may call benign. Is it not true that most sadistic manifestations, far from being taken to extremes, remain rather on the threshold of execution – playing the waiting-game, playing on the fear of the other, with pressure, with threat, keeping to the forms, more or less secret, of the participation of the partner.

You know the extent to which by far the largest part of our clinical experience of the perversions is restricted to the plane of an exclusively playful execution. We are not dealing here with subjects prey to a need. In the mirage of play, each identifies himself with the other. Intersubjectivity is the essential dimension.

I cannot refrain at this point from referring to the author who has described this play in the most magisterial manner – I am referring to Jean-Paul Sartre, and the phenomenology of the apprehension of others in the third part of Being and Nothingness. It is a work which one can demolish, from a philosophical point of view, can be made to crumple under the weight of numerous criticisms, but which surely, in this description, becomes, if only through its talent and its verve, something which is quite especially convincing.

The author's entire demonstration turns around the fundamental phenomenon which he calls the gaze. The human object is originally distinguished, ab initio, in the field of my experience, and cannot be assimilated to any other perceptible object, by virtue of being an object which is looking at me. Sartre makes, on this point, some very subtle distinctions. The gaze in question must on no account be confused with the fact, for example, of seeing his eyes. I can feel myself under the gaze of someone whose eyes I do not even see, not even discern. All that is necessary is for something to signify to me that there may be others there. This window, if it gets a bit dark, and if I have reasons for thinking that there is someone behind it, is straightaway a gaze. From the moment this gaze exists, I am already something other, in that I feel myself becoming an object for the gaze of others. But in this position, which is a reciprocal one, others also know that I am an object who knows himself to be seen.

The entire phenomenology of shame, of modesty, of prestige, of the specific fear engendered by the gaze, is quite admirably described there, and I recommend you to look it up in Sartre's book. It is essential reading for an analyst, above all given the pass that analysis has come to, forgetting intersubjectivity even in the perverse experience, where it is so firmly woven into a register in which you have to recognise the plane of the imaginary nuances which cannot possibly be confused with what I am teaching you to place as the axis of the symbolic relation, that is to say recognition. These forms are extremely ambiguous – it is not for nothing that I mentioned shame. Were we to analyse prestige in a more subtle manner, we would also come upon its derisory forms, upon for example the way it appears in children, for whom it is a form of excitation, etc.

We do indeed observe, in those phenomena which one calls perverted,

A friend told me an anecdote about this joke[9] that precedes bull fights, in which, in Spain, boobies are obliged to take part. He described an extraordinarily beautiful scene of collective sadism. You'll see how far the ambiguity extends.

So, one of these semi-idiots is made to file past, dressed up in a most beautiful matador costume. He files past into the arena before the little animals who partake in these games. As you know, they are not entirely innocuous. And the crowd is shouting out – But that one, there, isn't he beautiful! The character in question, whose semi-idiocy is firmly in the tradition of the grand games of the court of old Spain, gets into a sort of panic and starts to feel incompetent. His comrades say to him – Go on, you see, everybody wants you. Everybody joins in the game. The man's panic increases. He baulks, wants to get out of it. He is pushed beyond the barriers, and, finally, the see-saw takes place. All of a sudden, he breaks away from the people pushing him, and, carried away by the crushing insistence of the crowd, he becomes transformed into a sort of comic hero. Caught up in the structure of the situation, he walks up to the beast, taking on all the characteristics of the sacrificial attitude, with this difference, that it does after all remain on the level of a farce. He is immediately flattened to the ground. And he is carted off.

This sensational scene appears to me to illustrate perfectly the ambiguous zone in which intersubjectivity is essential. You could say that the symbolic element – the pressure of the clamour – plays an essential role in it, but it is almost cancelled out because of the mass phenomenon character which it assumes on this occasion. The whole phenomenon is thus reduced to that level of intersubjectivity whose manifestations we connote, provisionally, as perverse.

One can go further. And Sartre does go much further, in giving a structuration to the phenomenology of the love relation which to me appears irrefutable. I cannot go over the whole of it for you, because I would be obliged to go through all the phases of the dialectic of the for-itself and the in-itself. You will have to take the trouble of turning to the book yourselves.

Very astutely, Sartre makes the remark that, in the experience of love, it is not an entirely free commitment which we require from the object by whom we desire to be loved. The initial pact, the you are my wife or you are my husband to which I often allude when I talk to you about the symbolic register, contains nothing, in its Corneille-like abstraction, to saturate our basic requirements. The nature of the desire is expressed in a sort of bodily agglutinating of freedom. We want to become for the other an object that has the same limiting value for him as does, in relation to his freedom, his own body. We not only want to become for the other that in which his freedom is alienated – without a shadow of a doubt, freedom has to enter into it, since commitment is an essential element of our requirement to be loved – but it must also be much more than a free commitment. We require that a freedom accept its own renunciation so as to be, from that moment on, limited to everything capricious, imperfect, in truth inferior, the paths along which it is swept by its captation by that object which we ourselves are.

In this way, to become, through our contingence, through our specific existence in its most carnal aspect, in its most limiting aspect for our own selves, for our own freedom, to become the limit to which the other consents, to become the form of abdication of the other's freedom, that is the requirement which phenomenologically locates love in its concrete form – genital love,[10] as our good friend Balint said just now. That is what sets it down in this intermediate, ambiguous zone, between the symbolic and the imaginary.

If love is entirely caught up and glued within this imaginary intersubjectivity, upon which I would like to focus your attention, it requires, in its completed form, participation in the register of the symbolic, the freedom-pact exchange, which is embodied in giving one's word [parole donneé]. There, a tiered zone is established in which you will be able to distinguish the planes of identification, as we put it in this so often imprecise language of ours, and a whole range of nuances, an entire fanning out of forms at play between the imaginary and the symbolic.

By the same token, you see that, contrary to Balint's perspective, and much more in conformity with our experience, we must start off with a radical intersubjectivity, with the subject's total acceptance by the other subject. It is by starting with the experience of the adult that we must grapple retrospectively, nachträglich, with the supposedly original experiences, in ranging the various degradations in tiers, without ever leaving the domain of intersubjectivity. In so far as we remain within the register of analysis, we will be obliged to admit an original intersubjectivity.

There is no transition possible between the two registers, between that of animal desire, in which the relation is object, and that of the recognition of desire. There has to be intersubjectivity at the beginning, since it is there at the end. And if analytic theory has qualified as polymorphously perverse this or that mode or symptom in the child's behaviour, it is in so far as perversion implies the dimension of imaginary intersubjectivity. Just now, I tried to get you to grasp it, in this double gaze whereby I see that the other sees me, and that any intervening third party sees me being seen. There is never a simple duplicity of terms. It is not only that I see the other. I see him seeing me, which implicates the third term, namely that he knows that I see him. The circle is closed. There are always three terms in the structure, even if these three terms are not explicitly present.

In adults, we are aware of the palpable richness of perversion. Perversion, in sum, is the privileged exploration of an existential possibility of human nature – its internal tearing apart, its gap, through which the supra-natural world of the symbolic was able to make its entry. But, if the child is a polymorphous pervert, does this mean that one has to project on to him the qualitative value of the perversion as it is experienced in the adult? In the child, are we obliged to search out an intersubjectivity of the same type as that which we see to be constitutive of perversion in the adult?

Well, no. What do the Balints base themselves on when they tell us about this primary love which takes no account of the other's selfishness?[11] On words like those of the child who, loving his mother the best, can say, quite coldly, to her – When you are dead, Mummy, I'll have your hats. Or – When grandad dies, etc. Words which elicit the adult's adulation of the child, because the latter then appears to be a scarcely conceivable divine being, whose feelings are quite beyond him. When one comes across phenomena as paradoxical as those, when one no longer understands and when one has to resolve the question of the transcendental, one thinks one is confronted either with a god or an animal. We take children far too much for gods to admit it, so we tell ourselves that we take them for animals. And that is what Balint does in thinking that the child does not recognise the other, except in relation to his own need. A complete error.

This simple example of when you are dead tells us where the basic intersubjectivity really shows itself in the child – it shows in the fact that he can make use of language.

Granoff was right to say the other day that Balint's work presages the role of what, following Freud, I have emphasised, in the first games of the child, which consists in evoking – I am not saying in calling – presence in absence, and in rejecting the object from presence. But Balint fails to recognise that this is a linguistic phenomenon. He only sees one thing, which is that the child does not take the object into account. Whereas what is important is that this little human being is able to make use of the symbolic function, thanks to which, as I have explained to you, it is possible for the elephants to make their entry here, however strait be the gate.

[11] English in the original.

To start with, intersubjectivity is given in the manipulation of the symbol, and this is the case right from the beginning. Everything begins with the possibility of naming, which is both destructive of the thing and allows the passage of the thing onto the symbolic plane, thanks to which the truly human register comes into its own. It is from that point on that, in a more and more complicated manner, the embodiment of the symbolic within imaginary experience takes place. The symbolic will shape all those inflections which, in the life of the adult, the imaginary commitment, the original captation, can take on.

In neglecting the intersubjective dimension, one slips into the register of that object relation from which there is no means of escape, and which leads us to theoretical no less than to technical blind alleys.

Have I wrapped things up enough this morning to be able to leave you at this point? That doesn't mean that there won't be a sequel.

For the child, to start with there is the symbolic and the real, contrary to what one might think. Everything which we see taking on consistency, becoming enriched and being diversified in the register of the imaginary begins with these two poles. If you think that the child is more a captive of the imaginary than of the rest, you are right in a certain sense. The imaginary is there. But it is completely inaccessible to us. It is only accessible to us when we start from its realisations in the adult.

The past history, the lived history, of the subject, which we try to get at in our practice, is not what the person you heard yesterday evening present to you as the snoozing, the fiddling about of the subject while in analysis. We can only get at it – and that is what we do, whether we know it or not – through the adult's childish language. I will prove it to you next time.

In magisterial fashion, Ferenczi saw the importance of this question – what is it in an analysis which makes the child within the adult participate? There is no doubt about the answer – whatever is verbalised in an irruptive fashion.

NUMERICAL STRUCTURATION OF THE INTERSUBJECTIVE FIELD

THE HOLOPHRASE

SPEECH IN THE TRANSFERENCE

ANGELUS SILESIUS

Last time I left you on the dyadic relation in primary love. You were able to see that this leads Balint to end up conceptualising the analytic relation itself on this model – what he calls, quite rigorously, the two body psychology.[1] I think you have understood what blind alleys this leads one into, if one takes as a central idea the supposedly harmonious imaginary relation, which saturates natural desire.

I tried to show you this in the phenomenology of the perverse relation. I put the accent on sadism and scopophilia, leaving to one side the homosexual relation, which would require an infinitely more subtle study of imaginary intersubjectivity, of its uncertainty, of its unstable equilibrium, of its critical character. I thus centred the study of the imaginary intersubjective relation around the phenomenon, in the true sense, of the gaze.

The gaze is not located just at the level of the eyes. The eyes may very well not appear, they may be masked. The gaze is not necessarily the face of our fellow being, it could just as easily be the window behind which we assume he is lying in wait for us. It is an x, the object when faced with which the subject becomes object.

I gave you an introduction to the experience of sadism, which I took to be elective in revealing this dimension to you. I pointed out that, in the gaze of the being whom I torment, I have to sustain my desire with an act of defiance, a challenge[2] at every instant. If it does not rise above the situation, if it is not glorious, desire sinks into shame. This is equally true of the scopophilic relation. According to Jean-Paul Sartre's analysis, for anyone surprised in the middle of looking, the entire colour of the situation changes, in one swerving moment, and I become a pure thing, a maniac.

What is perversion? It is not simply an aberration in relation to social criteria, an anomaly contrary to good morals, although this register is not absent, nor is it an atypicality according to natural criteria, namely that it more or less derogates from the reproductive finality of sexual union. It is something else in its very structure.

A certain number of perverse inclinations have not without reason been said to arise out of a desire which dare not speak its name. Perversion in fact is to be placed at the limit of the register of recognition, and that is what fixes it, stigmatises it as such. Structurally, perversion such as I have delineated it for you on the imaginary plane, can only be sustained with a precarious status which, at every moment is contested, from within, for the subject. It is always fragile, at the mercy of an inversion, a subversion, which makes one think of the change of sign which occurs in certain mathematical functions – at the point when one passes from one value of a variable to the value immediately following, the correlative changes from plus to minus infinity.

The fundamental uncertainty of the perverse relation, the fact that it can find no way of becoming grounded in any satisfying action, makes up one aspect of the drama of homosexuality. But it is also this structure which gives perversion its value.

Perversion is an experience which allows one to enter more deeply into what one can call, in the full sense, the human passion, to use the Spinozistic term, that is to say what there is in man which is open to this division from himself which structures the imaginary, namely, between O and O′, the specular relation. It becomes a profound experience, on account of the fact that within this gap of human desire, all manner of nuances are called forth, rising up in tiers from shame to prestige, from buffoonery to heroism, whereby human desire in its entirety is exposed, in the deepest sense of the term, to the desire of the other.

Remember the quite stupendous analysis of homosexuality which unfolds in Proust in the myth of Albertine. It hardly matters that this character is feminine – the structure of the relation is eminently homosexual. The requirement of this style of desire can only be satisfied in an inexhaustible captation of the desire of the other, pursued even in his dreams by the dreams of the subject, implying at each moment a complete abdication of the true desire of the other. An incessant see-saw of the lark-mirror which, at each moment, makes a complete turn on itself – the subject exhausts himself in pursuing the desire of the other, which he will never be able to grasp as his own desire, because his own desire is the desire of the other. It is himself whom he pursues. Therein lies the drama of this jealous passion, which is also a form of the imaginary intersubjective relation.

The intersubjective relation which subtends perverse desire is only sustained by the annihilation either of the desire of the other, or of the desire of the subject. It can only be grasped at the limit, in its inversions, whose meaning is made clear in a flash. This means – do think hard – that in the one as in the other, this relation dissolves the being of the subject. The other subject is reduced to being only the instrument of the first, who thus remains the only subject as such, but the latter is reduced to being only an idol offered to the desire of the other.

Perverse desire finds its support in the ideal of an inanimate object. But it cannot rest content with the realisation of this ideal. As soon as it realises it, at the very moment when it catches up with it, it loses its object. Its satiation is hence by its very structure condemned to be realised prior to the embrace through the extinction of desire or else the disappearance of the object.

I underline disappearance, because you find in analyses like this one the secret key to this aphanisis which Jones talked of when he tried to grasp, beyond the castration complex, what he touched on in the experience of certain infantile traumas. But here we are getting lost in a kind of mystery, because we do not rediscover the plane of the imaginary in it.

When all is said and done, an entire segment of the analytic experience is nothing other than – the exploration of blind alleys of imaginary experience, of their continuations, which are not innumerable, since they rest on the very structure of the body in so far as as such it defines a concrete topography. In the subject's history, or rather in his development, certain fertile, temporalised moments come to light, in which the different styles of frustration are revealed. These hollows, these cracks, these chasms that come to light in development are what define these fertile moments.

Something always goes limp when people talk to you about frustration. Owing to something like a naturalistic inclination of language, when the observer draws up the natural history of his fellow being, he omits to inform you that the subject experiences the frustration. Frustration is not a phenomenon that one can objectivate in the subject in the form of a deviation of the act which unites it to this object. It is not animal aversion. However premature it may be, the subject himself experiences the bad object as a frustration. And, by the same token, the frustration is experienced in the other.

Here we find a reciprocal relation of annihilation, a fatal relation structured by the following two abysses – either desire is extinguished, or the object disappears. That is why, at every turn, I take my bearings from the master-slave dialectic, and I re-explain it.

The master-slave relation is a limit-example, because, to be sure, the imaginary register in which it is deployed appears only at the limit of our experience. The analytic experience is not a total one. It is defined on another plane than that of the imaginary – the symbolic plane.

Hegel gives an account of the interhuman bond. He has to account not only for society, but for history. He cannot neglect any of its aspects. Now, one of these essential aspects, which is neither collaboration between men, nor the pact, nor the bond of love, is struggle and labour. And he focusses on this aspect, in order to structure the fundamental relation within an original myth, on the plane which he himself defines as negative, as marked by negativity.

What differentiates human society from animal society – the term doesn't frighten me – is that the former cannot be grounded upon any objectifiable bond. The intersubjective dimension as such must come into it. The master-slave relation does not therefore involve the domestication of man by man. That cannot be enough. So, what grounds this relation? It is not that the one who declares himself vanquished pleas for mercy, it is rather that the master enters into this struggle for reasons of pure prestige, and has risked his life. This risk establishes his superiority, and it is in the name of that, not of his strength, that he is recognised as master by the slave.

This situation begins with an impasse, because his recognition by the slave is worth nothing to the master, since only a slave has recognised him, that is to say someone that he does not recognise as a man. The initial structure of this Hegelian dialectic seems thus to lead to a dead end. You can see therefore that it is not without its affinities with the impasse of the imaginary situation.

However, this situation does unfold further. Its point of departure, being imaginary, is hence mythical. But its extensions lead us on to the symbolic plane. You know the extensions – that is what makes us speak of the master and the slave. Indeed, beginning with the mythical situation, an action is undertaken, and establishes the relation between pleasure [jouissance] and labour. A law is imposed upon the slave, that he should satisfy the desire and the pleasure [jouissance] of the other. It is not sufficient for him to plea for mercy, he has to go to work. And when you go to work, there are rules, hours – we enter into the domain of the symbolic.

If you look at it closely, this domain of the symbolic does not have a simple relation of succession to the imaginary domain whose pivot is the fatal intersubjective relation. We do not pass from one to the other in one jump from the anterior to the posterior, once the pact and the symbol are established. In fact, the myth itself can only be conceived of as already bounded by the register of the symbolic, for the reason that I underlined just now – the situation cannot be grounded in goodness knows what biological panic at the approach of death. Death is never experienced as such, is it – it is never real. Man is only ever afraid of an imaginary fear. But that is not all. In the Hegelian myth, death is not even structured like a fear, it is structured like a risk, and, in a word, like a stake. From the beginning, between the master and the slave, there's a rule of the game.

I won't push this today. I am only saying it for those of you who are most open – the intersubjective relation, which unfolds in the imaginary, is at the same time, in so far as it structures a human action, implicitly implicated in a rule of the game.

Let us once again take up, under another aspect, the relation to the gaze.

We are at war. I am moving forward over a plain, and I assume myself to be under a gaze lying in wait for me. If I am assuming that, it is not so much that I am afraid of some sign of my enemy, some attack, because as soon as that happens the situation becomes more relaxed and I know who I am dealing with. What matters the most to me is knowing what the other imagines, what the other detects of these intentions of mine, I who am moving forward, because I must screen my movements from him. It is a matter of ruse.

The dialectic of the gaze is maintained on this plane. What counts is not that the other sees where I am, but that he sees where I am going, that is to say, quite precisely, that he sees where I am not. In every analysis of the intersubjective relation, what is essential is not what is there, what is seen. What structures it is what is not there.

The theory of games, as it is called, is a fundamental method for the study of this relation. Simply because it is a mathematical theory, we are already on the symbolic plane. However simply you define the field of an intersubjectivity, its analysis always requires a certain number of numerical givens, which, as such, are symbolic.

If you read the book of Sartre's I was referring to the other day, you will see that he allows something extremely disturbing to emerge. Having defined the intersubjective relation so clearly, he seems to imply that, if there is a plurality in this world of imaginary inter-relations, this plurality is not enumerable, in so far as each of the subjects is by definition the unique centre of reference. This holds if one remains on the phenomenological plane of the analysis of the in-itself and the for-itself. But its consequence is that Sartre does not perceive that the intersubjective field cannot but open on to a numerical structuration, on to the three, the four, which are our bench-marks in the analytic experience.

Primitive as it is, this symbolism brings us immediately on to the plane of language, in so far as, outside of that, there is no numeration conceivable.

Another small parenthesis. I was reading, not much longer than three days ago, an old book from the beginning of the century, The History of the New World of America. The topic was the origin of language, a problem which attracted the attention of quite a number of linguists, even provoking their consternation.

Every discussion of the origin of language is vitiated by an irremediable puerility, even with indisputable cretinism. On every occasion, someone tries to make language emerge out of some or other advance in thought. Quite evidently, it is a circle. Thought, on this account, would pinpoint the detail in a situation, delimit the particularity, the combinatory element. It would by itself go beyond the stage of the detour, which is the mark of animal intelligence, to accede to that of the symbol. But how, if the symbol, which is the very structure of human thought, is not there in the first place?

To think is to substitute the word elephant for elephants, and a ring for the sun. You realise of course that there is an abyss between this thing which is phenomenologically the sun – the centre of which runs through the world of appearances, the unity of light – and a ring. And even if one spans it, what progress is there over animal intelligence? None. Because the sun in so far as it is designated by a ring is valueless. It only has a value in so far as this ring is placed in relation with other formalisations, which constitute with it this symbolic whole within which it has its place, at the centre of the world for example, or at the periphery, it doesn't matter which. The symbol only has value if it is organised in a world of symbols.

Those who speculate about the origin of language, and try to engineer the transitions between an appreciation of the whole situation and symbolic fragmentation have always been struck by what have been called holophrases. In the usages of certain peoples, and you won't need to go far to find common usages, there are phrases, expressions which cannot be broken down, and which have to be related to a situation taken in its entirety – these are holophrases. Here, it is thought, one has got hold of a juncture between the animal, who gets about without structuring situations, and man, who inhabits a symbolic world.

In the work I cited just now, I read that the Fijians, in certain specific situations, use the following phrase, which is not a phrase belonging to their language [langage] and cannot be reduced down to anything else – Ma mi la pa ni pa ta pa. The phonetisation is not indicated in the text, and I can only say it to you like that.

In what situation is the holophrase in question spoken? Entirely innocently, our ethnographer writes – State of events of two persons looking at the other hoping that the other will offer to do something which both parties desire but are unwilling to do.[3]

Here we find defined with an exemplary precision a state of inter-gaze where each expects the other to decide on something which has to be done by the two, which is between the two, but which neither of them wishes to enter into. And, by the same token, you see clearly that the holophrase is not an intermediary step between a primitive assumption of the situation as a whole, which would be the register of animal action, and symbolisation. It is not some vague sort of original gluing together of the situation into a verbal mode. On the contrary, what is involved is something in which what pertains to the register of the symbolic composition is defined at the limit, at the periphery.

I will leave you the task of bringing me some holophrases taken from our everyday usage. Listen carefully to the conversation of your contemporaries and you will see to what extent it is imbued with them. You will also see that every holophrase is connected with limit situations, in which the subject is suspended in a specular relation to the other.

This analysis had as its aim to get you to overturn that psychological perspective in which the intersubjective relation is reduced to an inter-objectal relation, grounded on a natural, complementary satisfaction. We have now got to Balint's article, 'On transference of emotions', whose title gives notice as to what I could call the delirious plane on which it unfolds – in the original, technical sense of the term delirious [délirant].

What is at issue is transference. The first paragraph invokes the two fundamental phenomena of analysis – resistance and transference. Resistance is defined, extremely well in fact, relating it to the phenomenon of language – everything which brakes, alters, slows up the blarney, or else completely interrupts it. You cannot go further than that. No conclusion is drawn from this, and we pass on to the phenomenon of transference.

How can an author as subtle as Balint, as refined, as delicate a practitioner, as admirable a writer, I would go so far as to say, undertake a study of some fifteen pages starting off with so psychological a definition of transference? It amounts to saying the following – what must come into it is something which exists inside the patient, so it is quite clearly something or other, feelings, emotions – the word emotion gives a better image. The problem is then to show how these emotions are embodied, projected, disciplined, symbolised. Now, the symbols of these supposed emotions evidently have no relation to them. So, he tells us about the national flag, the lion and the unicorn of Britain, the epaulets of officers, and everything else you fancy, about the two houses with their two roses of contrasting colours, judges who wear wigs.

I would be the last person to deny that one is capable of finding something to meditate upon in these examples skimmed from the surface of everyday British life. But, for Balint, it is a pretext for considering the symbol solely from the perspective of displacement. And with good reason – since he takes as the starting-point so-called emotion, a phenomenon of psychological surging forward, which would in this case be the real, the symbol in which it has to find its expression and come into being can only be displaced in relation to it.

There can be no doubt that the symbol has a role to play in every displacement. But the question is rather of knowing whether, as such, it is defined within the vertical register, by virtue of being displacement. That is the wrong road. Balint's remarks contain nothing erroneous in themselves, it is simply that the path that has been taken cuts across the right one – instead of going in the forwards direction, it goes in the direction in which everything comes to a halt.

Balint then reminds us what a metaphor is – the face of a mountain, the foot of a table, etc. Are we finally going to investigate the nature of language? No. We are told that the mode of operation of the transference is the following – you are angry, so you give the table a punch. As if it was really the table I was punching! There's a fundamental error in this.

Nonetheless, this really is the issue – how does the aim of the act come to be displaced? How does the emotion come to be displaced in its object? The real structure and the symbolic structure enter into an ambiguous relation which is constructed in the vertical direction, each of these two universes corresponding to the other, but for the fact that since the notion of a universe is not to be found here, there is no way of introducing that of correspondence.

According to Balint, transference is transference of emotions. And what is emotion transferred on to? In all of his examples, on to an inanimate object – note in passing that this word, inanimate, has already made its appearance just now as the limit of the imaginary dialectical relation. This amuses Balint, this transference on to the inanimate – I am not asking you, he says, what the object makes of all this. To be sure, he adds, if one thinks that the transference is made on to a subject, one ends up with a complication you will never see the end of.

That's right! That really is what happens, and for some time now – there is no way of doing analysis. Such a song and dance is made out of the notion of counter-transference, so much swaggering, boasting, promising the earth – yet somehow or other something gets in the way, it is just that this means that in the end – you will never see the end of it. With a two body psychology,[4] we come upon the famous problem, which is unresolved in physics, of two bodies.

In fact, if you restrict yourselves to the level of two bodies, there is no satisfactory symbolisation available. So is it by taking this path, and by maintaining that the transference is essentially a phenomenon of displacement, that one grasps the nature of transference?

Balint then tells us a pretty story. A gentleman comes to see him. He is on the brink of analysis – we know this situation very well – and he can't decide. He has been to see several analysts, and in the end he came to see Balint. He tells him a long story, very rich, very complicated, with details about his feelings, and his sufferings. And it is at this point that our Balint – whose theoretical positions by the way I am in the process of slandering, and God knows I'm sorry to do it – shows himself to be the wonderful character he is.

Balint does not fall into the counter-transference – that is to say, in plain language, he is not an idiot – in the coded language we wallow in, we call the fact of hating someone ambivalence, and the fact of being an idiot counter-transference. Balint is not an idiot, he listens to this bloke, as a man who has already heard a great many things, a great many people, a man of experience. And he doesn't understand. That happens. There are stories like that, you don't understand them. When you don't understand a story, don't blame yourself immediately, say to yourself – the fact that I don't understand must mean something. Not only does Balint not understand, but he considers that he has the right not to understand. He says nothing to this bloke, and asks him to come back.

The bloke comes back. He carries on telling his story. And lays it on a bit thick. And Balint still doesn't understand. What the other tells him, are things which are as likely as anything else, the thing is that they just don't fit together. Experiences like that happen, they are clinical experiences to which you must always accord considerable weight, and sometimes they incline us towards the diagnosis of something organic. But that's not what this is about. So, Balint says to his client. What's strange is that you are telling me lots of really interesting things, but I must confess that I can't make head or tail of your story. Then the bloke brightens up, with a big smile on his face. You're the first honest man I have met, because I've told all those things to some of your colleagues, who straightaway saw in them an intimation of an interesting, sophisticated structure. I told you all this as a test, to see if you were like all the others, a charlatan and a liar.

You must have a sense of the gulf there is between Balint's two registers, when he expounds on the blackboard that it is the emotions of the English citizens which are displaced on to the British lion[5] and the two unicorns, and when he is on the job, talking intelligently about what he is trying out. One may say – No doubt this bloke is within his rights, but isn't it rather uneconomic[5]? Isn't it rather a long detour? Well, there, you start to go astray. Because the issue is not one of knowing whether it is economic or not. The bloke's way of going about things is nobly sustained, within his register, in so far as at the start of the analytic experience, one encounters the register of mendacious[6] speech.

The instauration of the lie in reality is brought about by speech. And it is precisely because it introduces what isn't, that it can also introduce what is. Before speech, nothing either is or isn't [rien n'est, ni n'est pas]. Everything is already there, no doubt, but it is only with speech that there are things which are – which are true or false, that is to say which are – and things which are not. Truth hollows out its way into the real thanks to the dimension of speech. There is neither true nor false prior to speech. Truth is introduced along with it, and so is the lie, and other registers as well. Before we go our various ways today, let us put them in a sort of triangle with three apexes. There, the lie. Here, the mistake – not error, to which I will come back. And then, what else? – ambiguity, to which, by its very nature, speech is doomed. Because, the very act of speech, which founds the dimension of truth, always remains, by this fact, behind, beyond. Speech is in its essence ambiguous.

Symmetrically, the hole, the gap of being as such is hollowed out in the real. The notion of being, as soon as we try to grasp it, proves itself to be as ungraspable as that of speech. Because being, the very verb itself, only exists in the register of speech. Speech introduces the hollow of being into the texture of the real, the one and the other holding on to and balancing each other, exactly correlative.

Let us move on to another example, which Balint offers us, no less significant than the first one. How can he integrate them into this register of displacement within which he expounded on the transference? That is another story.

This time we have a charming lady patient, who belongs to the type, well illustrated in some English films, who chatter,[7] talk-talk-talk-talk-to-say-nothing. That is how the sessions go by. She has already done long stretches of analysis with someone else before coming into the hands of Balint, who understands very clearly – and even the patient confesses to it – that when something is troubling her, she covers it over by saying anything.

Where is the decisive turning-point? One day, after a painful hour of chatter,[7] Balint ends up putting his finger on what it is she didn't want to say. She didn't want to say that she had received a letter of recommendation for a job from a doctor friend of hers, which said that she was a completely trustworthy[7] person. A pivotal moment, from then on she makes an about turn, and will be able to commit herself to the analysis. In fact Balint gets the patient to acknowledge that, right from the start, that was exactly what mattered to her – she must not be considered trustworthy, that is to say someone bound by her word. Because if her word binds her, she will have to get to work, like the slave just now, she will have to enter the world of labour, that is to say of the homogeneous adult relationship, of the symbol, of the law.

It's clear. From the beginning, she understood very well the difference between the way one treats the words of a child and the way one treats the words of an adult. So as not to be committed, located in the world of adults, where one is always more or less reduced to slavery, she chatters away so as to say nothing and fill the sessions with hot air.

We can stop for a moment, and ponder on the fact that the child also has speech. It is not empty. It is as full of meaning as the speech of the adult. It is so full of meaning that adults spend their time marvelling at it – See how clever he is, the sweet little thing! Did you hear what he said the other day? In fact, that's the whole point.

Indeed, here we have, just as a moment ago, this element of idolification which comes into the imaginary relation. The wonderful speech of the child may perhaps be transcendental speech, the revelation of heaven, the oracle of the little god, but it is clear that it doesn't commit him to anything.

And we make strenuous efforts, when things aren't going well, to extract some words from him which will tie him down. Lord knows how the adult's dialectic skids! The point is to link the subject to his contradictions, to make him sign what he says, and to pledge his speech in a dialectic.

In the transference situation – it is not me who says this, but Balint, and he is right, though this is something completely different from a displacement – what is at issue is the value of speech, no longer this time in so far as it creates the fundamental ambiguity, but in so far as it is a function of the symbolic, of the pact which links the subjects together in one action. The human action par excellence is originally founded on the existence of the world of the symbol, namely on laws and contracts. And it is truly around this register that Balint, when he is working at the level of the concrete, in his capacity as analyst, makes the situation between him and the subject revolve.

From this day on, he can make remarks to her about all manner of things – for example the way she behaves in her various jobs, that is to say, as soon as she begins to be trusted by everyone, she makes sure that some trivial matter gets her the sack. Even the kind of jobs she finds is significant – she is on the telephone, she receives things or she sends [envoie] others off to do various things, in short she shunts things around so that she can feel herself outside the situation, and in the end, she always makes sure to get the sack [renvoyer].

So this is the plane on which the transference relation comes to be played out – it is played out around the symbolic relation, whether it be a question of its institution, of its extension, or of its maintenance. The transference includes incidents, projections of imaginary articulations, but it is to be located entirely within the symbolic relation. What does that imply?

Speech is not deployed on one plane alone. By definition, speech always has its ambiguous backdrops, which attain the moment of the ineffable, in which it can no longer be spoken, can no longer provide its own foundations as speech. But this beyond is not the one that psychology searches for in the subject, finding it in God knows what mimicry, cramps, agitations, and all the emotional correlates of speech. The so-called psychological beyond is in fact on the other side, it is a be-fore [en-deça]. The be-yond involved is to be found in the very dimension of speech.

By being of the subject, we do not mean its psychological properties, but what is hollowed out in the experience of speech, which constitutes the analytic situation.

This experience is constituted in analysis by extremely paradoxical rules, since what is involved is a dialogue, but a dialogue which is as much of a monologue as possible. It unfolds according to a rule of the game, and entirely within the symbolic order. Do you follow? What I wanted to exemplify today is the symbolic register in analysis, in bringing out the contrast that exists between the concrete examples that Balint gives, and his theorisation.

What for him is brought out by these examples is the mainspring of the situation, that is, the use that each of these two people, the bloke and the lady, made of speech. Now, that is an illicit extrapolation. Speech in analysis is not at all the same as that speech, which is both triumphant and innocent, which the child can make use of before he enters into the world of work. To speak in analysis is not equivalent to sustaining on purpose an insignificant discourse in the world of work. It is only by analogy that one can link the two together. Their basis is entirely different.

The analytic situation is not just an ectopia of the infantile situation. It is obviously an atypical situation, and Balint tries to take account of this by seeing it as an attempt at maintaining the register of primary love.[8] That's true, from certain points of view, but not all. In limiting oneself to this point of view, one embarks upon interventions which will lead the subject astray.

The facts prove it. In saying to the lady patient that she was reproducing some situation or other from her childhood, the analyst who preceded Balint didn't succeed in turning the situation around. That only started to happen given the concrete fact that the lady had with her that morning a letter which allowed her to find a position. Without theorising it, without knowing it, Balint intervened there in the symbolic register, put into play by the assured guarantee, by the simple fact of answering for someone. And it was precisely because he was on this plane that he had an effect.

His theory is out of joint, and botched as well. And yet, when one reads his text, one finds, as you have just seen, gloriously enlightening examples. The excellent practitioner Balint cannot, despite his theory, fail to recognise the dimension within which he manoeuvres.

Amongst Balint's references, there is one I want to take up here. It is a couplet by someone that he calls one of our colleagues – and why not? – Johannes Scheffler.

Having, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, undertaken very advanced medical studies – that probably had more meaning at that time than in our day – the latter wrote some very striking couplets, under the name of Angelus Silesius. Mystical? That is not quite the right way to describe them. The question of the deity is to be found in them, and of his relations with creativity which in its essence depends on human speech, and which goes as far as speech, to the point, even, where it ends up falling silent. The rather unorthodox perspective which Angelus Silesius always maintained is, in fact, a puzzle for historians of religious thought.

That he finds a place in Balint's text is certainly not just a matter of chance. The two verses he quotes are very beautiful. Their subject is nothing less than being in so far as it is tied, in the realisation of the subject, to the contingent or the accidental, and for Balint this has resonances with how he conceives the final moment of analysis, namely this state of narcissistic eruption, which I have already talked about in one of our meetings.

This rings a bell for us as well. Except, I don't think of the analytic termination in this manner. Freud's formula – Where id was, ego must be – is usually understood in line with crass spatialisation, and the analytic reconquest of the id is in the end reduced to the action of a mirage. The ego sees itself in a self which is simply a final alienation of itself, just better finished than all those it has known up to then.

No, it is the act of speech which is constitutive. The progress of an analysis does not consist in the enlarging of the field of the ego, it is not the reconquest by the ego of its margin of the unknown, rather it is a genuine inversion, a displacement, like a minuet executed by the ego and the id.

It is time to give you the couplet of Angelus Silesius – the thirtieth from the second book of The Cherubinic Wanderer.

Zufall und Wesen
Mensch werde wesentlich: denn wann die Welt vergeht
So fällt der Zufall weg, das Wesen das besteht.

This couplet translates as follows –

Contingence and essence
Man, become essential: for when the world fails at last,
The contingent falls away, but Essence, that stands fast.[9]

That really is what is at issue, at the end of analysis, a twilight, an imaginary decline of the world, and even an experience at the limit of depersonalisation. That is when the contingent falls away – the accidental, the trauma, the hitches of history – And it is being which then comes to be constituted.

Clearly Angelus wrote this at the time when he was studying medicine. The end of his life was troubled by the dogmatic wars of the Reformation and the Counter-Reformation, with respect to which he took up an extremely impassioned position. But the books of the Cherubinic Wanderer strike a transparent, crystalline note. It is one of the most significant moments in human meditation on being, a moment richer in resonances for me than the

Dark Night of St John of the Cross, which everyone reads and no one understands.

I cannot recommend anyone who is in analysis too highly to go out and acquire the works of Angelus Silesius. They are not that long, and they are translated in French, published by Aubier. You will find in them lots of other things to meditate on, for example the pun on Wort, speech, and Ort, place, and aphorisms which are spot on concerning temporality. Perhaps I will have an occasion next time to touch on some of these admirable formulae, which are extremely closed and yet open up, and lend themselves to meditation.

SPEECH IN THE TRANSFERENCE

The creative function of speech

Our friend Granoff has something to tell us, which seems to fit in with what I discussed last time. I am exceedingly happy when people take such initiatives, as they are completely in conformity with the spirit of dialogue which I desire in what is – let us not forget it – first and foremost a seminar. I do not know what he is going to tell us this morning.

Granoff's presentation concerned two articles from the April 1954 number of the Psycho-analytic Review: 'Emotion, instinct and pain-pleasure', by A. Chapman Isham, and 'A study of the dream in depth, its corollary and consequences' by C. Bennitt.

These two extensive articles, pitched at a high theoretical level, converge with what I am doing here. But each of them draws attention to different points.

The first puts the emphasis on the information of emotion, which is said to be the ultimate reality with which we have to deal, and, strictly speaking, is the object of our experience. This conception answers to the desire to find an object somewhere which is similar, in so far as it is possible, to objects belonging to other registers.

Alexander wrote an important article, which we may perhaps discuss some day, called 'Logic of emotions', which no doubt places him at the heart of analytic theory.

Just as in this recent article of Chapman Isham, the question is how to introduce a dialectic into what we usually consider to be the affective register. Alexander starts with the well known logico-symbolic schema in which Freud deduces the various forms of delusion in accordance with the various ways of denying I love him – It is not me who loves him – It is not him that I love – I do not love him – He hates me – It is him who loves me – which accounts for the genesis of various delusions – the jealous, the impassioned, the persecutive, the erotomaniacal, etc. Hence we grasp the transformations, the very metabolism, which occur in the preconscious order, in a symbolic structuration, at a high level, since it includes very elaborate grammatical variations.

The first article that Granoff commented upon is thus interesting on account of its being at odds with the theoretical current dominant in analysis today. The second seems even more interesting to me, in so far as it seeks the beyond, the reality, the fact, as the article puts it, to which signification refers. It is a crucial problem.

So, you will get caught up in paths which are always dead ends, as is clearly seen in view of the impasses in which analytic theory finds itself today, if you fail to take account of the fact that signification only ever refers back to itself, that is to say to another signification.

Each time that we are obliged, in the analysis of language, to look for the signification of a word, the only correct method is to enumerate all of its usages. If you want to know the signification of the word main in the French language, you must draw up the catalogue of its usages, and not only when it represents the organ of the hand, but also when it figures in main d'oeuvre [manpower], mainmise [manumission], mainmorte [mortmain], etc. The signification is given by the sum of these usages.

This is what we are concerned with in analysis. We don't have to try very hard to find additional references. What need is there to talk of a reality which would sustain the so-called metaphorical usages? Every kind of usage, in a certain sense, is always metaphorical. Metaphor is not to be distinguished, as Jones thought, at the beginning of his article on 'The theory of symbolism', from the symbol itself and from its usage. Were I to address another being, whether created or not, in calling him sun of my heart, it would be an error to believe, as Jones does, that it is a question of a comparison, between what you are in my heart and what the sun is, etc. Comparison is only a secondary development of the original emergence of the metaphorical relation to being, one that is infinitely richer than anything I could now illuminate.

This emergence implies everything which will come to be linked with it in the future, and which I do not believe to have said. Simply from my having formulated this relation, it is me, my being, my avowal, my invocation, which enters into the domain of the symbol. Implied in this formula is the fact that the sun heats me up, the fact that it allows me to live, and also that it is the centre of my gravitation, and for that matter that it gives rise to Valéry's morne moitié d'ombre,[1] that it also blinds, lending false clarity and a deceptive glitter to everything. Because, the greatest light is also, is it not, the source of all obscurity. All that is already implied in the symbolic invocation. The emergence of the symbol creates, literally, a new order of being in the relations between men.

But you'll say, there are, all the same, irreducible expressions. And you will object, furthermore, that we can always reduce the creative utterance of this symbolic call down to the level of fact, and that one could find simpler, more organic, more animal formulae for the metaphor that I gave you as an example. Try it out for yourselves – you will see that you will never leave the world of the symbol behind.

Let us suppose that you have recourse to the organic index, to the Mets ta main sur mon coeur,[2] said to Léonor by the infanta at the beginning of Le Cid, to express her feelings of love for the young knight. Well, if the organic index is invoked, it is still there at the centre of the confession, like a testimony, a testimony which only gains its edge in so far as – Je m'en souviens si bien que j'épandrais mon sang Avant que je m'abbaisse à démentir mon rang.[3] It is, in fact, only in as much as she forbids herself this feeling that she invokes a factual element. The fact of her heart beating only acquires its meaning within the symbolic world traced out in the dialectic of the feeling which is refused, or which is implicitly refused recognition by the person who experiences it.

We have, as you can see, come back to the point our discourse had reached last time.

Each time that we find ourselves within the order of speech, everything which founds another reality in reality, at the limit, only acquires its meaning and its edge in relation to this same order. If the emotion can be displaced, inverted, inhibited, if it is engaged in a dialectic, it is due to its being taken up into the symbolic order, in accordance with which the other orders, the imaginary and the real, find their place and their disposition.

Once more, I will try to make you see it. Here is a little fable.

One day, Odysseus's companions – as you know, a thousand misadventures befell them, and I think almost none completed the excursion – were turned, because of their unfortunate tendencies, into swine. The theme of the metamorphosis is well calculated to interest us, since it raises the question of the limit between the human and the animal.

So, they are turned into swine, and the story goes on.

One is still obliged to think they nonetheless retain some links with the human world, since in the middle of the pigsty – but the pigsty is a society – they

[2] Pierre Corneille, Le Cid, Act I, Scene 2: 'Put your hand on my heart.'

[3] Ibid. 'I remember it so well that I would spill my own blood/Before I would abase myself in denying my rank.'

communicate, through their grunts, their different needs, hunger, thirst, their sensuality, indeed their group feeling. But that is not all.

What can one say about these grunts? Aren't they also messages addressed to the other world? Well, here, at any rate, is what I hear. Odysseus's companions grunt the following – We miss Odysseus, we miss his being with us, we miss his teaching, what he was for us in life.

How do we recognise that a grunt which comes to us out of this silky mass filling the enclosed space of the pigsty is speech? Is it because some ambivalent feeling is expressed in it?

On this occasion there really does exist what we call, in the order of emotions and feelings, ambivalence. Because, for his companions, Odysseus is somewhat of a liability as a guide. However, once changed into swine, they no doubt have grounds for missing his presence. From whence the doubt about what they are communicating.

This dimension is not to be overlooked. But is it enough to turn a grunt into speech? No, because the emotional ambivalence of the grunt is a reality, in its essence unconstituted.

The pig's grunt only becomes speech when someone raises the question as to what it is that they want to make you believe. Speech is precisely only speech in as much as someone believes in it.

And what, through grunting, do these companions of Odysseus turned into swine want to have us believe? – that they are still somewhat human. To give expression to their nostalgia for Odysseus is, on this occasion, to lay claim to recognition for themselves, the swine, as being the companions of Odysseus.

It is within this dimension that speech is to be located, before all else. Speech is essentially the means of gaining recognition. It is there before anything lying behind. And, on account of that, it is ambivalent, and absolutely unfathomable. What it says – is it true? Is it not true? It is a mirage. It is this initial mirage which guarantees that you are in the domain of speech.

Without this dimension, a communication is just something which transmits, roughly of the same order as a mechanical movement. A moment ago I alluded to the silky rustling, the rustling communication within the pigsty. That is it – the grunt is entirely analysable in terms of mechanics. But, as soon as it wants to have something believed and demands recognition, speech exists. That is why, in a sense, one can speak of the language of animals. Animals have a language [langage] to the degree that there is someone there to understand it.

Let us take another example which I will borrow from Nunberg's article, 'Transference and reality', from 1951, which raises the question as to what the transference is. It is the same problem.

It is extremely gratifying to see both how far the author goes and the extent to which he is nonplussed. According to him, everything happens at the level of the imaginary. The foundation of the transference is, he thinks, the projection into reality of something which is not there. The subject requires that his partner be a form, a model, of his father for example.

To start with, he refers to the case of a patient who spent her time vehemently scolding the analyst, bawling him out even, reproaching him for never being good enough, for never making the correct interventions, for making mistakes, for being in bad taste. Is this an instance of transference, Nunberg asks himself?

Interestingly enough, but not without some justification, he replies – no, here it is rather more like an aptitude – readiness[4] – for transference. For the moment, in her recriminations, the subject makes her requirement heard, her primitive requirement for a real person, and what motivates her dissatisfaction is the discordance which the real world manifests in comparison with this prerequisite. That is not the transference, but its condition.

When does transference really start? When the image which the subject requires becomes confused for the subject with the reality in which he is placed. The whole progress of the analysis is to show him the distinction between these two planes, to unstick the imaginary and the real. Classical theory – the subject displays so-called delusive behaviour, which one brings him to see is rather ill adapted to the actual situation.

Except, we spend our time realising that the transference is in no way a delusive phenomenon. You are not analysing the subject if you say to him – But my dear chap, the feeling you have for me is only transference. That has never settled anything. Luckily, when the authors are clear-headed in their practice, they give examples which give the lie to their theory and which prove that they have some feeling for the truth. That is true of Nunberg. The example that he gives as being typical of the experience of transference is particularly instructive.

He had a patient who brought him masses of material, and expressed himself with an authenticity, a care for detail, a regard for being complete, with a surrender . . . And yet nothing budged. Nothing budged until Nunberg realised that the analytic situation happened to reproduce, for the patient, a situation from his childhood, in which he indulged in making as complete confessions as possible, based upon the total confidence that he had in his interlocutor, who was none other than his mother, who came every evening to sit at the foot of his bed. The patient, like Scheherezade, took pleasure in giving her an exhaustive account not only of day-to-day events, but also of his acts, of his desires, of his inclinations, of his scruples, of his self-reproaches, never hiding anything. The warm presence of his mother, clad in her night-gown, was for him the source of a continuous pleasure in and of itself, consisting in making out the outline of her breasts and body under her gown. So he conducted his first sexual investigations on his beloved partner.

How do you analyse this? Let us try to be a little bit coherent. What does this mean?

Two very different situations are evoked here – the patient with his mother, the patient with the analyst.

In the first situation, the subject experiences a satisfaction by means of this spoken exchange. We have no difficulty in distinguishing two planes there, the plane of the symbolic relations, which here are quite indubitably subordinated to, subverted by the imaginary relationship. On the other hand, in analysis, the subject gives himself over to complete surrender, and submits with total good will to the rule. Are we forced to conclude from that that he experiences a satisfaction similar to the primary satisfaction? For many, this step is easily taken – but of course, that's it, the subject is seeking out a similar satisfaction. With no hesitation there'll be talk of the compulsion to repeat. And everything else you may want to add. The analyst will pride himself on having detected behind this speech goodness knows what feeling or emotion, which would reveal the presence of a psychological beyond constituted past speech.

But wait a moment, let's think about this! To start off with, the analyst's position is exactly the inverse of the mother's position, he is not at the foot of the bed, but behind, and he is a long way from offering, at least in most instances, the charms of the primary object, and a long way from being party to the same concupiscences. In any case, that is not the way you will be able to draw the analogy.

What I'm saying is downright simple-minded. But it is only by making the structure a bit more explicit, and in saying simple things, that we will be able to learn how to spell out in words of one syllable the elements of the situation in which we act.

What has to be understood is the following – why does a complete transformation of the analytic situation ensue as soon as the relation between the situations has been revealed to the subject? Why do the same words then become effective, and constitute genuine development in the subject's existence? Let us think this over a bit.

Speech as such is instituted within the structure of the semantic world which is that of language. Speech never has one single meaning, nor the word one single use. All speech always possesses a beyond, sustains various functions, encompasses several meanings. Behind what a discourse says, there is what it means [veut dire], and behind what it means, there is again another intended meaning [vouloir-dire], and nothing will ever be exhausted by that – except that it comes down to this, that speech has a creative function, and that it brings into being the very thing, which is none other than the concept.

Remember what Hegel says about the concept – The concept is the time of the thing. To be sure, the concept is not the thing as it is, for the simple reason that the concept is always where the thing isn't, it is there so as to replace the thing, like the elephant that I brought into the room the other day by means of the word elephant. If that was so striking for some of you, it was because it was clear that the elephant was really there as soon as we named it. Of the thing, what is it that can be there? Neither its form, nor its reality, since, in the actual state of affairs, all the seats are taken. Hegel puts it with extreme rigour – the concept is what makes the thing be there, while, all the while, it isn't.

This identity in difference, which characterises the relation of the concept to the thing, that is what also makes the thing a thing and the fact[5] symbolised, as we were told just now. We are talking about things, and not about some eternally unidentifiable I know not what.

Heraclitus tells us – if we introduce absolute mobility in the existence of things such that the flow of the world never comes to pass twice by the same situation, it is precisely because identity in difference is already saturated in the thing. It is from this that Hegel deduces that the concept is the time of the thing.

At this point we find ourselves at the heart of the problem that Freud sets up when he says that the unconscious is located outside time. It is true, and it isn't. It is located outside time exactly like the concept, because it is in itself time, the pure time of the thing, and as such it can reproduce the thing within a certain modulation, whose material support can be anything. The compulsion to repeat involves nothing but this. This remark will take us a very long way, indeed well into those problems of time which analytic practice generates.

So let us go back to our example – why does the analysis become transformed the moment the transferential situation is analysed through evoking the old situation, when the subject found himself with an entirely different object, one that cannot be assimilated to the present object? Because present speech, like the old speech, is placed within a parenthesis of time, within a form of time, if I can put it that way. The modulation of time being identical, the speech of the analyst happens to have the same value as the old speech.

This value is the value of speech. There is no feeling, no imaginary projection in it, and Nunberg, who goes out of his way to construct one, thus finds himself in a situation from which he cannot extricate himself.

For Loewenstein, there is no projection, but rather displacement. That is a mythology which has all the hallmarks of a labyrinth. You will only escape from it by recognising that the time-element is a dimension constitutive of the order of speech.

If in actual fact the concept is time, we must analyse speech in stages, to seek in it the multiple meanings between the lines. Is there no end to it? No, it is not without end. Except, what is revealed at the end, the last word, the last meaning, is this temporal form which I am telling you about, and which all by itself is speech. The final meaning of the speech of the subject before the analyst is his existential relation before the object of his desire.

On this occasion this narcissistic mirage does not take on any particular form, it is nothing other than whatever supports the relation of man to the object of his desire, and always leaves him isolated in what we call fore-pleasure. This relation is a specular one, and here it places speech in a kind of suspension in relation to what indeed amounts to a purely imaginary situation.

There is nothing present, nothing emotional, nothing real in this situation. But, once it has been reached, it changes the meaning of speech, it reveals to the subject that his speech is only what I called in my Rome report empty speech, and that it is as such that it is lacking in any effect.

None of this is easy. Are you with me? You must understand that the beyond to which we are referred is always another speech, one that is deeper. As to the ineffable limit of speech, it stems from the fact that speech creates the resonance of all these meanings. In the end, we are referred back to the very act of speech as such. It is the value of this act, here and now, which makes this speech empty or full. What is involved in the analysis of transference is knowing at which point in its presence speech is full.

If you find this interpretation a trifle speculative, I am now going to give you a reference, since I am here to comment on Freud's texts, and it isn't an inopportune moment for saying that what I am explaining to you is strictly orthodox.

At what point in Freud's work does the word Übertragung, transference, appear? It is not in the Papers on Technique, nor in connection with real, or indeed imaginary, or even symbolic, relations, it doesn't matter which, with the subject. It is not apropos of Dora nor of all the miserable things she did to him, since, supposedly, he did not know how to tell her in good time that she was beginning to feel tenderly towards him. It is in the seventh section, 'The psychology of the dream-processes', of the Traumdeutung.

That is a book which I will perhaps give you a commentary on someday soon, one whose sole aim is the demonstration, in the function of the dream, of the superposed significations of a material signifier. Freud shows us how speech, that is the transmission of desire, can get itself recognised through anything, provided that this anything be organised in a symbolic system. There we have the source of what was for so long the indecipherable character of the dream. And it is for the same reason that for a long time no one knew how to understand hieroglyphics – they were not set up in their own symbolic system, all anyone could see was a little human silhouette, which might mean a man, but might also represent the sound man, and, as such, might be a part of a word by virtue of its being a syllable. The dream is constructed like hieroglyphics. Freud refers, as you know, to the Rosetta Stone.

What does Freud call Übertragung? It is, he says, the phenomenon constituted by the fact that it is not possible to give a direct translation, for a given desire repressed by the subject. This desire of the subject is forbidden to his mode of discourse, and cannot get itself recognised. Why? Because amongst the elements of the repression there is something which partakes of the ineffable. There are essential relations which no discourse can express adequately, except in what I called just now the interlineation.

Next time I will tell you about The Guide of the Perplexed by Maimonides, which is an esoteric work. You'll see the extent to which he deliberately organises his discourse in such a way that what he wants to say, which is not sayable – it is him who says this – can nonetheless be revealed. He says what cannot or must not be said by means of a certain disorder, certain ruptures, certain intentional discordances. Well, the slips, the holes, the disputes, the repetitions of the subject also express, but here spontaneously, innocently, the manner in which his discourse is organised. And that is what we have to read. We will come back to this, because the texts are worth the trouble of being brought together.

What does Freud say in his initial definition of Übertragung? He tells us about the Tagesreste, the day-residues, which are, he says, disinvested from the point of view of desire. These are, within the dream, the stray forms which have become, for the subject, of minimal importance – and are emptied of their meaning. So this is a piece of signifying material. The signifying material, be it phonematic, hieroglyphic, etc., is constituted out of forms which have forfeited their own meaning and are taken up again within a new organisation, thanks to which another meaning finds a means of gaining expression. What Freud calls Übertragung is exactly that.

The desire which is unconscious, that is to say impossible to express, nonetheless finds a means of expression through the alphabet, the phonematics of day-residues, themselves disinvested of desire. So it is a phenomenon of language as such. That is what Freud calls Übertragung, the first time he uses the word.

To be sure, in analysis, in comparison with what happens in dreams, there is this essential supplementary dimension, namely that the other is there. But note also that dreams become more clear, more analysable, as the analysis makes progress. That's because the dream addresses the analyst more and more. The best dreams that Freud puts before us, the richest, the most beautiful, the most complicated are the ones which take place in the course of an analysis, and which tend to address the analyst.

This should in addition clear up for you the true signification of the term acting-out.[6] If, just now, I mentioned the compulsion to repeat, if I mentioned it primarily in relation to language, it is really because every action in the session, acting-out[6] or acting-in,[6] is included in a context of speech. One qualifies as acting-out[6] whatever takes place in the treatment. And not without reason. If so many subjects rush headlong while in analysis into engaging in a host of erotic activities, like getting married for example, it is clearly acting-out.[6] If they act, it is with their analyst in mind.

That is really why one must analyse the acting-out[6] and analyse the transference, that is to say find the meaning of speech in an act. In so far as the point for the subject is to gain recognition, an act is speech.

On this note I will leave you today.

De locutionis significatione

Following the very interesting contribution our good friend Granoff made, which fitted the shape the previous seminar had taken on like a glove, it was very easy for me to continue with what I was saying, and I was thus led into clarifying something which, up to that point, had been left hanging within the series of questions I raise with you.

This clarification is the following – the function of the transference can only be understood on the symbolic plane. It is around this central point that all the forms in which it becomes apparent to us are organised, and this is true even for the domain of the imaginary.

I couldn't think of a better way to get you to grasp this than to focus on the first definition Freud gave of the transference.

What is fundamentally at issue in transference, is how a discourse that is masked, the discourse of the unconscious, takes a hold of a discourse that is apparent. This discourse takes possession of these emptied-out, available elements, the Tagesreste, and of everything else in the preconscious order, which is made available by the smallest investment of this, the subject's fundamental need, which is to gain recognition. It is within this vacuum, within this hollow, with what thus becomes working materials, that the deep, secret discourse gains expression. We see it in the dream, but we also rediscover it in the slip of the tongue and throughout the psychopathology of everyday life.

That is our starting-point for listening to the person who speaks to us. And we only have to refer back to our definition of the discourse of the unconscious, which is that it is the discourse of the other, to understand how it authentically links up again with intersubjectivity in the dialogue, that full realisation of speech.

The fundamental phenomenon revealed by analysis is this relation of one discourse to another, using it as a support. What we discover manifested in it is this fundamental principle of semantics, that every semanteme refers to the whole of the semantic system, to the polyvalence of its usages. Moreover, for everything which properly speaking pertains to language, in as much as it is human, that is to say utilisable in speech, the symbol is never univocal. Every semanteme always has several meanings.

From whence we come upon that truth, which is so absolutely obvious in our experience, and which linguists are well aware of, that every signification only ever refers back [renvoyer] to another signification. So linguists have resigned themselves to this, and it is from within this field that from now on they are developing their science.

One should not believe that this is taking place with no ambiguity, and that, for a Ferdinand de Saussure who saw it clearly, perfectly satisfactory definitions had always been available.

The signifier is the audible matter, which, however, does not mean the sound. Not everything belonging to the order of phonetics is on that account included in linguistics as such. It is the phoneme that is the important element, that is to say one sound as opposed to another sound, within a set of oppositions.

When one talks about the signified, one thinks of the thing, whereas in fact signification is what is involved. Nonetheless, each time we talk, we say the thing, the signifiable, by means of the signified. There is a lure here, because it is quite clear that language is not made to designate things. But this lure is structural to human language and, in a sense, the verification of every truth is founded on it.

During a discussion I recently had with the most eminent person in the field in France, someone who can legitimately be qualified as a linguist, M. Benveniste, it was pointed out to me that one thing has never been made clear. It may surprise you, since you are not linguists.

Let us begin with the notion that the signification of a term must be defined by the totality of its possible usages. This can also be extended to groups of terms, and in truth one can't have a theory of language [langue] if one doesn't take the usages of groups into account, that is to say, expressions, and syntactical forms as well. But there is a limit, which is – that the sentence, for its part, does not have a usage. So there are two zones of signification.

This remark is of the greatest importance, because these two zones of signification are perhaps something to which we are referring, since it is a way of defining the difference between speech and language.

This discovery was made recently, by a man as eminent as M. Benveniste. It is unpublished, and he imparted it to me as something he is working on at the moment. It is clearly cut out to give us much food for thought.

In fact, Father Beirnaert thought of telling me – Wouldn't everything that you have been saying on the subject of signification be illustrated in the Disputatio de locutionis significatione, which constitutes the first part of the De magistro? I replied – That is a splendid idea, what you have just said. Even what I taught you last time bore traces of what I remember of this text. One must not overlook the fact that the words I despatch to you elicit such responses, indeed such commemorations, as Saint Augustine expresses himself, which, in Latin, is the exact equivalent of recollection [remémoration].

Father Beirnaert's recollection is just as much to the point as the articles Granoff introduced. And it is quite telling that the linguists, in as much as we are entitled to make up one large family through the ages bearing this name, linguists, have taken fifteen centuries to rediscover, like a sun which has risen anew, like a dawn that is breaking, ideas which are already set out in Saint Augustine's text, which is one of the most glorious one could read. And I treated myself to reading it again for this occasion.

Everything I have been telling you about the signifier and the signified is there, expounded with a sensational lucidity, so sensational that I am afraid that the spiritual commentators who have given themselves over to its exegesis have not always perceived all of its subtlety. They think that the profound Doctor of the Church has strayed off his path into rather futile things. These futile things are nothing other than the latest developments in modern thought on language.

FATHER BEIRNAERT: I only had six or seven hours to venture into this text a little, and I can only give you a short introduction.[1]

How do you translate De locutionis significatione?

BEIRNAERT: On the signification of speech.

Undeniably. Locutio is speech.

BEIRNAERT: Oratio is discourse.

We could say – On the signifying function of speech, since a bit further on we come upon a text in which significatio itself has exactly this sense. Here speech is used in the broad sense, it is language [langage] at work in elocution, even eloquence. It is neither full nor empty speech, it is speech in its entirety. Full speech, how would you translate that into Latin?

BEIRNAERT: There is an expression – sententia plena. A full statement is one in which there is not only a verb, but also a subject, a noun.

[1] St Augustine, De Magistro, translated as The Teacher, in The Fathers of the Church Vol. 59. Saint Augustine. The Teacher. The Free Choice of the Will. Grace and Free Will, translated by Robert P. Russell, Washington: The Catholic University of America Press, 1968, pp. 7–61, from which the passages quoted are taken, with certain modifications to accord English and French versions with the Latin text, to be found in: Corpus Christianorum XXIX Aurelii Augustini Opera, Pars II, 2, Turnholti, Typographi Brepols Editores Pontificii, 1970, pp. 155–203.

That simply means the complete sentence, that is not speech. There Saint Augustine is trying to prove that all words are nouns. He uses several arguments. He explains that every word in a sentence can be employed as a noun. If is a subordinating conjunction. But in the sentence 'I don't like the if', the word is used as a noun. Saint Augustine proceeds in as rigorous and analytical a spirit as any modern linguist, and he shows that it is its usage in the sentence which defines what part of speech a word is. Well. Have you thought how to translate full speech into Latin?

BEIRNAERT: No. Perhaps we will come across it in going over the text. If you will allow me, I am going to supply the context for the dialogue De Magistro. It was written by Augustine in 389, some years after his return to Africa. Its title is On the master, and it uses two interlocutors – Augustine and his son Adeodatus, who was then sixteen years old. This Adeodatus was very intelligent, so Saint Augustine says, and he assures us that Adeodatus's words were actually spoken by this boy of sixteen, who thus proves himself to be a disputant of the first rank.

The child of sin.

BEIRNAERT: – The thematic axis, which determines the direction the entire dialogue takes, is that language transmits the truth from without through words which sound without, but the disciple always sees the truth within.

Before coming to this conclusion, towards which the discussion is rushing headlong, the dialogue snakes for a long time and proposes a doctrine of language and of speech from which we have much to learn.

There are two large parts – the first is the Disputatio de locutionis significatione, the discussion of the signification of speech, the second part is entitled Veritatis magister solus est Christus, Christ is the sole master of truth.

The first part is itself divided into two sections. The first is synthetically entitled De signis. It is poorly translated as – Of the value of words. It is really about something quite different, since one cannot identify signum and verbum. The second section has as its title Signa ad discendum nihil valent, signs are of no use in learning. Let us start off with Of signs.

Augustine asks his son – What do we want to do, when we speak? Reply – We want to teach or learn, in accordance with the position of master or disciple. Saint Augustine is going to try to show that, even when one wants to learn and when one asks questions so as to learn, one is still teaching. Why? Because one teaches the person one addresses what it is one wants to know. Hence, the general definition – So you see, that through language we do nothing other than teach.

Will you allow me to make a remark? You do realise, don't you, the extent to which we are, right from the start, at the heart of what I have been trying to explain to you here. The question is – what is the difference between communication by signals and the exchange of interhuman speech?

Straightaway Augustine makes for the element of intersubjectivity, since he highlights docere and discere, which are impossible to distinguish. The entire interrogation is essentially an attempt to make the two speeches agree, which implies that from the first there was agreement between languages [langages]. No exchange is possible, except by way of the reciprocal identification of two complete universes of language [langage]. That is why speech is already, as such, a teaching. It is not a play of signs, it is to be located, not on the level of information, but on that of truth.

BEIRNAERT: Adeodatus – I do not think that we wish to teach anything when no one is there to learn.

Each of these replies is worthy of special attention.

BEIRNAERT: Having emphasised teaching, he goes on to an excellent method of teaching, per commemoration, that is to say, through recalling [ressouvenir]. So there are two reasons for speaking. We speak either in order to teach, or in order to induce recollection, either in other people, or in ourselves. Following what is the beginning to the dialogue, Augustine raises the question whether speech exists solely in order to teach or to recall. Here, let us not forget the religious atmosphere which informs the dialogue. The interlocutor replies that there is prayer, after all, in which one enters into a dialogue with God. Can we believe that God is taught or reminded of something by us? Our prayer does not require words, Augustine very precisely states, except when others should know that we are praying. When it comes to God, one does not try to remember or to teach the subject with whom one is in dialogue, but rather alert others to the fact that one is praying. Hence, one only expresses oneself in relation to those people who can see us engaged in this dialogue.

Prayer here touches on the ineffable. It does not belong in the field of speech.

BEIRNAERT: That said, teaching is accomplished by means of words. Words are signs. At this point we find a considerable discussion on verbum and signum. To develop his thought, and render explicit the manner in which he conceives of the relation of the sign to the signifiable, Augustine proposes a verse from the Aeneid to his interlocutor.

He hasn't defined signifiable yet.

BEIRNAERT: No, not yet – the point is to signify, but what? We don't know as yet. So he takes a verse from the Aeneid – Book II, line 659 – Si nihil ex tanta superis placet urbe relinqui. If it pleases the gods that nothing remain of so great a city. And, through an entire maieutic, he will try to discover this aliquid which is signified. He starts by asking his interlocutor.

Aug. – How many words are there in this verse?

Ad. – Eight.

Aug. – So there are eight signs?

Ad. – That is indeed the case.

Aug. – Do you think you understand this verse?

Ad. – I understand it well enough.

Aug. – Tell me now what each word signifies.

Adeodatus is a bit put out by the si. He has to find an equivalent for it. He doesn't find one.

Aug. – Whatever is signified by this word, do you know at least where it occurs?

Ad. – It seems to me that si signifies doubt. Now, where is doubt to be found, if not in the soul?[2]

It is interesting, because we immediately see that the word refers to something of a spiritual order, to a state of the subject as such.

Are you sure?

BEIRNAERT: I think so.

Be that as it may, he is talking there about a localisation.

BEIRNAERT: Which should not be spatialised. I say in the soul in opposition to the material. Then he moves on to the next word. It is nihil, that is nothing. Adeodatus says – Clearly, this is what does not exist. Saint Augustine makes the objection that what does not exist cannot possibly be something. So the second word is not a sign, because it does not signify something. And it is by mistake that they had agreed that every word is a sign, or that every sign is a sign of something. Adeodatus is perplexed, because if we have nothing to signify, it is madness to speak. So, there must be something to that.

Aug. – Instead of saying that nihil signifies something which is nothing, shall we say that this word signifies a certain state in the soul when, failing to perceive a thing the soul nevertheless finds, or thinks it finds, that such a thing does not exist?

Hence, what is signified here is the state in the soul consequent upon an absence of something which could be there.

The value of this first part lies quite precisely in having shown that it is impossible to deal with language by referring the sign to the thing term by term. It is informative for us, as long as we don't forget that negativity had not been developed in Saint Augustine's time. And you see that, not withstanding, by dint of signs, or of things – we are here to try to find out which it is – he falters on the nihil in this beautiful line. It is not an entirely accidental choice. Certainly Freud knew Virgil very well, and this line, which evokes the Troy that has disappeared, has a strange resonance with the fact that, when Freud, in Civilisation and its Discontents, wants to define the unconscious, he talks of the monuments of the Rome that had once been. Both instances deal with things that disappear in history, but which, at the same time, still remain present, absent.

BEIRNAERT: Augustine then moves on to the third term, which is ex. Here, his disciple gives him another word to explain what it signifies. It is the word de, a term of separation from a thing in which the object is found, from which it is derived. After which Augustine remarks that he has explained words with words – ex by de, one very well known word by other very well known ones. Then he urges him to move beyond the plane he presently occupies.

> Aug. – I would like you to show me, if you can, those very things of which these words are the signs.

He uses rampart[3] as his example.

> Aug. – Can you point it out to me in such a way that I will see the very thing whose sign this three-syllable word is. You would be showing it to me without the use of words.

Then there's an account of gesture language. Augustine asks his disciple if he has paid attention to the deaf, who communicate with each other by gesture. And he shows that, in this language, it is not only visible things which are shown, but also sounds, tastes, etc.

O. MANNONI: This reminds me of the little game we played at Guitrancourt, on Sunday. And in the theatre, also, actors make themselves understood and put on plays without speech, with dancing.

Your allusion is, in fact, very instructive. You're referring to a little game in which one of two teams has to get the other to guess, as quickly as possible, a word supplied in secret by the organiser of the game. Exactly what Saint Augustine is reminding us of in this passage becomes clear in this game. Because what is being talked about here is not so much the dialectic of gesture as the dialectic of pointing. That he uses as his example rampart should not surprise us, since he is going to come up more against the rampart of language than against the real rampart. He thus goes on to remark that it is not only things which can be designated, but also qualities. If every pointing is a sign, it is an ambiguous sign. Because if the rampart is pointed out to you, how are you to know that it really is the rampart, and not, for example, its rough quality, or its green, grey, etc? In the same way, in the little game we played the other day, someone having to express ivy went and got some ivy. He was told – You are cheating. That was wrong. The person brought three ivy leaves. That could designate the colour green, or the Holy Trinity, and lots of other things.

O. MANNONI: I was going to say something. I want to say the word chair. If that very word fails me and I hold up a chair to complete my sentence, it is not really the thing that I am using, but the word. So it is not possible to speak with a thing, one always speaks with words.

Your example illustrates perfectly how interpretation works in analysis – we always interpret the actual reactions of the subject in as much as they are taken up in the discourse, just like your chair which is a word. When Freud interprets movements, gestures, and supposedly, emotions, that is always what is going on.

BEIRNAERT: Nothing can be shown without a sign. Yet, Adeodatus will try to show that there are things which can be. Augustine asks him the following question.

> Aug. – If I ask you: what is walking? and you, in getting up, accomplish this act: won't you be using the thing itself, in order to teach me, rather than words or any other sign?
>
> Ad. – That is the case, I must confess, and I am ashamed at not having seen something so obvious.
>
> Aug. – If I were to ask you while you are walking: what is walking? How would you teach it to me?
> Ad. – I would carry out the same action a bit faster so as to draw your attention after you had asked me by something new, all the time doing nothing more than doing what was to be demonstrated.

But that is hurrying, which is not the same thing as walking. One would be led to think that ambulare is festinare. Just now, with the nihil, we touched on negativity, now, with this example, we come to see that a word like festinare can be applied to all sorts of other acts. More precisely, we see that in showing any act whatever in its particular temporality, the subject has no reason, if he does not have words at his disposal, to conceptualise the act itself, because he may think that it is only a question of this particular act at this particular point in time. Again, we come upon time is the concept. It is only if the time of the act is taken in itself, separated from the specific act, that the act can be conceptualised as such, that is to say, preserved in a name. Moreover, we are now coming to the dialectic of the name.

So Adeodatus recognises that we cannot point out a thing without a sign when we are performing the act at the time asked. But, if we are questioned about an act that we can perform, but which we are not performing when being asked, this time we are capable of replying with the thing itself, by setting about and performing this act. In consequence we can show without signs, on condition that we are not in the process of performing the action when questioned about it.

Adeodatus makes an exception of one sole action, that of speaking. The other asks me – What is speaking? Whatever I say to teach him, the child says, I will have to speak. With this starting-point, I would pursue my explanation to the point where I had made it clear what he wanted, without wandering off from the thing which he wanted to have shown him, and without looking for signs outside of this thing itself. In fact, it is the only action which can demonstrate itself, since it is the action which in its essence is demonstrated by signs. Signification alone is recovered in our call, because signification always refers to signification.

BEIRNAERT: Augustine now goes back to all the points which have been touched on in order to go into them more deeply. Let us take up the first point, which is that signs are shown by signs.

Aug. – Are words the only signs?

Ad. – No.

Aug. – So it appears that in speaking, we signify by means of words, either the words themselves, or other signs.

So Augustine then shows that, using speech, one is able to signify and designate signs other than those of speech, for example gestures, letters, etc.

Examples of two signs which are not verba – gestus and littera. Here, Saint Augustine shows himself to be more sane than our contemporaries, some of whom have come to regard gesture as not pertaining to the symbolic order, but as being located, for instance, at the level of an animal response. The gesture would thus become an objection to our thesis that analysis takes place entirely within speech. And what about the subject's gestures? they say. Now, a human gesture does belong with language and not with motor manifestations. That's obvious.

BEIRNAERT: I will continue reading.

Aug. – These signs which are words, to which sense do they pertain?

Ad. – To hearing.

Aug. – And gesture.

Ad. – To sight.

Aug. – And when we come upon written words? Are these not words, or do they have to be thought of more accurately as signs of words? So that, the word would be what is uttered as a sound of the voice articulated with a signification, which cannot be perceived by any other sense than that of hearing.

So this written word refers to the word which is addressed to the ear, in such a way that the latter then pertains to the mind. Having said this, Augustine then goes on to pronounce a specific verbum, nomen, the name.

Aug. – We do signify something with this verbum nomen, since we can signify Romulus, Roma, fluvius, virtus, innumerable things – it is only an intermediary. But there really is a difference between this name and the object that it signifies. What is this difference?

Ad. – Names are signs, and objects are not.

So, ever on the horizon, always at the limit, are objects which are not signs. It is at this point that the term significabilia comes up for the first time. We will call those objects signifiable which are susceptible of designation by a sign without themselves being a sign.

Now we can go a bit faster. The final questions are all concerned with signs which designate themselves. What is required is deeper understanding of the meaning of the verbal sign, associated with the nomen and the verbum – we have translated verbum by word [mot], whereas Father Tonnard[4] at one point translates it by speech [parole].

In this connection, I would like to remark that it is possible that an isolated phoneme in language does not designate anything. One can only find this out through usage and use, that is to say through its integration into the system of signification. Verbum is used as such, and the argument whether every word may be considered to be a nomen turns on this. The question is raised. Even in languages where the substantival use of the verb is extremely rare, as in French, where in everyday language we do not say le laisser [the leaving], le faire [the doing], le se trouver [the finding itself], the distinction between the noun and the verb is more undecided than you may think. What is Augustine's point in wanting to identify nomen and verbum? And what value do you give to nomen in the language of our seminar?

It is precisely what we here call the symbol. The nomen is the totality signifier-signified, especially in as much as it makes for recognition, since the pact and the agreement rest upon it. It is the symbol in the sense of pact. The nomen is employed on the plane of recognition. This translation conforms to the linguistic essence of Latin, in which there are a fair number of legal usages for the word nomen, which can, for example, be used in the sense of 'credit note'.

Hence we may recall Hugo's play on words – it is not necessary to believe that he was a madman – nomen, numen. The word nomen has indeed an original form connecting it to numen, the sacred. To be sure, the linguistic evolution of the word was snatched up by nocere, giving rise to such forms as agnomen, which is hard not to think comes from a captation of nomen by cognoscere. But the legal usages are sufficient to show us that we are not wrong in recognising in it a function of recognition, of pact, of interhuman symbol.

BEIRNAERT: Indeed, Saint Augustine makes it explicit in the passage in which he talks about expressions like this is called, this is named. That is accomplished by referring to the idea of intersubjectivity.

Somewhere else, he sets out a fantastic etymology of verbum and nomen – verbum is the word in so far as it strikes the ear, which corresponds to our idea of verbal materiality, and nomen is the word in so far as something is made known by it. Except, what is not to be found in Saint Augustine – because he hadn't read Hegel – is the distinction between knowledge [connaissance], agnoscere, and recognition [reconnaissance]. The dialectic of recognition is essentially a human one, and since he, Saint Augustine that is, is engaged in a dialectic which is not atheistical . . .

[4] Père François-Joseph Tonnard, translator of De Magistro.

BEIRNAERT: Nonetheless, when he is dealing with whatever is called, is recalled, and is named, it is recognition which is involved.

No doubt, but he does not isolate it, because for him, when all is said and done, there is only one recognition, that of Christ. Nonetheless, it is certain that the theme does at least appear. Even the questions which he resolves in a manner different from our own are at least indicated – that is the way of all coherent language [langage].

BEIRNAERT: That, you know, is what is crucial.

Go on to the second chapter, the one which bears on what you have called the power of language.

BEIRNAERT: Its title is – Whether signs are useless for learning. This time, the issue no longer is the relation of signs to signs, we come instead to the relation of signs to signifiable things.

From the sign to teaching.

BEIRNAERT: That's a poor translation, it is rather more like to the signifiable.

So that is how you translate dicendum. Alright, but Saint Augustine tells us on the other hand that dicere, which is the essential meaning of speech, is docere.

BEIRNAERT: I will skip two or three pages. Augustine then states that the sign, once heard, directs one's attention to the thing signified. To which he makes an objection that is interesting from the analytic point of view, because one comes across it from time to time. What would you say, he asks Adeodatus, if an interlocutor, in a sort of game, came to the conclusion that if someone talks about a lion, a lion comes out of the mouth of the person who is talking? Adeodatus replies, it is the sign which comes out of the mouth and not the signification, not the concept, but its vehicle. Now, Saint Augustine wants to lead us to the following point, that, in actual fact, knowledge comes from things. Firstly he asks what one should prefer, the thing signified or the sign. In line with a principle that was almost universal at the time, one must esteem the signified things more than the signs, since the signs are imposed on to the things signified, and whatever is imposed on another thing is less noble than whatever it is imposed on. Unless, Saint Augustine says to Adeodatus, you adjudge it otherwise. The other finds an objection.

> Ad. – If we say filth, this name, in my opinion, is much nobler than the thing signified. Because we like hearing it much better than smelling it.

This allows him to introduce, between the thing in its materiality and the sign, the knowledge of the thing, namely science. What was the aim, Augustine asks, of those who gave a name to such a shameful and contemptible thing? Their aim was to alert others as to how one should behave towards this thing. One should esteem the knowledge of the thing which the word itself is more highly than the thing.

Aug. – The knowledge of filth, in fact, should be held to be superior to the name itself, which in turn is to be preferred to filth itself. Because there is no other reason to prefer knowledge to the sign, except that the latter exists for the sake of the former, and not the former for the latter.

One speaks so as to know, not the other way round. Another problem – is the knowledge of signs to be preferred to the knowledge of things? Augustine only gives the beginnings of a reply. Finally he winds up the discussion by saying:

Aug. – The knowledge of things takes preference over, not the knowledge of signs, but over the signs themselves.

Then he returns to the problem touched on in the first part.

Aug. – Let us examine a little more closely whether there are things which one can show by themselves, without any sign, like speaking, walking, sitting, and other similar things. Are there things which can be shown without signs?

Ad. – None, with the exception of speaking.

Aug. – Are you that certain of what you are saying?

Ad. – No, not at all.

Augustine uses an example of a thing which doesn't require a sign to show itself, which made me think of the analytic situation.

Aug. – Suppose now that someone unfamiliar with the business of snaring birds, which is done with reeds and birdlime, should encounter a bird-catcher fitted out with all his equipment, though he is not snaring birds but simply going on his way. At the sight of him, he quickens his pace and, as is usually the case, reflects and, in amazement, asks himself the meaning of the man's paraphernalia. Suppose, too, that the bird-catcher, aware that the other's attention is fixed upon him, and eager to show off his prowess, releases the reeds and, with his rod and hawk, snares a little bird which he sees nearby which he comes up to and captures. Would he not, I ask you, teach that spectator of his what he was so eager to know, not by any sign, but by the reality itself?

Ad. – I am afraid we are confronted here with a situation similar to that where I referred to the man who asks what walking is. Neither do I think that everything about bird-catching has been made known even in the present case.

Aug. – It is an easy matter to put your mind at ease. I will make the further qualification, that if the spectator were intelligent enough, he could grasp everything there is to know about the art of bird-catching from what he saw. It is sufficient for our purpose that some men can be taught some things, though not all,[5] without the use of signs.

Ad. – I too could further qualify my remarks by saying that if one is really intelligent, he will learn all about walking as soon as someone indicates it to him, by taking a few steps.

Aug. – You may make that qualification as far as I am concerned. I not only have no objection, but am even favourable to it. You see, in fact, that we have both reached the conclusion that some things can be taught without the use of signs, and that we were wrong in thinking a little while ago that nothing at all can be taught without signs. Actually, these examples bring to mind, not one or two, but thousands of things, which are made known by themselves without having to resort to signs. Quite apart from the numerous plays performed in every theatre by actors who play their part by enacting the events themselves.

To which one could reply that, in any case, whatever can be shown without signs is already significant, since the bird-catcher's actions always take on meaning within a universe within which subjects are already located.

What Father Beirnaert has said, with such pertinence, has made it superfluous for me to have to remind you that the bird-catcher's art can only exist in a world already structured by language.[6] There is no need to emphasise it.

What is at the heart of things for Saint Augustine is not the restoration of the hegemony of things over signs, but the casting of doubt on the hegemony of signs in the essentially spoken activity of teaching. This is where the break occurs between signum and verbum, nomen, the instrument of knowing in as much as it is the instrument of speech.

Saint Augustine calls upon the same dimension as we psychologists do. Because psychologists are more spiritual people – in the technical, religious sense of the word – than one might think. They believe, like Saint Augustine, in illumination, in intelligence. That is what they are designating, when they do animal psychology, with the name of instinct, of Erlebnis – I say this in passing.

Because Saint Augustine wants to involve us in truth's very own dimension, he abandons the linguist's domain, to take on this lure which I mentioned earlier. As soon as it is established, speech moves in the dimension of truth. Except, speech does not know that it is what makes truth. And Saint Augustine does not know it either, and that is why he tries to meet up with truth as such, through illumination. From whence a total inversion of perspective.

To be sure, he tells us, in the end signs are totally impotent, because we ourselves cannot recognise their value as signs, and we come to know that they are words only when we know what they signify in the language as concretely spoken. From then on, it is easy to make a dialectical about turn, and to say that, in the manipulation of signs which are defined by each other, we never learn anything. Either we already know the truth in question, and it is not, then, the signs which teach it to us, or we do not know it, and we cannot locate the signs which relate to it.

[6] Cf. Wittgenstein, Philosophical Investigations, no. 32.

He goes further, and locates admirably well the basis of the dialectic of truth which lies at the heart of the analytic discovery. In the presence of speech which we hear, he says, we find ourselves in extremely paradoxical situations – not knowing if they are true or not, whether or not to stand by their truth, to refute them or accept them, or to put them in doubt. But it is in relation to truth that the signification of everything which is expressed is to be located.

So speech, as much taught as teaching, is located in the register of the mistake, of error, of deception, of the lie. He takes it a long way, since he even places it in the domain of ambiguity, and not only of semantic ambiguity, but of subjective ambiguity. He admits that the very subject who is telling us something very often does not know what he is telling us, and tells us more or less than he means to. He even mentions the slip.

BEIRNAERT: But he doesn't explicitly say that the slip can mean something.

He almost does, since he considers it to be significant, but without saying of what. For him it is a slip when the subject signifies something other – aliud – than what he means. Another example, a quite striking example of the ambiguity of discourse, the Epicurean. The Epicurean introduces arguments about the function of the truth which he believes to have refuted. But these possess in themselves the virtue of truth in so far as they confirm in the listener a conviction exactly contrary to that which the Epicurean wished to inspire in him. Furthermore, you know the extent to which a masked discourse, a discourse of persecuted speech – as a writer by the name of Leo Strauss calls it – under a politically oppressive regime, for instance, can get things across by pretending to refute arguments which in fact express its true thought.

In short, Saint Augustine orients his entire dialectic around these three poles, error, mistake, ambiguity of speech. Well, it is as a function of this impotence of signs in teaching – simply to take up Father Beirnaert's terms – that next time we will try to get to grips with the founding dialectic of the truth of speech.

In the tripod which I am leaving with you, you will have no difficulty in recognising the three great symptomatic functions that Freud highlighted in his discovery of meaning – Verneinung, Verdichtung, Verdrängung. Because what speaks in man goes far beyond speech and penetrates even his dreams, his being and his very organism.

SPEECH FROM BEYOND DISCOURSE

THE WORD ESCAPES ME[2]

THE DREAM OF THE BOTANICAL MONOGRAPH

DESIRE

Today, your group, whose fidelity was up to now unfailing, is flagging somewhat. And at the end of the race, it is I who will have had you.

We started with the rules on technique as set out for the first time in Freud's Papers on Technique, formulated as they are both in the most perfect and in the most uncertain fashion. Following a path true to the nature of the subject, we arrived at the central point we have been discussing since the middle of last term – the structure of the transference.

To locate the questions which are tied up with it, one must begin with the central point to which our dialectical investigations have led us, namely that one cannot account for the transference in terms of a dual, imaginary relation, and that the engine of its forward motion is speech.

To bring into play the illusory projection of any one of the subject's fundamental relations with the analytic partner, or again the object relation, the relation between transference and counter-transference, all this, remaining as it does within the limits of a two body psychology,[3] is inadequate. Not only do theoretical arguments show us that, but so in addition does the concrete testimony of authors I have cited. Remember what Balint tells us he notices during what he calls the termination of an analysis – nothing other than a narcissistic relation.

So we have demonstrated the necessity for a third term, which alone allows us to conceptualise the mirror transference, which is speech.

Despite all the effort one can put in to forget speech, or to downgrade it into being just a means, analysis is in itself a technique of speech, and speech is the very milieu in which it moves. It is in relation to the function of speech that the different mainsprings of analysis are to be distinguished from each other, and take on their meaning, their exact position. The whole of the teaching that we will expand upon subsequently will only recast this truth in a thousand different forms.

Last time fortified us with the discussion of a fundamental text from Saint Augustine on the signification of speech.

Saint Augustine's system may be said to be dialectical. It doesn't have a place in the system of sciences as it has been constituted, only over the last few centuries. But neither is it a point of view foreign to our own, which is that of linguistics. On the contrary, we have established that, well before linguistics arose within the modern sciences, someone who meditates on the art of speech, that is to say who talks about it, was led to a problem which lies at the present frontier of this science.

This problem is raised by the question of the relation between speech and signification, what relation the sign bears to what it signifies. In fact, in grasping the function of the sign, one is always referred from one sign to another. Why? Because the system of signs, as they are concretely instituted, hic et nunc, by itself forms a whole. That means that it institutes an order from which there is no exit. To be sure, there has to be one, otherwise it would be an order without any meaning.

This blind alley reveals itself only if one considers the entire order of signs. But that is how one really must consider them, as a set, because language cannot be conceived of as the result of a series of shoots, of buds, coming out of each thing. The name is not like the little asparagus tip emerging from the thing. One can only think of language as a network, a net over the entirety of things, over the totality of the real. It inscribes on the plane of the real this other plane, which we here call the plane of the symbolic.

Certainly, comparing is not reasoning,[4] and I am only illustrating what I am in the course of explaining to you.

The result of the blind alley indicated in the second part of the Augustinian argument is that the question of the adequation of the sign, I won't any longer say to the thing, but to what it signifies, leaves us confronted with an enigma. This enigma is none other than that of the truth, and that is where the Augustinian apologetic awaits us.

Meaning, either you've got it or you haven't. When you understand what is expressed in the signs of the language, it is always, in the end, on account of light coming to you from outside of the signs – either through an inner truth which allows you to recognise what is borne by signs, or by the presentation of an object which is correlated, in a repeated and insistent manner, with a sign. And here we have the perspective turned upside down. The truth is outside of the signs, elsewhere. This see-saw of the Augustinian dialectic directs us towards the recognition of the authentic magister, of the inner master of truth.

[4] 'Comparaison n'est pas raison' – a French proverb.

We are entitled to pause here for a moment to remark that the very question of the truth is already raised by the dialectical movement itself.

In the same way as, at a certain point in his argument, Saint Augustine forgets that the bird-catcher's technique, this complex technique – a trick, a trap for his object, the bird to be caught – is already structured, instrumentalised by speech – so here, he appears to fail to recognise that the very question of the truth is already included at the heart of his discussion, since it is with speech that he raises the question of speech, and creates the dimension of truth. Every act of speech which is formulated as such brings into the world the novelty of the emergence of meaning. It is not that it is affirmed as truth, but rather that it introduces the dimension of truth into the real.

Saint Augustine argues – speech can be deceiving. Now, the sign, just of itself, can only present and sustain itself in the dimension of the truth. Because, in order to deceive, speech affirms itself as true. That is for the one who listens. For the one who speaks deception itself requires from the beginning the support of the truth that must be dissembled, and, as it unfolds, it presupposes a veritable deepening of the truth to which, if one can put it this way, it replies.

In fact, as the lie is organised, pushes out its tentacles, it requires the correlative control of the truth it encounters at every twist and turn of the way, and which it must avoid. The moralist tradition says it – you must have a good memory when you have lied. You have to know one hell of a lot of things to keep a lie going. There is nothing more difficult than to sustain a lie. Because the lie, in this way, brings about, in its unfolding, the constitution of the truth.

But that is not the real problem. The real problem is that of error, and that is where it has always lain.

It is clear that error is only definable in terms of the truth. But the point is not that there would be no error if there were no truth, as there would be no white if there were no black. There is more to it than that – there is no error which does not present and promulgate itself as truth. In short, error is the habitual incarnation of the truth. And if we wanted to be entirely rigorous, we would say that, as long as the truth isn't entirely revealed, that is to say in all probability until the end of time, its nature will be to propagate itself in the form of error.

You don't have to go much further to see in this a structure constitutive of the revelation of being as such.

On this point, for the moment I wish only to open a small door for you, whose threshold we will someday cross. For today let us keep to the phenomenology of speech.

We have seen that deception, as such, can only be sustained as a function of the truth, and not only of the truth, but of a movement of the truth – that error is the usual manifestation of the truth itself – so that the paths of truth are in essence the paths of error. So, you will say to me, how, from within speech, will error ever be discerned? One needs either the test of experience, the confrontation with the object, or the illumination of this inner truth, the aim of the Augustinian dialectic.

This objection is not without some force.

The signifier, which is always material and which in Saint Augustine we have recognised in the verbum, and the signified are the very foundation of the structure of language. Taken one by one, they appear to have a strictly arbitrary relation. There is no more reason to call the giraffe giraffe and the elephant elephant than to call the giraffe elephant and the elephant giraffe. There is no reason not to say that the giraffe has a trunk and the elephant a very long neck. If it is an error in the system as generally accepted, it is not discernible, as Saint Augustine points out, for as long as the definitions are not laid down. And is there anything more difficult than to lay down good definitions?

Nonetheless, if you continue your discourse on the giraffe with a trunk indefinitely, so that everything you say applies perfectly to the elephant, it will be clear that, under the name of the giraffe, you are talking about the elephant. All you have to do is bring your terms into agreement with the generally accepted ones. That is what Saint Augustine demonstrates with respect to the term perducam. That is not what we call error.

Error shows itself to be such whenever, at a given moment, it ends in a contradiction. If I started by saying that roses are plants which generally live under water, and if it seems from what follows that for a whole day I remained in the same place as the roses, since it is also quite clear that I cannot remain for a day under water, a contradiction appears in my discourse, demonstrating my error. In other words, in discourse it is contradiction which sorts truth from error.

From whence the Hegelian conception of absolute knowledge. Absolute knowledge is this moment in which the totality of discourse closes in on itself in a perfect non-contradiction up to and including the fact that it posits, explains and justifies itself. We are some way yet from this ideal!

You know only too well the everlasting disputes there are on every theme and on every subject, with greater or lesser ambiguity depending on the zones of interhuman action, and the manifest discordance between the different symbolic systems which prescribe action, the religious, juridical, scientific, political systems. There is neither superposition, nor conjunction of these references – between them there are gaps, faults, rents. That is why we cannot conceive of human discourse as being unitary. Every emission of speech is always, up to a certain point, under an inner necessity to err. So we are led, it would appear, to a historical Pyrronism which suspends the truth-value of everything which the human voice can emit, suspends it in the expectation of a future totalisation.

Is it unthinkable that it might come about? After all, can't the progress of the system of the physical sciences be conceived of as the progress of a single symbolic system, to which things give sustenance and substance? As this system is perfected, in any event we see things being disturbed, decomposing, dissolving under its pressure. The symbolic system is not like a piece of clothing which sticks on to things, it is not lacking in its effects on them and on human life. You can call this upheaval what you will – conquest, rape of nature, transformation of nature, hominisation of the planet.

This symbolic system of the sciences tends towards the well made language,[5] which one might consider to be its own language, a language deprived of all reference to a voice. That is also where Augustinian dialectic leads us, by depriving us of reference to this domain of the truth within which its own forward movement nevertheless takes place.

And that is where one cannot but be struck by the Freudian discovery.

The Freudian discovery, while being empirical, does not on account of that make any less of a striking contribution, so striking in fact that one gets blinded to its existence, to this question, a question which seems, taken literally, to be a metaphysical one.

What is peculiar to the field of psychoanalysis is indeed the presupposition that the subject's discourse normally unfolds – this is a genuine bit of Freud – within the order of error, of misrecognition, even of negation – it is not quite a lie, it is somewhere between an error and a lie. These are the truths of crude common sense. But – this is the novelty – during analysis, within this discourse which unfolds in the register of error, something happens whereby the truth irrupts, and it is not contradiction.

Do analysts have to push the subjects on the road of absolute knowledge, to gain an education in every respect, not only in psychology, so as to have them discover the absurdities whose company they habitually keep, but also in the system of the sciences? Certainly not – we are doing it here because we are analysts, but what if we had to do it to patients!

Nor can we engineer their meeting with the real, since we receive them within the confines of four walls. It is not our function to guide them by the hand through life, that is to say into the consequences of their stupidities. In life, you can see truth catch error from behind. In analysis, truth emerges in the most clearcut representative of the mistake – the slip, the action which one, improperly, calls manquée [missed, failed, abortive].

Our abortive actions are actions which succeed, those of our words which come to grief are words which own up. These acts, these words reveal a truth from behind. Within what we call free associations, dream images, symptoms, a word bearing the truth is revealed. If Freud's discovery has any meaning, it is that – truth grabs error by the scruff of the neck in the mistake.

Reread the beginning of the chapter on the dream-work – a dream, Freud says, is a sentence, it is a rebus.[6] Had it not been explicitly formulated by Freud, fifty pages of The Interpretation of Dreams would lead us to this equation just as easily.

It would emerge just as well from the formidable discovery of condensation. You would be wrong to think that condensation simply means the term by term correspondence of a symbol with something. On the contrary, in a given dream, the whole of the dream-thoughts, that is to say the whole of those things signified, the meanings of the dream, is taken as a network, and is represented, not at all term by term, but through a set of interlacings. To demonstrate it to you, all I need do is take one of Freud's dreams, and make a drawing on the blackboard. Read the Traumdeutung, and you will see that really is how Freud understands it – the totality of meanings is represented by the totality of whatever is signifying. Each signifying element of the dream, each image, includes a reference to a whole set of things to be signified, and inversely, each thing to be signified is represented in several signifiers.

So the Freudian discovery leads us to hear in discourse this speech which reveals itself through, or even in spite of, the subject.

He tells us this speech not only verbally, but through all his other means of expression. Even through his body, the subject emits a speech, which is, as such, speech of truth, a signifying speech which he does not even know he emits. It is because he always says more than he means to, always more than he thinks he says.

Augustine's main objection to the inclusion of the domain of truth within the domain of signs is, he says, that very often subjects say things which go much further than what they think, and that they are even capable of owning the truth while not adhering to it. The Epicurean who maintains that the soul is mortal quotes his opponents' arguments so as to refute them. But those who have their eyes open can see that that is the true speech, and recognise that the soul is immortal.

The subject, via something whose structure and function as speech we have recognised, testifies to a truer meaning than all he expresses by means of his discourse of error. If that is not how our experience is structured, then it has absolutely no meaning.

The speech that the subject emits goes beyond, without his knowing it, his limits as discoursing subject – all the while remaining, to be sure, within his limits as speaking subject. If you abandon this perspective, what immediately appears is an objection which I am surprised not to hear raised more often – Why doesn't the discourse, which you detect behind the discourse of mistake, fall prey to the same objection as the latter? If it is a discourse like the other, why isn't it, in just the same way, immersed in error?

[6] (1900a) GW II/III 283–4; Stud II 280–1; SE IV 277–8.

Every Jungian-style conception, every conception which makes of the unconscious, under the name of archetype, the real locus of another discourse, really does fall prey, in a categorical way, to this objection. These archetypes, these reified symbols which reside in a permanent manner in a basement of the human soul, how are they truer than what is allegedly at the surface? Is what is in the cellar always truer than what is in the attic?

What does Freud mean when he states that the unconscious knows neither contradiction nor time? Does he mean that the unconscious is a truly unthinkable reality? Certainly not, because there is no such thing as an unthinkable reality.

Reality is defined by contradiction. Reality is what makes it so that when I am here, you, my dear lady, cannot be in the same place. It is not clear why the unconscious should escape this type of contradiction. What Freud means when he talks about the suspension of the principle of non-contradiction in the unconscious is that the genuine speech that we are supposed to uncover, not through observation, but through interpretation, in the symptom, in the dream, in the slip, in the Witz, obeys laws other than those of discourse, which is subject to the condition of having to move within error up to the moment when it encounters contradiction. Authentic speech has other modes, other means, than everyday speech.

That is what we have to explore in a rigorous fashion if we want to make any progress at all in thinking about what we are doing. Of course, we don't have to do so. I will even admit that the majority of human beings quite universally excuse themselves from so doing, and accomplish what they have to in a no less satisfactory fashion. I would go even further – one can push discourse, and even dialectic, extremely far, while avoiding thought entirely. Nonetheless, every step forward in the symbolic world capable of constituting a revelation implies, at least for a brief moment, an effort of thought. Now, an analysis is nothing other than an entire series of revelations particular to each subject. So it is probable that his activity requires the analyst to remain on the alert as to the meaning of what he is doing, and that, from time to time, he devote a moment to thought.

So here we are presented with a question – what is the structure of this speech which is beyond discourse?

The Freudian innovation, in comparison with Saint Augustine, is the revelation, within the phenomenon, of these subjective, experienced moments, in which speech which goes beyond the discoursing subject emerges. An innovation that is so striking that it is only with difficulty that we can believe that it was never previously perceived. No doubt it was necessary for the common run of men to be caught up for some time in a rather perturbed, perhaps even refracted, and in some way inhuman, alienating, discourse for this speech to become manifest with such acuteness, such immediacy, such urgency.

Let us not forget that it made its presence felt in that portion of mankind which suffers, and it was quite clearly in the form of a morbid psychology, of a psychopathology, that the Freudian discovery was made.

I will leave you to think about these matters, because now I want to stress the following – it is only in the dialectical movement of speech beyond discourse that the terms we use all the time without giving them a moment's thought, as if they were givens, gain their meaning.

Verdichtung proves to be nothing other than the polyvalence of meanings in language, their encroachments, their criss-crossings, through which the world of things is not recovered by the world of symbols, but is taken up once more as follows – a thousand things correspond to each symbol, and each thing to a thousand symbols.

Verneinung is what shows the negative side of this non-superposition, because one really does have to get the objects into the holes, and since the holes don't fit them, it is the objects which thereby suffer.

The third register, that of Verdrängung, can also be remarked in the register of discourse. Because, and make a careful note of this, each time that repression takes place – make note of it in practice, it is an indication, go take a look and you will see – repression in the true sense of the word – because repression is not repetition, repression is not negation – there is always interruption of discourse. The subject says that the word escapes him [le mot lui manque].

The word escapes me [Le mot me manque] – at what point in literature does such an expression come up? It is Saint Amand who uttered if for the first time – not even written, but said like that one day in the street, and it became part of the innovations introduced into the language by the Précieux.[7] Somaize mentions it in his Dictionnaire des Précieuses amongst a thousand other forms which are now in current usage but which were not any the less witty plays on words, created in boudoirs by this pleasant society, devoted as it entirely was to the perfecting of language [langage]. As you see, there is a relation between the map of Tenderness [la carte du Tendre][8] and psychoanalytic psychology. Le mot me manque – you never would have said a thing like that in the sixteenth century.

You know the famous example of a word which Freud could not find – the name of the painter of the frescos at Orvieto, Signorelli. Why couldn't he find this word? – if not because the preceding conversation had not been brought to a conclusion, a conclusion, which would have been Herr, the absolute master.

[7] Somaize, Le Dictionnaire des Précieuses, nouvelle édition de Ch.-L. Livet, Paris: Jannet. 1856 (orig. published 1661), vol. I, p. 94: 'Je scay bien ce que je veux dire, mais je ne puis m'expliquer comme je voudrois: Je scay bien ce que je veux dire mais le mot me manque.' death. And, after all, there are perhaps internal limits to what can be said, as Mephistopheles, often cited by Freud, says – 'After all, the best of what you know may not be told to boys.'[9] That's repression.

Already, every time the master comes to a halt along the path of his teaching, for reasons pertaining to the nature of his interlocutor, there's repression. And I, who bring you picturesque things, aimed at putting ideas back into place, I am also engaged in repression, but a little less than the usual, for that is of the order of negation.

Take the first dream which Freud discusses in the chapter on condensation, the dream of the botanical monograph, already summarised in the chapter on the material and sources of dreams. It is a wonderful demonstration of everything I am telling you. No doubt, with his own dreams, Freud never gets us to the heart of the matter, but it is not very difficult to guess at it.

So, during the day Freud saw a monograph on the cyclamens, which are his wife's favourite flowers.[10] You get a clear sense that, when he says that many husbands – including him – give their wives flowers less often than they should, he is not unaware what that means. Freud evokes his conversation with Königstein the eye surgeon, who operated on his father anaesthetised with cocaine. Now, you know the famous story about cocaine – Freud never forgave his wife for having made him come to visit her in a hurry, because if he hadn't, he used to say, he would have taken his discovery a lot further, and would have become a famous man. In the associations to the dream, there is also the patient who answers to the beautiful name Flora, and Gärtner – which means gardener in German – appears at one point with, as if by chance, his wife, whom Freud finds blühende, blooming.

Everything is there, implicit. Freud, not having made up his mind to break with his wife, dissembles the fact that he doesn't bring her flowers often enough, also dissembles this complaint, this permanent bitterness of his, at the moment when he is expecting to be elected to an Extraordinary Professorship. Because the struggle he is engaged in to get himself recognised is there, subjacent to what he alludes to from the dialogues with his colleagues, and this is again emphasised by the fact that, in the dream, Prof. Gärtner interrupts him.[11] In the same way one understands why it is these two day-residues, the conversation with the eye-surgeon, and the sight of the monograph, that this dream feeds on. It is because they were the phonematically experienced moments, if I can put it like that, with which the speech which finds expression in the dream is put into motion.

Do you want me to put it in a formula? To put it crudely, it is – I no longer love my wife. Or again, what he refers to in connection with his whimsies and his expensive tastes – I am not recognised by society, and hampered in my ambitions.

[9] See (1900a) GW II/III 147; Stud II 158; SE IV 142 and 142 n1.
[11] GW II/III 177; Stud II 185; SE IV 171.

I am thinking of a colleague of ours, who said in a lecture on Freud – He was a man without ambitions and without needs. That is blatantly false, all you have to do is read Freud's biography and be aware of the brutality of his responses to those people who came to him with their hearts of gold, the idealists, and questioned him about his own interests in life. Fifteen years after Freud's death, we really should not fall to the level of hagiography. Happily there's something to be found in his work which somewhat bears witness to his personality.

Let us go back to this famous dream. If there's a dream, that means there is repression, doesn't it? So, what was repressed, here? Haven't I put you in a good enough position to recognise in Freud's very own text that a specific desire was suspended during the day, and that one specific word was not said, could not be said, which went right to the heart of the avowal, to the heart of being?

There I'll leave for today the question – in the present state of relations between human beings, can speech spoken outside of the analytic situation ever be full speech? Interruption is the law of conversation. Everyday speech all the time runs up against failure of recognition [méconnaissance], which is the source of Verneinung.

If you read the Traumdeutung, taking what I teach you as your guide, you will see the extent to which the concepts become clearer and what meaning, ambiguous as it sometimes seems, Freud gives to the word desire.

He concedes, which might appear to be a surprising negation, that one has to admit to there being two types of dream, dreams of desire, and punishment-dreams. But if you understand what the issue is, you realise that the repressed desire made manifest in the dream is identified with this register to which I am trying to get you to enter – what is waiting to be revealed is being.

It is this perspective which gives the term desire in Freud its full value. It unifies the domain of the dream, it allows one to understand paradoxical dreams, such as the dream of the poet whose youth was so difficult, who dreams the same dream over and over again, in which he is the insignificant assistant to the tailor.[12] This doesn't so much represent a punishment as a revelation of being. It marks one of the crossings of the threshold of the identification of being, the passage of being into a new stage, a new symbolic incarnation of itself. From whence the value of everything which is of the order of accession, of competition, of the examination, of certification – whose value is not that of testing, of a test, but of an investiture.

On the off chance, I drew this little diamond on the blackboard for you, a dihedron with six faces.

[12] (1900a) GW II/III 476–8; Stud II 455–7; SE V 473–6.

Let us make all its faces similar, one set above, the other below a plane. It is not a regular polyhedron, even though all its faces are identical.

Imagine the median plane, where you'll find the triangle which divides this pyramid into two, to represent the surface of the real, the real just as it is. Nothing here can break out of it, all the seats are taken. But, on the other level, everything has changed. Because words, symbols, introduce a hollow, a hole, thanks to which all manner of crossings are possible. Things become interchangeable.

Depending on the way one envisions it, this hole in the real is called being or nothingness. This being and this nothingness are essentially linked to the phenomenon of speech. It is within the dimension of being that the tripartition of the symbolic, the imaginary and the real is to be found, those elementary categories without which we would be incapable of distinguishing anything within our experience.

It is not for nothing, no doubt, that there are three of them. There must be a minimal law in that, which geometry here only embodies, namely that, if, in the plane of the real, you detach a shutter which moves into a third dimension, the minimum number of shutters you need to construct something solid is two.

Such a schema makes you aware of the following – it is only in the dimension of being, and not in that of the real, that the three fundamental passions can be inscribed – at the junction of the symbolic and imaginary, this fault line, if you will, this ridge line called love – at the junction of the imaginary and the real, hate – and, at the junction of the real and the symbolic, ignorance.

We know that the dimension of transference exists from the start, implicitly, well before analysis begins, before this concubinage, which analysis is, triggers it. Now, these two possibilities of love and hate are never present without the third, which is commonly neglected, and which is not included as one of the primary components of transference – ignorance, as a passion. However, the subject who comes into analysis places himself, as such, in the position of someone who is in ignorance. There is no possible way into analysis without this point of reference – one never says it, one never thinks of it, whereas it is fundamental.

As speech moves forward, the upper pyramid is constructed, corresponding to the working over of the Verdrängung, the Verdichtung and the Verneinung. And being is realised.

At the beginning of the analysis, just as at the beginning of every dialectic, this being, if it does exist implicitly, in a virtual fashion, is not realised. For the naive, for someone who has never entered into any dialectic and believes himself simply to be in the real, being has no presence. The speech included in discourse is revealed thanks to the law of association by which it is put in doubt, in brackets, through suspending the law of non-contradiction. This revelation of speech is the realisation of being.

Analysis is not the reconstitution of the narcissistic image to which it has so often been reduced. If the analysis were only a matter of putting to the test a limited number of minor forms of behaviour, which are more or less well sussed out, more or less cunningly projected, courtesy of the collaboration between the two egos, if we were only concerned with looking out for the emergence of goodness knows what ineffable reality, why should this reality be singled out above all the others? In my schema, the point O moves somewhere to the back and, to the extent that it is symbolised by its speech, is realised in its being.

Let me immediately urge those of you who have found this discourse interesting, indeed who have been stirred up by it, to ask me questions next time – not too long, since we have only one seminar left – on the basis of which I will try to plan the conclusion, if one may speak of conclusion. This will serve as a knot, with which to broach a new chapter next year.

I am more and more inclined to think that next year I will have to divide this seminar into two if I want, on the one hand, to explain Präsident Schreber and the symbolic world of psychosis to you, and on the other hand to show you, starting off with Das Ich und das Es, that ego,[13] super-ego[13] and Es are not new names for old psychological entities. I thus hope to make you see that it is in the movement of the dialectic which I have engaged you in this year that the structuration introduced by Freud takes on its true meaning.

The concept of analysis

THE INTELLECTUAL AND THE AFFECTIVE
LOVE AND HATE IN THE IMAGINARY AND IN THE SYMBOLIC IGNORANTIA DOCTA
SYMBOLIC INVESTITURE
DISCOURSE AS LABOUR
THE OBSESSIONAL AND HIS MASTER

Who has any questions?

MME AUBRY: I understand that at the conjunction of the imaginary and the real one finds hate, on condition that one takes conjunction in the sense of rupture. What I don't understand quite so well is finding love at the conjunction of the symbolic and the imaginary.

I am delighted by your question. Perhaps it will enable me to lend to our last meeting of the year the familiar atmosphere which I prefer to the magisterial.

Leclaire, surely you must also have things to ask. Last time after the session you said to me something remarkably like a question – I would have really liked you to have talked about transference, even so.

They are tough, those even so's – I do nothing but talk to them about it and they're still not satisfied. There are profound reasons why the subject of transference always leaves you craving for more. Nonetheless, we are still going to try today to deal with this subject.

If I wanted to represent the three times of the structuration of speech in search of truth on the model of those allegorical paintings which proliferated in the romantic era, like virtue pursuing crime, aided by remorse, I would tell you – Error taking flight in deception and recaptured by mistake. I hope you can see that that paints a picture of transference for you, such as I try to get you to grasp it in the moments of suspension which the avowal of speech undergoes.

What, in short, are you still craving for? Perhaps for the articulation of what I have been telling you with the usual conception of transference?

DR LECLAIRE: When one looks at what is written on transference, one always gets the impression that the phenomenon of transference falls in the category of manifestations of an affective order, of emotions, in contrast with other manifestations, of an intellectual order, such as procedures aimed at understanding, for instance. Hence one always finds it a bit difficult to give an account of your view of the transference in the current, ordinary terminology. Definitions of transference always say that it is a question of emotion, of feeling, of an affective phenomenon, which is categorically opposed to everything which, in an analysis, can be called intellectual.

Yes . . . You see, there are two ways of applying a discipline which is structured as a teaching. There's what you hear, and then what you make of it. These two planes do not overlap, but they can be made to join up in a certain number of secondary signs. It is from this angle that I see the fertility of every truly didactic action. It is not so much a question of transmitting concepts to you, as of explaining them to you leaving you the task, and the responsibility, of filling them in. But something else is perhaps even more imperative, which is to point out to you those concepts which should never be made use of.

If there is something of that order in what I teach you here, it is the following – I urge you, each of you, at the heart of your own search for the truth, to renounce quite radically – if only provisionally, to see if one doesn't gain by dispensing with it – the use of an opposition like that of the affective and the intellectual.

That by using it one gets into a series of blind alleys is only too obvious for it not to be tempting to follow this instruction for a while. This opposition is one of those most contrary to analytic experience and most unenlightening when it comes to understanding it.

You ask me to give an account of what I teach, and the objections that this teaching may encounter. I teach you the meaning and the function of the action of speech, in as much as that is the element of interpretation. Speech is the founding medium of the intersubjective relation, and what retroactively modifies the two subjects. It is speech which, literally, creates what installs them in that dimension of being I try to get you to glimpse.

We are not dealing here with an intellectual dimension. If the intellectual is to be located somewhere, it is at the level of the ego-phenomena, in the imaginary projection of the pseudo-neutralised ego – pseudo in the sense of lie – that analysis has exposed as a phenomenon of defence and of resistance.

If you are with me, we will be able to go a long way. The question is not so much one of knowing up to what point one should go, the question is more one of knowing if one will be followed. In fact that is an element which allows one to discriminate what one can call reality.

Over the ages, throughout human history, we witness advances which one would be quite wrong to take to be those of circumvolutions. These are the advances of the symbolic order. Follow the history of a science like mathematics. For centuries it stagnated on problems which are now transparent to ten-year old children. And yet these were powerful minds which pondered them. We were stuck on the solution to equations of the second degree for ten centuries too many. The Greeks could have solved it, since they found out cleverer things concerning the problems of maxima and minima. Mathematical progress is not progress in the power of thought of the human being. It comes good the day some man thinks of inventing a sign like this, $\sqrt{}$, or like that, $\int$. That's what mathematics is.

The position we are in is different, more difficult. Because we have to deal with an extremely polyvalent symbol. But it is only to the extent that we succeed in formulating the symbols of our action in an adequate manner that we will take a step forward. This step forward, like every step forward, is also a retroactive step. That is why I would say that we are, in a way, in the middle of building up, to the extent that you follow me, a psychoanalysis. Our step forward in psychoanalysis, is at the same time a return to the aspirations of its origin.

So what is at issue? A more authentic understanding of the phenomenon of transference.

DR LECLAIRE: I hadn't quite finished. I am asking this question because it is always a little bit in the background for us. It is quite clear that the terms affective and intellectual are no longer common currency in the group we make up.

A good thing too. What can one do with them?

DR LECLAIRE: But that's the point, that is one thing which has been left hanging a bit since Rome.

I believe that I didn't make use of them once in that famous Rome Discourse, except to expunge the term intellectualised.

DR LECLAIRE: Exactly, both this silence, and these direct attacks on the term affective did have an effect.

I believe that is a term which one must completely expunge from our papers.

DR LECLAIRE: In asking you this question, I wanted to get rid of something which had been left hanging. Last time, in talking about transference, you introduced three fundamental passions, amongst them ignorance. That is what I wanted to come to.

Last time I wanted to introduce something like a third dimension, the space, or rather the volume, of human relations in the symbolic relation. It is entirely deliberately that it was only last time that I spoke of these ridges of passion. As Mme Aubry clearly underlined with her question, these are junction points, points of rupture, crests which are located between the different domains over which the interhuman relation extends, the real, the symbolic, the imaginary.

Love is distinct from desire, considered as the limit-relation which is established by every organism with the object which satisfies it. Because its aim is not satisfaction, but being. That is why one can only speak of love where the symbolic relation as such exists.

Now learn to distinguish love as an imaginary passion from the active gift which it constitutes on the symbolic plane. Love, the love of the person who desires to be loved, is essentially an attempt to capture the other in oneself, in oneself as object. The first time that I spoke at length about narcissistic love was, if you remember, as the direct continuation of the dialectic of perversion.

The desire to be loved is the desire that the loving object should be taken as such, caught up, enslaved to the absolute particularity of oneself as object. The person who aspires to be loved is not at all satisfied, as is well known, with being loved for his attributes. He demands to be loved as far as the complete subversion of the subject into a particularity can go, and into whatever may be most opaque, most unthinkable in this particularity. One wants to be loved for everything – not only for one's ego, as Descartes says, but for the colour of one's hair, for one's idiosyncracies, for one's weaknesses, for everything.

But inversely, and I would say correlatively, as a result of exactly that, to love is to love a being beyond what he or she appears to be. The active gift of love is directed at the other, not in his specificity, but in his being.

O. MANNONI: It was Pascal who said that, not Descartes.

There is a passage in Descartes on the progressive purification of the ego beyond all its specific qualities. But you aren't wrong, in so far as Pascal tries to take us beyond the creature.

O. MANNONI: He said it explicitly.

Yes, but it was a gesture of rejection.

Love, now no longer conceived of as a passion but as an active gift, is always directed, beyond imaginary captivation, towards the being of the loved subject, towards his particularity. That is why it can accept to such a great extent his weaknesses and detours, why it can even admit to his errors, but there is a point at which it comes to a halt, a point which is only located in relation to being – when the loved being goes too far in his betrayal of himself and persists in self-deception, love can follow no longer.

I won't fill out the entire course of this phenomenology, which you can ascertain from experience. I will only remark that love, to the extent that it is one of the three lines of division in which the subject is engaged when he realises himself symbolically in speech, homes in on the being of the other. Without speech, in as much as it affirms being, all there is is Verliebtheit, imaginary fascination, but there is no love. There is inflicted love, but not the active gift of love.

Well, with hate, it is the same thing. There is an imaginary dimension of hate, in so far as the destruction of the other is one pole of the very structure of the intersubjective relation. As I've pointed out to you, it is what Hegel recognises as the impasse for the coexistence of two consciousnesses, from whence he deduces his myth of the struggle for pure prestige. Even there, the imaginary dimension is framed by the symbolic relation, and that is why hate is not satisfied with the disappearance of the adversary. If love aspires to the unfolding of the being of the other, hate wishes the opposite, namely its abasement, its deranging, its deviation, its delirium, its detailed denial, its subversion. That is what makes hate a career with no limit, just as love is.

Perhaps it is more difficult to get you to understand that, for reasons which may not be such good reasons for rejoicing as one might think, these days we know less about the feeling of hatred than in times when man was more open to his destiny.

To be sure, we have seen, not very long ago, manifestations which, within this genre, weren't bad at all. Nonetheless, these days subjects do not have to shoulder the burden of the experience of hatred in its most consuming forms. And why? Because our civilisation is itself sufficiently one of hatred. Isn't the path for the race to destruction really rather well marked out for us? Hatred is clothed in our everyday discourse under many guises, it meets with such extraordinarily easy rationalisations. Perhaps it is this state of the diffuse flocculation of hatred which saturates the call for the destruction of being in us. As if the objectivation of the human being in our civilisation corresponded exactly to what, within the structure of the ego, is the pole of hatred.

O. MANNONI: Western moralism.

Exactly. Hatred here discovers how to feed on everyday objects. You would be wrong to think that as a result it is absent from wars, when, for certain privileged subjects, it is fully realised.

Don't get me wrong. In speaking about love and hate to you, I am showing you the paths for the realisation of being, not the realisation of being, but only its paths.

And yet, if the subject commits himself to searching after truth as such, it is because he places himself in the dimension of ignorance – it doesn't matter whether he knows it or not. That is one of the elements making up what analysts call 'readiness to the transference'.[1] There is a readiness to the transference in the patient solely by virtue of his placing himself in the position of acknowledging himself in speech, and searching out his truth to the end, the end which is there, in the analyst. The analyst's ignorance is also worthy of consideration.

The analyst must not fail to recognise what I will call the dimension of ignorance's power of accession to being, since he has to reply to the person who, throughout his discourse, questions him in this dimension. He doesn't have to guide the subject to a Wissen, to knowledge, but on to the paths by which access to this knowledge is gained. He must engage him in a dialectical operation, not say to him that he is wrong since he necessarily is in error, but show him that he speaks poorly, that is to say that he speaks without knowing, as one who is ignorant, because what counts are the paths of his error.

Psychoanalysis is a dialectic, what Montaigne, in book III, chapter VIII, calls an art of conversation.[2] The art of conversation of Socrates in the Meno is to teach the slave to give his own speech its true meaning. And it is the same in Hegel. In other words, the position of the analyst must be that of an ignorantia docta, which does not mean knowing [savante], but formal, and what is capable of being formative for the subject.

Because it is in the air these days, these days of hatred, there is a great temptation to transform the ignorantia docta into what I have called, and this is hardly a novelty, an ignorantia docens. If the psychoanalyst thinks he knows something, in psychology for example, then that is already the beginning of his loss, for the simple reason that in psychology nobody knows much, except that psychology is itself an error of perspective on the human being.

I will have to use banal examples to make you understand what the realisation of the being of man is, because in spite of yourselves you put it in an erroneous perspective, that of a false knowledge.

All the same you must have realised that, when a man says I am, or I will be, even I will have been or I want to be, there is always a jump, a gap. It is just as extravagant, in relation to reality, to say I am a psychoanalyst as I am king. Both the one and the other are entirely valid affirmations, which nothing, however, in the order of what one might call the measure of capacities justifies. The symbolic legitimations by virtue of which a man takes on what is conferred on him by others entirely escapes the register of entitlements to office.[3]

When a man refuses to be king, it does not have at all the same value as when he accepts. By the very fact of refusing, he is not king. He is a petit bourgeois – take for example the Duke of Windsor. The man who, just on the brink of being invested with the dignity of the crown, says – I want to live with the woman I love – simply because of that remains on this side of the domain of being king.

But when the man says – and in saying it, is it, by virtue of a certain system of symbolic relations – says I am king – it is not simply accepting an office. From one minute to the next the meaning of all his psychological attributes changes. His passions, his plans, even his stupidity take on an entirely different meaning. All of these functions become, solely by virtue of the fact of his being the king, royal functions. In the register of royalty, his intelligence becomes something quite different, even his inabilities start to polarise, to structure an entire series of destinies around him, destinies which are found to be profoundly modified for the reason that the royal authority will be exercised in this or that way by the person who has been invested with it.

[2] 'un art de conférer'.
[3] 'habilitations capacitaires'.

This happens on a small scale every day – a gentleman who has decidedly mediocre qualities and who presents all sorts of problems in a low-level job, is raised up in to an investiture that is sovereign in some way, however limited the domain may be, and he changes entirely. All you have to do is observe him everyday, the significance of his strengths as well as his weaknesses is transformed, and their relations may well be reversed.

That is also what habilitations, examinations reveal in an unobtrusive, concealed fashion. Why, given the time that has elapsed since we became such clever psychologists, haven't we eliminated the various milestones which formerly had the value of initiations, the degrees, the competitive examinations, etc? If we have truly eliminated this value, why not pare down the investiture to the totalisation of the work acquired, the notes taken down over the year, or even to a set of tests or examinations measuring the abilities of the subjects? Why retain this vague archaic character for these examinations? We protest against these elements of chance and fortune like people throwing themselves against the walls of the prison they themselves have built. The truth is simply that a competitive examination, in as much as it clothes the subject with a qualification which is symbolic, cannot be given an entirely rationalised structure, and cannot just be inserted into the register of the addition of quantity.

So, when we meet this, we think how clever we are and tell ourselves – But of course, let's write a great psychoanalytic article so as to show the initiatory character of the examination.

This character is obvious. It is fortunate that we are aware of it. But it is unfortunate that the psychoanalyst doesn't always explain it very well. His is a partial discovery, which he explains in terms of omnipotence of thoughts, of magical thought, whereas it is the dimension of the symbol which is fundamental here.

Who has got other questions to raise?

DR BEJARANO: I have a concrete example in mind. You should try to show us how the different registers are followed out in the case of Dora.

In the Dora case, one remains somewhat on the threshold of that, but even so I can place it for you a little by giving a final reply to the question of the transference as a whole.

The analytic experience is founded on Freud's first discoveries, on the tripod dream, slip, joke. The symptom is a fourth element, which can serve, not as verbum, since it is not constructed out of phonemes, but as signum, with the organism as ground – if you can recall the various spheres distinguished in Augustine's text. It is within this experience, and with some delay in the founding of the latter – Freud himself says that he was frightened – that he isolates the phenomenon of the transference. For want of being recognised, the transference operated as an obstacle to the treatment. Once recognised, it becomes the mainstay of the treatment.

But even before he had become aware of the existence of transference, Freud had already designated it. In the Traumdeutung, there is, in effect, already a definition of the Übertragung as a function of the double level of speech, as I have put it to you. There are parts of the discourse which are disinvested of significations which another signification, the unconscious signification, will take from behind. Freud demonstrates it with respect to the dream, and I have pointed it out to you in some striking slips.

It's a pity I have not talked much about the slip this year. Now, that is a fundamental dimension, since it is the radical facet of the non-meaning which all meaning possesses. There is a point where meaning emerges, and is created. But even at this very point, man is very easily capable of feeling that the meaning is at the same time annihilated, that it is created so as to be annihilated. What's a joke? – if not the calculated irruption of non-sense into a discourse which seems to make sense.

O. MANNONI: It is the navel of speech.

Exactly. In the dream, there is an extremely confused navel. Inversely, the navel of the joke is perfectly sharp – the Witz. And what expresses its most radical essence is non-sense.

Well, we realise this transference is our mainstay.

I pointed out three senses in which different authors understand it. This tripartition, which is only didactic, should allow you to get your bearings amidst the various present-day analytic tendencies – and that is not very encouraging.

Some want to understand the phenomenon of transference in relation to the real, that is to say in as much as it is a phenomenon taking place in the present. One thinks one is making a real breakthrough when one says that every analysis must bear on the hic et nunc. One thinks one has found something quite dazzling in that, one thinks one has taken a bold step forward. On this theme Ezriel writes some very touching things, breaking down doors which are already open: the transference is there, it is simply a matter of knowing what it is. If we take transference on the plane of the real, that is what it yields – a real which is not real, but illusory. What is real is that the subject is there, telling me about his dealings with his grocer. What is illusory is that in complaining about his grocer, it is me he is bawling out – that is one of Ezriel's examples. So he thereby concludes that one should demonstrate to the subject that there is really no reason for bawling me out because of his grocer.

Thus, starting off from the emotions, from the affective, from abreaction, and from other terms designating a certain number of the partitioned phenomena which indeed come about during analysis, one nonetheless ends up, I'll have you notice, with something essentially intellectual. To proceed along these lines leads in the end to a practice equivalent to the original forms of indoctrination which scandalise us so much in Freud's behaviour with his early cases. One would have to teach the subject how to act in the real, show him that he is behind the times. If that is not education and indoctrination, I wonder what is. In any case it is an entirely superficial way of dealing with the phenomenon.

There is another way of approaching the problem of transference, which is to place it on the level of that imaginary whose importance I do not fail to underline here. The relatively recent development of animal ethology allows us to give it a much clearer structuration than Freud could. But this dimension has certainly been named as such in Freud's text – imaginare. How could he have avoided it? You have seen as much this year in 'On narcissism: an introduction', the relation of the living organism to the objects that it desires is linked to the conditions of the Gestalt which locate the function of the imaginary as such.

The function of the imaginary is not at all overlooked in analytic theory, but to introduce it only in order to deal with transference is to pull the wool over both eyes, because it is present everywhere, and in particular whenever identification is at issue. Except, one musn't use it without rhyme or reason.

Let us note in this connection that the function of the imaginary is at work in the behaviour of every animal couple.

A dimension of parade appears in every action that is linked up with the moment of pairing of individuals caught up in their cycle of sexual behaviour. In the course of the sexual parade, each of the individuals finds himself captated into a dual situation, in which what is set up, via the go-between of the imaginary relation, is an identification – no doubt only momentarily, on account of its being linked to the instinctual cycle.

Similarly, in the course of the struggle between males, one can see subjects coming to an agreement in an imaginary struggle, in which there is, between the adversaries, a regulation at a distance, transforming the struggle into a dance. And, at a given moment, as in pairing, roles are chosen, one of them is recognised as dominant, without it coming down, I won't say to blows, but to claws, teeth, or prickly spines. One of the partners takes on a passive attitude and submits to the superiority of the other. He gives way to him, adopts one of the roles, quite clearly as a function of the other, that is to say as a function of what the other has made a claim to on the plane of the Gestalt. The adversaries avoid a real struggle which would lead to the destruction of one of them – and transpose the conflict on to the imaginary plane. Each takes his bearings on the other's image, what results is a regulation in which the roles are distributed within the situation as a whole, within the dyadic set-up.

In man, the imaginary is reduced, specialised, centred on the specular image, which creates both impasses and the function of the imaginary relation.

The image of the ego – simply because it is an image, the ego is ideal ego – sums up the entire imaginary relation in man. By being produced at a time when the functions are not yet completed, it has a salutary value, expressed well enough in the jubilatory assumption of the mirror phenomenon, but it does not possess any the less of a connection with the vital prematuration and hence with an original deficit, with a gap to which it remains linked in its structure.

The subject will rediscover over and over again that this image of self is the very framework of his categories, of his apprehension of the world – of the object, and he will achieve this through the intermediary of the other. It is in the other that he will always rediscover his ideal ego, from whence develops the dialectic of his relations to the other.

If the other saturates, fills this image, he becomes the object of a narcissistic investment, that of Verliebtheit. Recall Werther meeting Charlotte just when she is holding a child in her arms – that hits the bull's-eye of the narcissistic image of the novel's young hero. If, on the contrary, on the same slope, the other manifests himself as frustrating the subject of his ideal and of his own image, it engenders the maximal destructive tension. A mere nothing turns the imaginary relation to the other either this way or that, giving us the key to the questions which Freud raises apropos of the transformation that takes place, in Verliebtheit, between love and hate.

This phenomenon of imaginary investment plays a pivotal role in the transference.

If it is true that the transference is established in and through the dimension of speech, it only brings about the revelation of this imaginary relation at certain crucial points in the spoken encounter with the other, that is to say, in this instance, with the analyst. The discourse, stripped of a certain number of its conventions by the so-called fundamental rule, begins to move, more or less freely, in relation to ordinary discourse, and opens up the subject to this fertile mistake through which genuine speech joins up once again with the discourse of error. But also, when speech flees from revelation, from fertile error, and develops into deception – an essential dimension, whose existence precisely forbids us from eliminating the subject as such from our experience, and from reducing that experience[4] to objective terms – what is discovered are those points which, in the subject's history, have not been integrated, taken on, but repressed.

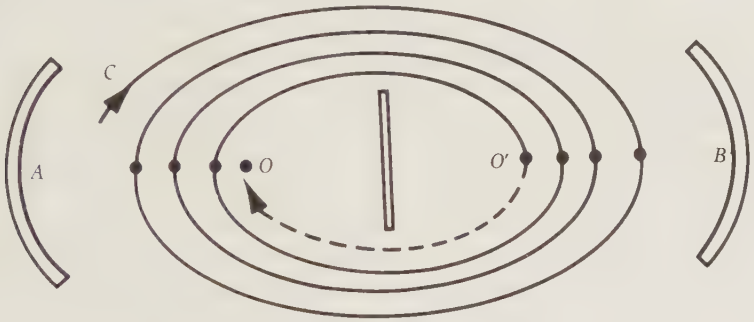
In the discourse of analysis, the subject develops what is his truth, his integration, his history. But there are some holes in this history, where what had been verworfen or verdrängt took place. Verdrängt – come for a moment into discourse and was rejected. Verworfen – the rejection is primal. For the present I don't want to talk at any further length about this distinction.

The phenomenon of transference encounters the imaginary crystallisation. It revolves around it and it has to join up with it again.



A schema of analysis

At O, I place the unconscious notion of the ego of the subject. This unconscious is made up of what the subject essentially fails to recognise in his structuring image, in the image of his ego – namely those captivations by imaginary fixations which were unassimilable to the symbolic development of his history – this means that it was traumatic.

What is involved in analysis? That the subject be able to totalise the various accidents the memory of which is retained in O, in a form closed off to him. It only opens up through verbalisation, that is to say through the mediation of the other, that is the analyst. It is through the spoken assumption of his history that the subject becomes committed to the path of bringing into being his truncated imaginary.

This complementation of the imaginary is achieved in the other, in as much as the subject assumes it in his discourse, in so far as he gets the other to hear it.

What is on the side of O passes over to the side of O'. Everything which is [4] 'de la réduire' in the original. I have chosen to make it clear in the translation that 'la' refers to 'l'expérience', and not to 'le sujet'.

proffered from A, from the side of the subject, makes itself heard in B, on the side of the analyst.

The analyst hears it, but, in return, so does the subject. The echo of his discourse is symmetrical to the specularity of the image. This revolving dialogue, which I represent on the schema by a spiral, binds O' and O more tightly. The progress of the subject in his being must finally bring him to O, via a series of points spaced between A and O.

On this line, the subject, settling down to his labour, over and over again,[5] acknowledging his history in the first person, makes progress into the order of fundamental symbolic relations in which he has to find the time, resolving the halts and the inhibitions which make up the super-ego. You need time for that.

If the echos of the discourse come together too quickly from point O' – that is to say if the transference gets too intense – a critical phenomenon takes place, evoking resistance, resistance in the most acute form in which it manifests itself – silence. So you see why, don't you, as Freud says, the transference becomes an obstacle when it is excessive.

It must also be said, that, if this moment comes at an opportune time, the silence takes on its full value as silence – it is not simply negative, but has value as a beyond of speech. Certain moments of silence in the transference represent the most vivid apprehension of the presence of the other as such.

One final remark. Where should the subject be placed, in so far as it is to be distinguished from point O? It is necessarily somewhere between A and O – much closer to O than any other point – let us say, so as to come back to it, in C.

When you will have left me for holidays which I hope will be happy, I beseech you to reread the precious little technical writings of Freud in the light of these reflections. Reread them, and you will see the extent to which they will take on a new and more vital meaning for you. You will realise that the apparent contradictions regarding transference, simultaneously resistance and motor of the analysis, can only be understood within the dialectic of the imaginary and the symbolic.

Analysts whose teaching is by no means lacking in merit have argued that the most up to date technique of analysis, that which has taken to itself the title of the analysis of resistances, consists in isolating off from the ego of the subject – single out,[6] which is Bibring's term[7] – a certain number of patterns[6] which are manifested as defence mechanisms, in relation to the analyst. That is a radical perversion of the notion of defence as introduced by Freud in his early writings, and reintroduced by him at the time of 'Inhibitions, symptoms and anxiety', one of his most difficult articles and one which has lent itself to most misunderstandings.

There's an intellectual operation for you. Because it is no longer a question of analysing the symbolic character of the defences, but of lifting them, in so far as they constitute an obstacle to a beyond, a beyond which is nothing more than a beyond – it doesn't matter what one puts into it. Read Fenichel, you will see that everything can be approached from the point of view of defence. Does the subject give himself over to the confession of tendencies whose sexual or aggressive character is completely acknowledged? From the simple fact of his having told you them, one can very easily set oneself looking for something beyond which is much more neutral. If one qualifies everything which is made manifest at the outset as a defence, everything can be legitimately considered as a mask, behind which something else is hidden. This systematic inversion is the butt of Jean Cocteau's famous jest – if you can tell someone that he dreams of an umbrella for sexual reasons, why not tell him when he dreams of an eagle swooping down on him to savage him that it is on account of his having forgotten his umbrella?

In centring analytic intervention on the dissipation of patterns[8] which hide this beyond, the analyst has no other guide than his own conception of the subject's behaviour. He attempts to normalise it – in accordance with a norm that is coherent with his own ego. So this will always be a modelling of one ego by another ego, hence by a superior ego – as everyone knows, the analyst's ego is not negligible.

Read Nunberg. What is the essential mainspring of the treatment in his eyes? The good will of the subject's ego, which must become the ally of the analyst. What does that mean? – except that the subject's new ego is the ego of the analyst. And Hoffer is there to tell us that the normal end of the treatment is identification with the ego of the analyst.

Of this end, which is none other than the spoken assumption of the ego, the reintegration not of the ideal ego, but of the ego-ideal, Balint gives us a very moving description. The subject enters into a semi-maniacal state, a sort of sublime release, a freedom from a narcissistic image through the world – for which one must allow him a bit of time so he can pull himself together and rediscover all by himself the paths of common sense.

This conception is not entirely false, since there really is a temporal factor in an analysis. And, besides, this is what has always been said, in a confused fashion, to be sure. Every analyst can only grasp it in his experience – there is a certain staggering of the time-for-understanding. Those of you who came to my discussions on the Wolfman will see in this a reference. But you will rediscover this time-for-understanding in Freud's Papers on Technique in connection with Durcharbeiten.

Is that something like borrowing from psychology? Or is it rather, as I said in what I wrote on empty and full speech, something from the order of discourse, from discourse as labour? Yes, without a shadow of a doubt. The discourse has to be maintained for a long enough time for it to appear as entirely engaged in the construction of the ego. From that point on, it may quite suddenly be resolved into the person for whom it was constructed, that is to say the master. By the same token, its own value falls, and now appears just as labour.

Where does this take us? – if not to grant once again that the concept is time. In this sense, one can say that the transference is the very concept of analysis, because it is the time of analysis.

The so-called analysis of resistances is always too much in a hurry to unveil for the subject the patterns[9] of the ego, its defences, hideaways, and that is why experience shows us and Freud teaches us in a specific passage in the Papers on Technique – such an analysis won't get the subject to take one more step. Freud says, when this happens, you have to wait.

You have to wait. You have to wait as long as it takes for the subject to realise the dimension at stake on the plane of the symbol, that is to say to disengage from the thing experienced in analysis – from this pursuit, from this brawl, from this tight embrace which the analysis of resistances produces – the appropriate duration of certain repetition-compulsions, which in some way gives them symbolic value.

O. MANNONI: I think that that is a concrete problem. For example, there are some obsessionals whose lives consist in waiting. They turn their analyses into another waiting. That is exactly what I want to get to grips with – why does this waiting of the analysis reproduce in a certain manner the waiting in life, and change it?

Exactly, and that is what has been asked of me with respect to the case of Dora. Last year, I developed the dialectic of the Ratman around the master-slave relation. What is the obsessional waiting for? The death of the master. What use does this waiting have for him? It is interposed between him and death. When the master is dead, everything will begin. You re-encounter this structure in all its guises.

What is more, he is right, the slave, he is quite right in banking on this waiting. To take up a comment attributed to Tristan Bernard, the day he was arrested to be brought to the Danzig camp -- Up to now we have been living in anxiety, now we are going to live in hope.[10]

The master, let us get it straight, has a much more abrupt relation to death. The master in the pure state is in a desperate position in this respect, because he has nothing but his own death to wait for, since he expects nothing from the death of his slave, except a little inconvenience. On the other hand, the slave has a great deal to expect from the master's death. Beyond the death of the master, he really will be obliged to confront death, as every fully realised being has to, and to assume, in the Heideggerian sense, his being-for-death. Now precisely, the obsessional does not assume his being-for-death, he has been reprieved, that is what has to be shown him. That is the function of the image of the master as such.

O. MANNONI: . . . who is the analyst.

. . . who is embodied in the analyst. It is only after having sketched out several times the imaginary exits from the master's prison, and done this in accordance with certain scansions, in accordance with a certain timing,[11] it is only then that the obsessional can realise the concept of his obsessions, that is to say what they signify.

In each obsessional case, there necessarily is a certain number of temporal scansions, and even numerical signs. I have already touched on that in an article on 'Logical time'.[12] The subject thinking the thought of the other, sees in the other the image and the sketch of his own movements. Now, each time the other is exactly the same as the subject, there is no other master than the absolute master, death. But the slave requires a certain time to see that.

All because, like everyone else, he is much too happy being a slave.

APPENDIX

A spoken commentary on Freud's Verneinung, by Jean Hyppolite*

To start off with, I must thank Dr Lacan for his insisting on my giving you a presentation of this article of Freud's, because it gave me the occasion for a night's work; and of bringing you the fruit of this labour.[1] I hope that it will prove worthy in your eyes. Dr Lacan made sure to send me the German text with the French. That was a wise thing to do, because I don't think I would have understood anything in the French text, if I hadn't had the German.[2]

I wasn't familiar with this text. It has an absolutely extraordinary structure, * [Originally published as 'Commentaire parlée sur la Verneinung de Freud', La Psychanalyse 1, 1956, 29–40. Reprinted as Appendice I to Lacan's Écrits, pp. 879–87, and also in Jean Hyppolite, Figures de la pensée philosophique. écrits de Jean Hyppolite. Paris: P.U.F. 1971, vol. I, pp. 385–96. We would like to thank Presses Universitaires de France for permission to translate this text.

It will be clear from what follows that the task of translating this talk is a peculiarly complicated one, since Hyppolite is sometimes commenting on the German text (in French), sometimes commenting on the French translation of the German text, and English readers will wish to rely upon the English translation of SE. On occasion, Hyppolite's rendition of the German text differs considerably from that of SE; notes will indicate this where necessary. The SE translation has been relied upon and often adapted (see p. 292 n10 below for a major inaccuracy in it).

There is an additional complication owing to the lack of fit between key terms in German, French and English. As Strachey notes, the translation of 'Verneinung' by 'negation' was chosen to distinguish it from 'denial', which had previously been used to translate 'Verleugnung', but which SE renders with 'disavowal'. (There is also the third term in this series, 'Verwerfung', translated in SE by 'repudiation'.) While Hyppolite explicitly recognises the value of translating 'Verneinung' by 'dénégation', rather than by 'négation', he does not appear to hold consistently to this practice; hence, where 'negation' appears in the text, it corresponds to 'dénégation'; where 'negation' was used in the original, the French word appears in square brackets afterwards.

Having been translated from the Appendix prepared in 1966 for the Écrits, this is the one passage in the Seminar with annotations supplied by Lacan and by the editor of Ecrits, Jacques-Alain Miller. Notes added for the English edition are to be found in roman square brackets; annotations and additions already present in the body of the French text are to be found in ⟨ ⟩.]

[1] 'Je t'apporte l'enfant d'une nuit d'Idumée.' (J. L.) ['I bring you the fruit of a night of Idumée' – reference unclear.]

and deep down it is extremely enigmatic. Its construction is not at all that of a professor. The text's construction is, I don't want to say dialectical, so as not to abuse the word, but extremely subtle. And it obliged me to give myself over, with both the German text and French text (in which the translation is not very accurate but is, in the end, when compared with others, honest enough) to a genuine interpretation. And this is the interpretation I am going to offer you. I think it is valid, but it is not the only possible one and it is certainly worth talking over.

Freud begins by introducing the title Die Verneinung. And I realised, making the same discovery Dr Lacan had already made, that it would be better to translate it by 'la dénégation'.

In the same way, further on you will find etwas im Urteil verneinen, which is not 'the negation of something in the judgement',[3] but a sort of readjudication [déjugement].[4] Throughout this text, I think one must distinguish between the negation [négation] internal to judgement and the attitude of negation [négation]; otherwise it doesn't seem possible to understand it.

The French text doesn't bring out the extremely concrete, almost entertaining style of the examples of negation with which Freud starts off. To start off with, take the following one, which contains a projection whose role you can easily locate given the analyses this seminar has engaged in, in which the patient, let us call him the person being psychoanalysed [psychanalysé], says to his analyst: 'Now you'll think I mean to say something insulting, but really I've no such intention.' 'We realise', Freud says, 'that this is a rejection, by projection, of an idea that has just come up.'[5]

'I came to realise that when, in daily life, as frequently happens, we want to say "assuredly I do not want to insult you by saying what I am saying", one should translate this by "I want to insult you." Such an intention is never lacking.'[6]

But this remark leads Freud to a very daring generalisation, through which he will address the problem of negation in so far as it might be the very origin of

[3] [SE: 'to negate something in a judgement']

[4] As is sufficiently indicated by the following sentence, in making the Verurteilung, that is the condemnation that it designates as the equivalent (Ersatz [SE: substitute]) of repression, whose very no must be taken as a hall-mark, into a certificate of origin comparable to the made in Germany impressed upon an object. (J. L.) [The phrase 'Made in Germany' appears in English in the original German (and in the French), thus highlighting that the hall-mark of repression is written in a foreign language. There is a historical aspect to this: the requirement that German goods display a hall-mark of origin (written in English) was imposed on the governments of Germany and Austria following the First World War (and hence a few years before Freud was writing): the ruling was intended to facilitate discrimination against German goods by stigmatising them. In fact, it had the opposite effect, since goods bearing the stamp 'Made in Germany' thereupon became sought after.]

[5] [SE XIX 235]

[6] [It is not clear why this passage is in quotation marks, since it is not a quotation from Freud's text.]

intelligence. That is how I understand the paper, in all its philosophical density.

In the same way, he gives an example of someone saying: 'You ask who this person in the dream can be. It's not my mother.' In which case, the question is settled, we can be sure that it is indeed her.

He goes on to cite a procedure which is useful to the psychoanalyst but in addition, we would say, to anyone, for clarifying what it is that has been repressed in a given situation. 'What would you consider the most unlikely thing in that situation? What do you think was furthest from your mind at that time?' And the patient, or it might just as easily be anyone you happen to be talking to, at a party or over supper, if he lets himself be caught in your trap and indeed tells you what he considers to be the most unbelievable thing, then that is what one has to believe.

So this is an analysis of concrete goings on, generalised until its basis is encountered in a mode of presenting what one is in the mode of not being it. Because that is exactly how it is constituted: 'I am going to tell you what I am not; pay attention, that is exactly what I am.' That is how Freud engages with the function of negation and, in order to do this, he uses a word which I could not but feel at home with, the word Aufhebung, which, as you know, has had a variety of destinies; it is not for me to say it . . .

DR LACAN: But if not you, then who else will it fall to?

M. HYPPOLITE: It is Hegel's dialectical word, which means simultaneously to deny, to suppress and to conserve, and fundamentally to raise up. In reality, it might be the Aufhebung of a stone, or equally the stopping of my newspaper subscription. At this point Freud tells us: 'negation is already an Aufhebung of the repression, though not, of course, an acceptance of what is repressed.'[7]

This is the start of something truly extraordinary in Freud's analysis, whereby what emerges from these anecdotes, which we might well have taken for nothing more than anecdotes, are implications of prodigious philosophical importance, which I will attempt to summarise in a moment.

Presenting one's being in the mode of not being it, that is truly what is at issue in this Aufhebung of the repression, which isn't an acceptance of what is repressed. The person speaking says: 'This is what I am not.' It would no longer be repressed, if repression signified unconsciousness, since it is conscious. But in its essentials, the repression persists,[8] in the form of non-acceptance.

Here Freud is going to lead us through an argument of extreme philosophical subtlety, in which it would be a gross lapse of attention to overlook the remark that Freud makes, simply on account of its everyday use which we never reflect on, that 'in this the intellectual function is separated from the affective process'.

[7] [SE XIX 235–6]

[8] 'bei Fortbestand des Wesentlichen an der Verdrängung' [GW XIV 12; Stud III 374].

Because, in the manner in which he then goes on to deal with it, there's a truly profound discovery.

Extending my hypothesis, I would say that, in proposing an analysis of the intellectual, he does not show how the intellectual is separated from the affective, but how it, the intellectual, is that sort of suspension of content for which the term, in rather barbaric language, sublimation[9] is not inappropriate. Perhaps what is born here is thought as such; but not before the content has been affected by a negation.

To refer to a philosophical text (which I once again ask you to excuse me for, although Dr Lacan is my surety here with respect to such a necessity), at the end of one of Hegel's chapters, the issue becomes that of substituting genuine negativity for that destructive appetite which takes hold of desire and which is there conceived of in a profoundly mythical rather than psychological manner, substituting, I was saying, for this destructive appetite which takes hold of desire and which is such that in the final outcome of the primordial struggle in which the two combatants confront one another, there would be no one left to remark the victory or the defeat of the one or the other, an ideal negation [négation].

The negation which Freud is here talking of clearly shows us, in so far as it is different from the ideal negation [négation] in which the intellectual is constituted, the sort of genesis whose vestiges Freud points to, in bringing his text to a conclusion [moment de conclure], in the negativism characteristic of certain psychotics.[10] And Freud goes on to give us an account of what differentiates this point from negativity, all the while speaking mythically.

In my view, this is what has to be acknowledged in order to understand what, in this article, is being spoken of, quite properly, under the name of negation, even though it isn't immediately visible. Similarly, one must take cognisance of an asymmetry expressed by two different words in Freud's text – which have been translated by the same word in French – an asymmetry between the emergence of affirmation starting off from the unifying drive [tendance] of love, and the genesis, starting off with the destructive drive [tendance], of that negation whose true function is that of giving rise to intelligence and the very starting point of thought.

But let us make our way with more care.

We have seen that Freud posits the intellectual as separated from the affective: whatever is yet to be added to this by the desired modification of [9] We intend some day to establish a strict definition for analysis for this term – something which has not yet been done. (J. L. 1955). A promise since kept (1966).

[10] 'Die allgemeine Verneinungslust, der Negativismus mancher Psychotiker, ist wahrscheinlich als Anzeichen der Triebentmischung durch Abzug der libidinosen Komponenten zu verstehen.' ['The general pleasure in negation, the negativism of many psychotics, is probably to be understood as a sign of a defusion of drives that has taken place through a withdrawal of the libidinal components.' (GW XIV 15; Stud III 376–7; SE XIX 239 – translation modified: amongst other imprecisions, SE gives 'wish to negate' for 'Verneinungslust')] analysis, 'the acceptance of what is repressed', repression is not, for all that, suppressed. Let us try to represent the situation.

First stage: this is what I am not. One concludes from that what I am. Repression still subsists in the guise of negation.

Second stage: the psychoanalyst obliges me to accept intellectually what I just denied; and Freud adds, after a dash and without any further explanation – 'the repressive process itself is not yet removed (aufgehoben) by this'.

Which seems very profound to me. If the analysand accepts, he renounces his negation, and yet the repression is still there! I conclude from this that one must do what Freud didn't do: call what happens here by a philosophical term – the negation of the negation. Literally, what appears here is intellectual affirmation, which is only intellectual, in so far as it is negation of the negation. These terms are not to be found in Freud, but I think that all we're doing is taking his thought one step further by formulating it in this way. That is what he really means.

At this point (let us be vigilant over a difficult text!) Freud finds himself in a position where he can show how the intellectual separates itself ⟨in action⟩[11] from the affective, to give a formulation of a sort of genesis of judgement, that is, in short, a genesis of thought.

I apologise to the psychologists here, but I do not much like positive psychology in itself; one might take this genesis for a positive psychology. To me its implications seem more profound in belonging to the order of history and of myth. And I think, given the role that Freud has this primordial affectivity play, in so far as it is the progenitor of intelligence, that it should be understood in the way that Dr Lacan teaches: that is to say that the primal form of relation known psychologically as the affective is itself situated within the distinctive field of the human situation, and that, if it engenders intelligence, it is because it already, from its beginnings, brings with it a fundamental historicity. There is no pure affective on the one hand, entirely engaged in the real, and the pure intellectual on the other, which detaches itself from it in order to grasp it once again. In the genesis described here, I see a sort of grand myth. And behind the appearance of Freud's positivity, there's this grand myth sustaining it.

What does that imply? Behind affirmation,[12] what is there? Vereinigung, which is Eros. And what is there behind negation (careful – intellectual negation will be something more)? The emergence of a fundamental asymmetrical symbol. Primordial affirmation is nothing more than affirming; but to deny is more than to wish to destroy.

The process which leads to that point, which has been translated by rejet [rejection], without Freud having used the term Verwerfung,[13] is still yet more forcefully accented, since he uses Ausstossung, which means expulsion.

[11] Words added. These will be indicated from now on by similar brackets.
[12] Bejahung. [13] [See p. 43 n8 above.]

Here, then, in some way one finds ⟨the formal couple⟩ of two primary forces: the force of attraction[14] and the force of repulsion, both, it appears, under the domination of the pleasure principle, which in this text cannot but strike one.[15]

So, here judgement has its primary history. And at this point Freud distinguishes two types:

In conformity with what everyone learns concerning the elements of philosophy, there is a judgement of attribution and a judgement of existence. 'The function of judgement . . . affirms or disaffirms the possession by a thing of a particular attribute, and it asserts or disputes that a presentation has an existence in reality.'

And Freud then shows what lies behind the judgement of attribution and behind the judgement of existence. It seems to me that in order to understand this paper, one should consider the negation [négation] of the attributive judgement and the negation [négation] of the judgement of existence as being on this side of negation [négation] when it appears in its symbolic function. At bottom, judgement doesn't yet exist in this moment of emergence, rather there is a primary myth of the outside and the inside, and that is what has to be understood.

You can sense the implication of this myth of the formation of the outside and the inside: that of alienation, which is founded in these two terms. What is translated in their formal opposition becomes, beyond, alienation and hostility between the two.

What makes these four or five pages so dense is that, as you see, they put everything in question, and in them one is led from concrete remarks, seemingly so slight and yet so profound in their generality, to something which sweeps away an entire philosophy, by which we should understand an entire structure of thought.

Behind the judgement of attribution, what is there? There is the 'I should like to take in (to myself) [(m')approprier], introject' or the 'I should like to eject.'

In the beginning, Freud seems to be saying, but in the beginning means nothing more than the myth 'once upon a time' . . . Within this history, once upon a time there was an ego (by which we here should understand a subject) for which nothing as yet was alien.

Distinguishing between the alien and itself is an operation, an expelling. Which renders comprehensible a proposition which, having emerged rather abruptly, seems for a moment to be contradictory:

'Das Schlechte, what is bad, das dem Ich Fremde, what is alien to the ego, das Außenbefindliche, what is external, ist ihm zunächst identisch, are, to begin with, identical.'

[14] Einbeziehung.

[15] The seminar in which J. L. gave a commentary on Beyond the pleasure principle took place in 1954–55.

Now, just before, Freud had said that one introjects and one ejects, that therefore there is an operation which is the operation of expulsion ⟨without which⟩ the operation of introjection ⟨would have no meaning⟩. So that is the primordial operation upon which the judgement of attribution is founded.

But what lies at the origin of the judgement of existence is the relation between representation and perception. And here it is very difficult to miss the sense in which Freud deepens this relation. What is important is that, 'in the beginning', it is of no importance to know whether something exists or doesn't exist. The subject reproduces its presentation of things from the primitive perception it had of them. Now, when he says that this exists, the question is ⟨not⟩[16] one of knowing whether this presentation still preserves its state in reality but if it can or cannot be refound. Such is the relation which Freud stresses: he founds [the testing] of the presentation by reality in the possibility of its object being refound once again. This emphasis on the source of repetition shows that Freud is working in a more profound dimension than that of Jung, the latter's dimension being more properly that of memory.[17] At this point one must not lose the thread of his analysis. (But it is so difficult and detailed that I am afraid of losing you.)

What was at issue in the judgement of attribution was expelling or introjecting. In the judgement of existence, it is a question of attributing to the ego, or rather to the subject (it is more comprehensive), a presentation to which its object no longer corresponds, although an object had once corresponded to it, through a retracing of its steps. What is here in question is the genesis 'of the external and of the internal'.

Hence this offers us, Freud tells us, 'an insight into the origin' of judgement, 'from the interplay of the primary drive-impulses'. So here there is a sort of 'continuation, along lines of expediency, of the original process by which the ego took things into itself [appropriation au moi][18] or expelled them from itself, according to the pleasure principle.'

'Die Bejahung, affirmation, Freud tells us, als Ersatz der Vereinigung, in so far as it is simply the equivalent of unification, gehört dem Eros an, belongs to Eros': this is what lies at the source of affirmation. For example, in the judgement of attribution, there's the fact of introjecting, of taking into ourselves [nous approprier] instead of ejecting outside.

[16] Words added by the editor, in line with Freud's text: 'Der erste und nächste Zweck der Realitätsprüfung ist also nicht, ein dem Vorgestellten entsprechendes Objekt in der realen Wahrnehmung zu finden, sondern es wiederzufinden, sich zu überzeugen, daß es noch vorhanden ist.' [GW XIV 14; Stud III 375] ['The first and immediate aim, therefore, of reality-testing is, not to find an object in real perception which corresponds to the one presented, but to refind such an object, to convince oneself that it is still there.' (SE XIX 237–8)]

[18] [The term in the German text at this point is 'Einbeziehung', earlier rendered as 'attraction', whereas the earlier use of 'approprier' was a rendering of 'einführen'; SE renders both 'Einbeziehung' and 'einführen' by 'take into'.]

For negation [négation], he doesn't employ the word Ersatz, but the word Nachfolge. But the French translator translates it by the same word as Ersatz. The German text gives: affirmation is the Ersatz of Vereinigung, and negation [négation] the Nachfolge of expulsion, or more exactly of the instinct of destruction (Destruktionstrieb).[19]

As a result this becomes entirely mythical: two instincts which, as it were, are mixed together in this myth which bears the subject: one of unification, the other of destruction. A grand myth, as you see, and one which repeats others. But the little nuance, whereby affirmation in some way only comes to substitute for unification, whereas negation [négation] ensues well after expulsion, only this nuance appears to me capable of explaining the sentence which follows, in which it is simply a question of negativism and of the instinct of destruction. In fact this explains how there can be a pleasure in negation, a negativism which results straightforwardly from the suppression[20] of the libidinal components; that is to say what has disappeared in this pleasure in negating (disappeared = repressed) are the libidinal components.

As a consequence, does the instinct of destruction also depend upon ⟨the⟩ pleasure ⟨principle⟩? I think this is very important, crucial for technique.[21]

Except, Freud tells us, 'the performance of the function of judgement is only made possible by the creation of the symbol of negation'.[22]

Why doesn't Freud say: the functioning of judgement is rendered possible by affirmation? Because negation [négation] has a role to play not as a tendency to destruction, no more than within a form of judgement, but in so far as it is the fundamental attitude of symbolicity rendered explicit.

'The creation of the symbol of negation which has permitted an initial degree of independence in relation to repression and its consequences and, with it, from the compulsion (Zwang) of the pleasure principle.'[23]

[19] [For this sentence, SE XIX 239 gives: 'Affirmation – as a substitute for uniting – belongs to Eros; negation – the successor to expulsion – belongs to the instinct of destruction.']

[20] The German Abzug: deduction, deducting, withholding, docking, 'what is withheld in the pleasure in negating are the libidinal components'. Its possibility is referred to the Triebentmischung which is a sort of return to a pure state, a decanting of drives which is commonly – and mediocrely – translated by: 'désintrication des instincts' [SE: 'defusion of instincts'].

[21] The admirable way in which M. Hyppolite's presentation at this point presses close to the difficulty appears to me all the more important given that I had not as yet produced the theses that I was to develop in the following year in my commentary on Beyond the Pleasure Principle, on the death instinct, which is simultaneously both so elusive and so present in this text.

[22] Underlined by Freud. [There is no emphasis of this passage in the German text. Here, the passage is translated directly from the French, since it differs markedly from SE: 'Die Leistung der Urteilsfunktion wird aber erst dadurch ermöglicht, daß die Schöpfung des Verneinungssymbols dem Denken einen ersten Grad von Unabhängigkeit von der Erfolgen der Verdrängung und somit auch vom Zwang des Lustprinzips gestattet hat.' (GW XIV 15; Stud III 377) 'But the performance of the function of judgement is not made possible until the creation of the symbol of negation has endowed thinking with a first measure of freedom from the consequences of repression and, with it, from the compulsion of the pleasure principle.' (SE XIX 239)]

A sentence whose meaning would not have created any problem for me, if I hadn't started off by linking up the tendency to destruction with the pleasure principle.

Because here there is a difficulty. From then on, what does this asymmetry between affirmation and negation [négation] signify? It signifies that all of the repressed can once again be taken up and used again in a sort of suspension, and that, in some way, instead of being under the domination of the instincts of attraction and repulsion, a margin of thought can be generated, an appearance of being in the form of non-being, which is generated with negation, that is to say when the symbol of negation [négation] is linked up with the concrete attitude of negation.

Because that is how one should understand the text, if one admits its conclusion, which at first seemed so strange to me.

'This view of negation fits in very well with the fact that in analysis we never discover a "no" in the unconscious . . .'

But one certainly finds destruction there. So one must make a clearcut distinction between the instinct of destruction and the form of destruction, otherwise one won't understand what Freud meant. In negation, one should see a concrete attitude at the origin of the explicit symbol of negation [négation], which explicit symbol alone makes possible something like the use of the unconscious, all the while maintaining the repression.

Such appears to me to be the meaning of the end of the conclusion cited above: '. . . and that recognition of the unconscious on the part of the ego is expressed in a negative formula'.

That is the summary: in analysis there is no 'no' to be found in the unconscious, but recognition of the unconscious on the part of the ego demonstrates that the ego is always failure to recognise [méconnaissance]; even in knowledge [connaissance], one always finds, on the part of the ego, in a negative formula, the hall-mark of the possibility of being in possession of the unconscious in refusing it all the while.

'There is no stronger evidence that we have been successful in our effort to uncover the unconscious than when the analysand reacts with the phrase: "I didn't think that", or (even): "I didn't (ever) think of that."'

So, in these four or five pages of Freud's – and I apologise if I myself have demonstrated some difficulty in finding in it what I believe to be its thread – there is, on the one hand, the analysis of that kind of concrete attitude, which emerges simply from observing negation; on the other hand, the possibility of seeing the intellectual dissociate itself 〈in action〉 from the affective; finally, and above all, a genesis of everything which occurs on the level of the primal, and in consequence the origin of judgement and of thought itself (in the form of thought as such, since thought is already there before, in the primal, but it does not figure as thought there) – grasped by means of negation.

This volume is the transcript of the first year of Lacan's world-famous seminar. Taking as its theme the technique of psychoanalysis, within the framework of Lacan's 'return to Freud', it includes elaboration of Lacan's notions of the symbolic, the imaginary and the real, the importance of speech and language in psychoanalysis and the interpretation to be put on the mirror stage. It also includes lengthy discussions of the clinical and theoretical work of contemporary psychoanalysts such as Michael Balint and Melanie Klein, as well as St Augustine and Jean-Paul Sartre. Together with Seminar II. The Ego in Freud's Theory and in the Technique of Psychoanalysis, 1954–1955, being published simultaneously, it undoubtedly forms the best point of departure for the English-speaking reader wishing to gain some acquaintance with the disturbing and profound thought of Jacques Lacan.

TRANSLATORS' NOTE

1. What follows is a complete translation of the seminar that Jacques Lacan gave in the course of a year's teaching within the training programme of the Société Française de Psychanalyse. The French text was prepared by Jacques-Alain Miller in consultation with Jacques Lacan, from the transcriptions of the seminar. Certain minor errors in the text have been corrected in the translation, and will be incorporated in later editions of the French text. All notes are supplied by John Forrester (who also compiled the index), in order to clarify questions of translation and supply limited bibliographical information.
2. We have aimed at an exact translation. This involves, however, finding appropriate colloquial English to correspond to a text which is both informal and complex – a rendition of Lacan's spoken French. The translation aims at being both informal and literary, corresponding as faithfully as possible with the original text.
3. As we needed to pay additional attention to the German background of many psychoanalytic concepts, in many passages the requirements of three languages had to be taken into account. There has been considerable debate in French analytic circles about the translation of Freud's works, in large part stimulated by these seminars of Lacan's, which, until the early 1960's, were advertised as 'Commentaries on the texts of Freud'. In recent years the admirable English edition of Freud prepared by James Strachey has also been the subject of discussion and criticism in the English-language world. Anticipating the decision of the next Freud translators, we have made one decision which follows the French translations of Freud at the expense of Strachey's: where 'investir, investi, investissement' appears in the French text, corresponding to the German 'besetzen, besetzt, Besetzung', we have translated this by 'invest, invested, investment', instead of 'cathect, cathected, cathexis'. We have also translated 'pulsion', corresponding to 'Trieb', by 'drive' and 'instinct', corresponding to 'Instinkt', by 'instinct'; this decision is hardly controversial. Both of these decisions accord with Schneiderman's practice.[1] Other decisions are pointed out in the notes.

4. This Seminar, together with Seminar I, which is being published simultaneously, was worked on by both translators so as to produce uniformity in both terminology and style. We have paid considerable attention to the practices of previous translators of Lacan, in particular Anthony Wilden,[2] Alan Sheridan,[3] Stuart Schneiderman and Jacqueline Rose,[4] in the hope that some consistency in the English rendition of Lacan can be achieved. In attempting to follow our predecessors, we came to the conclusion that it was often more accurate to render one single French term by a variety of English terms. This was made all the more necessary in view of the fact that Lacan's 'technical' vocabulary was, throughout his life, always tentative and decidedly in flux. Nonetheless, the translations of the following terms have, or have acquired, such importance in discussion of Lacan's work that it may be useful to point them out, together with certain differences between our translation and that of other Lacan translators.

FRENCH TERM	PREVIOUS TRANSLATORS	THIS TRANSLATION
parole	Word (Wilden)	speech
signification	signification (Sheridan) meaning (Schneiderman)	signification or significance
sens	sense (Schneiderman) meaning (Sheridan)	meaning
signifier		to mean or to signify
travail		labour or work

TRUTH AND KNOWLEDGE
THE DENTIST'S COGITO
THE I IS NOT THE EGO, THE SUBJECT IS NOT THE INDIVIDUAL
THE CRISIS OF 1920

Hello, dear old friends, so here we are again.

Defining the nature of the ego will take us a long way. Well then, it is from this long way off that we will start in order to return back towards the centre – which will bring us back to the long way.

Our topic this year is the Ego in Freud's theory and in the technique of psychoanalysis. But it isn't only within this theory and this technique that the ego has a meaning, and this is precisely what makes for the complexity of the problem.

The notion of the ego has been developed over the centuries as much by those commonly known as philosophers, with whom we are not afraid to rub shoulders here, as by the communal consciousness. In short, there is a certain pre-analytical notion of the ego – let us agree to call it thus, in order to give ourselves a sense of direction – which exerts an attraction on the radical innovation Freud's theory introduced with respect to this function.

We might well be surprised at such an attraction, indeed even subduction, or subversion, were it not for the fact that the Freudian notion of the ego is so upsetting as to warrant the expression Copernican revolution, the meaning of which we apprehended in the course of our meetings last year. These constitute the basis for those we will have this coming year.

The results we arrived at will be almost completely integrated into the new phase in which we now take up Freud's theory again, a theory which remains our guiding thread – do not forget that this is a seminar of texts.

The new perspectives opened up by Freud were destined to abolish the preceding ones. And yet, via innumerable detours, something happened to the usage of theoretical terms, and a notion of the ego has re-emerged, which is in no way that which the overall equilibrium of Freud's theory brings with it. On the contrary, it tends towards the re-absorption, which is moreover openly admitted, of analytic knowledge within general psychology, which in this instance means pre-analytical psychology. And by the same token, for theory and practice are inseparable, the analytic relation, the direction of the practice, have been realigned. This is what the contemporary history of the technique of psychoanalysis shows us.

It remains very enigmatic. This wouldn't trouble us in the least if it were just a conflict between schools, between reactionaries and progressives, Ptolemaics and Copernicans. But it goes much further than that. What is at issue is the establishment of an efficacious, concrete complicity, between analysis, the liberating, demystifying treatment of a human relation, and the fundamental illusion of man's experience, or at least of modern man.

The man of today entertains a certain conception of himself, which lies half-way between naivity and sophistication. The belief he holds that he is constituted in this or that way partakes in a certain current of diffuse, culturally accepted notions. He may think that it is the result of a natural inclination, whereas in fact, in the present state of civilization, it comes to him from all sides. My thesis is that Freud's technique, at its origin, transcends this illusion which, in a quite concrete manner, has taken hold over the subjectivity of individuals. The question therefore is whether psychoanalysis will ever so gently allow itself to abandon what had opened up for a moment, or whether, on the contrary, it will again make manifest its cutting edge in such a way as to give it back its sharpness.

Hence the usefulness of referring to certain works of a certain style.

It makes no sense, to my mind, to cut up our remarks according to the different series in which they occur. Thus, what Alexandre Koyré introduced in his lecture yesterday evening concerning the function of the Platonic dialogue, starting specifically with the Meno, can, without any undue contrivance, be inserted into the framework of the teaching being developed here. The function of the Tuesday lectures, rightly called extra-ordinary, is indeed to enable each of you to crystallise the questioning left dangling at the outer edges of the domain we are investigating in this seminar.

Yesterday evening, I underlined, in the few comments I made, transforming Meno's equations, what one can call the function of truth in its nascent state. Indeed, the knowledge to which truth comes to be knotted must actually be endowed with its own inertia, which makes it lose something of the virtue which initiated its deposition as such, since it exhibits an obvious propensity to misrecognise its own meaning. Nowhere is this degradation more obvious than in psychoanalysis, and this fact, in and of itself, reveals the truly nodal point which psychoanalysis occupies within the limited advance of human subjectivity.

This singular ambiguity of knowledge and of truth can be seen at the origin – although one never really gets completely to the origin, let us take Plato as the origin, in the sense in which one speaks of the origin of coordinates. Yesterday evening we saw it revealed in the Meno, but we could just as easily have used Protagoras which wasn't mentioned.

Who is Socrates? He is the one who within human subjectivity inaugurates that style from which the notion of knowledge as tied to certain requirements of coherence has arisen, knowledge which is the prerequisite for any future progress of science as experimental – and we will have to define what the sort of autonomy which science has acquired within the experimental register signifies. Well then, at the very moment when Socrates inaugurates this new being-in-the-world which here I call subjectivity, he realises that science will not be able to transmit the means to achieve the most precious thing, the arété, the excellence of the human being. Here already there is a decentring – it is by starting off with this virtue that a domain is opened up to knowledge, but this very virtue, with respect to its transmission, its tradition, its formation, remains outside of the domain. That is something which merits attention, rather than rushing off into believing that in the end everything will sort itself out, that it is only Socrates's irony, that sooner or later science will catch up with this through a retroactive action. Yet, up until now, nothing in the course of history has proved this to us.

What has happened since Socrates? A lot of things, and in particular, the concept of the ego has seen the light of day.

When something comes to light, something which we are forced to consider as new, when another structural order emerges, well then, it creates its own perspective within the past, and we say – This can never not have been there, this has existed from the beginning. Besides, isn't that a property which our own experience demonstrates?

Think about the origins of language. We imagine that there must have been a time when people on this earth began to speak. So we admit of an emergence. But from the moment that the specific structure of this emergence is grasped, we find it absolutely impossible to speculate on what preceded it other than by symbols which were always applicable. What appears to be new thus always seems to extend itself indefinitely into perpetuity, prior to itself. We cannot, through thought, abolish a new order. This applies to anything whatsoever, including the origin of the world.

Similarly, we can no longer do our thinking without this register of the ego which we have acquired over the course of history, even when we are concerned with traces of man's speculation about himself at times when this register was not pursued as such.

function analogous to that which it occupies in our theoretical thinking, but also in the spontaneous apprehension we have of our thoughts, our tendencies, our desires, of what belongs to us and what does not, of what we admit to being expressions of our personality or what we reject as being parasitical on it. It is very difficult for us to imagine that the whole of this psychology isn't eternal.

Is this in fact the case? The question at least deserves to be raised.

To raise it leads us to examine more closely whether there isn't in fact a point when this notion of the ego can be grasped in its nascent state. We don't have to go very far, the evidence is still fresh. It doesn't go back much further than the period, still quite recent, in which so much progress in our lives took place, when we thought it funny to read in the Protagoras of someone arriving one morning at Socrates's – Hallo! Come in, what is it? – Protagoras has arrived. What amuses us, is that everything happens, just as Plato says it does, as if by chance, in complete darkness. This has never been noticed by anyone, because it can only interest those who, like us, for a mere seventy-five years, if that, are used to switching on the electric light.

Look at the literature. You say that that's the job of those who think, but those who don't think must always have had, more or less spontaneously, some notion of the ego. What makes you so sure? You, in any case, belong with those who think, or at least you are following on after people who have thought about it. So, let's try to open the question, rather than settling it so unthinkingly.

The type of people that we shall define, using a conventional notation, as dentists are very confident about the order of the universe because they think that Mr Descartes made manifest the laws and the procedures of limpid reason in the Discourse on Method. His I think, therefore, I am, so essential to the new subjectivity, is not as simple, however, as it would appear to these dentists, and some even think they detect in it a pure and simple sleight of hand. If it is in fact true that consciousness is transparent to itself, and grasps itself as such, it does seem that the I is not on that account transparent to it. It is not given to it as different from an object. The apprehension of an object by consciousness does not by the same token reveal to it its properties. The same is true for the I.

If this I is in fact presented to us as a kind of immediate given in the act of reflection by which consciousness grasps itself as transparent to itself, for all that, nothing indicates that the whole of this reality – and it is granting quite a bit already to say that we come to a judgement of existence[1] – would be exhausted by this.

The reflections of the philosophers have led us to a more and more purely formal notion of the ego, and, to be truthful, to a critique of this function. The development of thought turned away, at least temporarily, from the notion of the ego as a substance, as from a myth to be submitted to rigorous scientific scrutiny. Though embarked – whether or not legitimately is beside the point – on an attempt to consider it as a pure mirage, with Locke, with Kant, and even with the psychophysicists, who had only to follow their lead for different reasons, of course, and with other premises. They cast the greatest suspicion on the function of the ego, in as much as the latter more or less implicitly perpetuates the substantialism implicit in the religious conception of the soul, as a substance which at the very least is endowed with the properties of immortality.

Isn't it striking that, by an extraordinary conjuring trick of history – having abandoned for a moment the subversive element of Freud's contribution, which can be taken as a step forward within a certain tradition of the development of thought – we have returned to a state prior to this philosophical critique, which by any standard is not new?

We have used the term Copernican revolution to describe Freud's discovery. Not that what isn't Copernican is absolutely unambiguous. Men have not always believed that the Earth was a kind of infinite plate. They have also conceived of it as having limits, various shapes, sometimes that of a lady's hat. But nonetheless, they had the idea that there were things below, let us say at the centre, and that the rest of the world was built up on top of it. Well, if we do not know what a contemporary of Socrates might have thought of his ego, even so there must have been something at the centre, and there is no reason to believe Socrates ever doubted that. It was probably not made like the ego, which starts at a later date, which we can locate towards the middle of the sixteenth, beginning of the seventeenth centuries. But it was at the centre, at the base. In relation to this conception, the Freudian discovery has exactly the same implication of decentring as that brought about by the Copernican discovery. It is quite well expressed by Rimbaud's fleeting formula – poets, as is well known, don't know what they're saying, yet they still manage to say things before anyone else – I is an other.[2]

Don't let this impress you! Don't start spreading it around that I is an other – it won't impress anyone, believe me! And what is more, it doesn't mean anything. Because, to begin with, you have to know what an other means. The other – don't use this term as a mouthwash.

One of our colleagues, our ex-colleagues, who used to hobnob a bit with Les Temps Modernes, the journal of existentialism, as it's called, told us as if it were news that in order for someone to be analysed he had to be able to conceive of the other as such. A real smart Alec, that one. We should have asked him – What do you mean by the other? – his fellow man, his neighbour, his ideal I, a washbowl? These are all others.

The unconscious completely eludes that circle of certainties by which man recognises himself as ego. There is something outside this field which has every right to speak as I, and which makes this right manifest by coming into the world speaking as an I. It is precisely what is most misconstrued by the domain of the ego which, in analysis, comes to be formulated as properly speaking being the I.

So this is the register within which what Freud has to teach us about the unconscious can take on its full importance and contours. The fact that he gave voice to this by calling it the unconscious leads him to real contradictions in adjecto, in speaking of unconscious thoughts – he says it himself, sit venia verbo,[3] and he constantly apologises for it. This is all terribly cumbersome, since, from the point of view of communication, at the time he started writing, he was forced to start off from the notion that what belongs to the order of the ego also belongs to that of consciousness. But that's not certain. If he says that, it is because of a specific stage in the development of philosophy which at that time assumed the equation ego = consciousness. But the more Freud's work progressed, the less easy he finds it to locate consciousness, and he has to admit that it is in the end unlocalisable. Everything is progressively more organised within a dialectic in which the I is distinct from the ego. In the end, Freud gives the game up for lost – there must be, he says, conditions beyond our grasp here. The future will tell us what these are. This year we will try to get a sense of how we can finally locate consciousness within the Freudian functionalisation.

With Freud, a new perspective suddenly appears, revolutionising the study of subjectivity and showing precisely that the subject cannot be confused with the individual. This distinction, which I first showed you on the subjective plane, can also be grasped – and, from the scientific point of view, this may be the most decisive step – on the objective plane.

If we consider from a behaviourist's perspective what is objectively to be found in the human animal, in the individual as an organism, we note a certain number of properties, of movements, manoeuvres and relations. From the organisation of such behaviour we infer the variable extent of the detours of which the individual is capable in order to attain those things which are assumed by definition to be his goals. That is how we get an idea of the nature of his relations with the external world, how one measures the degree of his intelligence, how one in effect fixes the level, the low-water mark, by which to measure the perfection, or arété, of his species. Now what Freud's contribution was is the following – the manifestations of the subject in question can in no sense be localised on an axis, on which, the higher they would be, the more they would consistently be confused with the intelligence, the excellence, the perfection of the individual.

Freud tells us – intelligence has nothing to do with the subject, the subject is not on the same axis, it is ex-centric. The subject as such, functioning as subject, is something other than an organism which adapts itself. It is something else, and for those who are capable of understanding, its entire behaviour speaks of something other than the axis we can grasp when we consider it as a function of an individual, that is to say, with a specific number of interests conceived of in relation to the individual arété.

We will confine ourselves to this topological metaphor for the moment – the subject is decentred in relation to the individual. That is what I is an other means.

In some ways, it can already be found on the periphery of the fundamental Cartesian intuition. If you take off your dentist's glasses in reading Descartes, you will become aware of certain puzzles he shows us, in particular that of a deceiving God. When one employs the notion of the ego, at the same time one cannot avoid the implication that there has been a misdeal somewhere along the line. The deceiving God is, in the end, the reintegration of what was rejected, ectopia.

About the same time, one of those frivolous minds who play at salon games – sometimes some very surprising things start there, minor entertainments sometimes do give rise to a new order of phenomena – a very odd fellow, who doesn't really fit our standard conception of the classical type, La Rochefoucauld to give him his name, all of a sudden took it upon himself to inform us of the peculiarity of something we hadn't thought long enough about, and which he calls self-love. It is rather surprising that this should have seemed so outrageous, for what in fact was he saying? He was emphasising that even those of our activities which seem to be most disinterested are motivated by the concern for glory – even passionate love or the most virtuous acts, however secret.

What exactly did he mean? Was he saying that we act with a view to our own pleasure? This is a very important question because everything in Freud will turn around it. If that was all that La Rochefoucauld had said, he would have only been repeating what had since time immemorial been taught in the schools – nothing is ever since time immemorial, but you can see the point of the since time immemorial on this occasion. Since Socrates, pleasure has been the search for one's good. Whatever we may think, we are pursuing our pleasure, seeking our good. The only question is whether a human animal of such a sort, considered behaviourally as we did just now, is intelligent enough to comprehend what is truly its good. If he understands wherein this good resides, he gains the pleasure which always results from it. Mr Bentham pushed this theory to its logical extreme.

But La Rochefoucauld makes us appreciate something else – that by engaging in so-called disinterested actions, we think we free ourselves from immediate pleasure, and are seeking a higher good, but we are mistaken. That is the novelty. This isn't a general theory claiming that egoism accounts for all human activities. That can already be found in Saint Thomas's physical theory of love – in love the subject is searching for his own good. Saint Thomas, who was only repeating what had been said for centuries, was in fact contradicted by a certain William of Saint-Amour, who observed that love had to be something other than the search for one's own good. In La Rochefoucauld, what is scandalous is not so much that for him self-love is the basis of all human behaviour, but rather that it is deceiving, inauthentic. There is a hedonism specific to the ego, and which is precisely what lures us, that is, which at one and the same time frustrates us of our immediate pleasure and of the satisfactions which we can draw from our superiority with respect to this pleasure. Here there's a division of planes, for the first time the introduction of an outline, which starts to open us up, through a certain diplopia, to what will seem like a real division of the plane.

This conception belongs to a tradition parallel to that of the philosophers, the moralist tradition. These are not people who specialise in ethics, but who introduce a so-called perspective of truth into the observation of moral conduct or mores. This tradition leads to Nietzsche's Genealogy of Morals, which remains entirely within this in some ways negative perspective, according to which human behaviour as such is deluded. It is into this hollow, into this bowl, that the Freudian truth comes to be poured. You are deluded, no doubt, but the truth lies elsewhere. And Freud tells us where it is.

What then erupts, with the crash of thunder, is the sexual instinct, the libido. But what is the sexual instinct? the libido? the primary process? You think you know – me too – but that doesn't mean we should be as certain about it as all that. You should take a closer look, and that is what we will try to do this year.

Where have we got to today? To a theoretical cacophony, to a conspicuous revolution in positions. And why? In the first place, because the metapsychological work of Freud after 1920 has been misread, interpreted in a crazy way by the first and second generations following Freud – those inept people.

Why did Freud think it necessary to introduce these new, so-called structural,[4] metapsychological notions, which we call the ego, the super-ego and the id? Because, in the experience of the aftermath of his discovery, a turning-point, a real crisis was reached. In short, this new I, with whom one was meant to enter into dialogue, after a while refused to answer.

This crisis is clearly expressed in the testimony of historical witnesses of the years between 1910 and 1920. In the course of the first analytical revelation, the subjects recovered more or less miraculously, and this is still apparent when we read Freud's cases with their interpretations which strike like lightning and their endless explanations. Well, it is a fact that it worked less and less well, that it ground to a halt in the course of time.

That is what prompted people to think that there is some reality in what I'm saying, that is, in the existence of subjectivity as such, and its modifications in the course of time, in accordance with a specific causality, a specific dialectic, which moves from subjectivity to subjectivity, and which perhaps escapes any kind of individual conditioning. Within the conventional units which we call subjectivities on account of individual particularities, what is happening? What is closing up? What is resisting?

Precisely in 1920, that is just after the change of direction which I have just mentioned – the crisis of analytic technique – Freud thought it necessary to introduce his new metapsychological notions. And if one reads what Freud wrote from 1920 on attentively, you realise that there is a direct link between this crisis in technique which had to be overcome, and the manufacture of these new notions. But for that you must read his writings – to read them in the right order is better still. The fact that Beyond the Pleasure Principle was written before Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego, and before The Ego and the Id, should raise questions – no one has ever asked them.

What Freud introduced from 1920 on, are additional notions which were at that time necessary to maintain the principle of the decentring of the subject. But far from being understood as it should have been, there was a general rush, exactly like the kids getting out of school – Ah! Our nice little ego is back again! It all makes sense now! We're now back on the well-beaten paths of general psychology. How could one fail to come back to it with elation, when this general psychology is not only stuff from school or a mental commodity, but, what is more, is the psychology of everyman? There was satisfaction in being once again able to believe the ego to be central. And we see its latest manifestations in the amusing lucubrations which come to us at the moment from the other side of the pond.

Mr Hartmann, psychoanalysis's cherub, announces the great news to us, so that we can sleep soundly – the existence of the autonomous ego. This ego which, since the beginning of the Freudian discovery, has always been considered as in conflict, which, even when it was located as a function in relation to reality, never ceased to be thought of as something which, like reality, is conquered in a tragedy, is all of a sudden restored to us as a central given. To what inner necessity does the assertion that somewhere there must be an autonomous[5] ego answer?

This conviction extends beyond the individual naivity of the subject who believes in himself, who believes that he is himself – a common enough madness, which isn't complete madness, because it belongs to the order of beliefs. Obviously, we are all inclined to believe that we are ourselves. But we aren't so sure of it, take a closer look. In many very specific circumstances we doubt it, without for all that undergoing depersonalisation. It isn't therefore simply to this naive belief that they want us to return. It is properly speaking a sociological phenomenon, which concerns analysis as a technique, or if you prefer, as a ceremony, as a priesthood determined within a certain social context.

Why reintroduce the transcendent reality of the autonomous[6] ego? Looking at it closely, these autonomous[6] egos are more or less equal, according to the individuals. So we are back to an entification according to which not only individuals as such exist, but moreover some exist more than others. That is what contaminates, more or less implicitly, the so-called notions of the strong ego and the weak ego, which are just so many ways of ducking the issues raised as much by the understanding of the neuroses as by the handling of the technique.

We will consider all of this in its own due time and place.

So this year we will pursue the examination and criticism of the notion of the ego in Freud's theory, we will clarify its meaning in relation to Freud's discovery and to the technique of psychoanalysis, all through studying side by side some of its current uses, which are tied to a certain manner of conceiving the relation of one individual to another in analysis.

Freudian metapsychology does not begin in 1920. It is there from the very start – take a look at the collection on the beginnings of Freud's thought, the letters to Fliess, the metapsychological writings of that period – and is taken up again at the end of the Traumdeutung. It is sufficiently in evidence between 1910 and 1920 for you to have noticed it last year. In 1920, what may be called the last metapsychological period begins. For this period Beyond the Pleasure Principle is the primary text, the pivotal work. It is the most difficult. We won't resolve all of its puzzles right away. But that's how it happened – Freud first produced that, before elaborating his structural model [topique]. And if you put off dealing with it in order for you to get, or think you have got, to the bottom of the works of the following period, all you do is make the grossest of errors. That is how most analysts give up the challenge when it comes to the death instinct.

I would like some good soul, for instance Lefèbvre-Pontalis, to give an initial reading of Beyond the Pleasure Principle.

PSYCHOANALYSIS AND ITS CONCEPTS

A TRUTH WHICH CANNOT BE GRASPED BY BOUNDED KNOWLEDGE

FORM AND SYMBOL

PERICLES, PSYCHOANALYST

THE YEAR'S PROGRAMME

Last time I gave a brief introduction to the problem into which I am expecting us to make some headway this year, that is, the ego in Freudian theory.

This notion cannot be identified with the ego of traditional classical theory, although it extends the latter – but given what it adds to it, within the Freudian perspective the ego takes on an entirely different functional value.

I gave you a sense that it is only rather recently that the ego has been theorised. Not only did the ego not mean in Socrates's time what it means today – open the books, you will see that the word is altogether absent – but actually – used here in the full sense of the word – the ego didn't have the same function.

A change in perspective has since upset the traditional notion of what could be the good, of, say, the individual, the subject, the soul, or of whatever else you want. The unitary notion of the good, as this perfection or aretê, which polarises and directs the fulfilment of the individual, was from a certain point on stamped with a hint of inauthenticity. I pointed out to you the real significance in this respect of La Rochefoucauld's thought. Open this small collection of maxims about nothing very much. Now, there's a peculiar society game, which affords us a kind of pulsation, or more exactly an instantaneous grasp of consciousness. It is a moment of reflection which has a truly active value, and is an ambiguous eye-opener – is it a concrete mirage of the relation of man with himself, or a simple coming to consciousness, the realisation, of something which had not been seen up until then?

The impact of psychoanalysis on this issue is that of a Copernican revolution. Every relation of man with himself changes perspective with the Freudian discovery, and this is what is involved in practice, such as we pursue it every day.

This is why, last Sunday, you heard me reject in the most categorical fashion the attempt at refusion of psychoanalysis with general psychology. The idea of a unilinear, pre-established individual development, made up of stages each appearing in their turn, according to a determined typicity,[1] is purely and simply the giving up, the conjuring away, the camouflage, the negation, properly speaking, even the repression of the essential contribution of analysis.

We have heard this bid for syncretism from the mouth of the only advocate of this tendency who knows how to deliver a coherent discourse. You could see what this coherent discourse led him to uphold – Analytical concepts have no value whatever, they don't correspond to reality. But this reality, how are we to grasp it, if we don't designate it by means of our vocabulary? And if, in continuing to do so, we believe that this vocabulary is only a signal of things which would be beyond, that it is reducible to little labels, designations floating in the unnamed of everyday analytic experience? If that were the case, it would simply mean that another has to be invented, that is, practice something other than psychoanalysis. If psychoanalysis isn't the concepts through which it is formulated and transmitted, it isn't psychoanalysis, it is something else, but if that's the case, then that should be made clear from the start.

However – and therein lies the sleight of hand – these same concepts continue to be used, of course, otherwise the experience would completely disintegrate – and I don't mean that this doesn't happen, in actual fact, to some people who let themselves go to the point of reducing psychoanalysis to general psychology. But psychoanalytical concepts quite simply do exist, and it is because of them that psychoanalysis endures. The others use them, they cannot but make use of them, but in a way which is neither integrated, nor articulated, nor capable of making itself understood, nor of being transmitted, nor even of being defended. And that's why as soon as they enter into dialogue with others as happened last Sunday, that is, with psychiatrists, they slip their vocabulary back into their pockets, saying that that isn't what's so important in the analytical experience but rather what is is the interchange of forces, that is, what you can't poke your nose into.

The character of Meno did not afford a pointless preamble to our cycle of work this year. Its value is exemplary – at least for those who are here and try to understand. For them, there will be no share in the confusion which, from what I've been told, reigns in some minds, in accordance with which Meno would be the analysand, the unhappy analysand whom we ridiculed the other evening. No, Meno isn't the analysand, he's the analyst – the bulk of analysts.

I wouldn't want to leave hanging whatever may have been left unfinished in our meeting with Alexandre Koyré. I know it was our first meeting, and that it is always hard to knit something into a dialogue. It really is an art, a maieutics. Some of those who might have had something to contribute to it weren't able to do so, except off-stage. We can't pretend to exhaust the question of the Platonic dialogue in one evening. The important thing is that it is still with us, alive and open.

Nevertheless, it would be unfortunate if what Octave Mannoni said to me after the lecture weren't put into circulation within our community. Does he still remember what occurred to him after my own intervention on the function of orthè doxa? For there is, in truth, a puzzle in this orthè doxa.

O. MANNONI: What struck me about the drift of M. Koyré's lecture is firstly an almost spontaneous tendency to assimilate directly the Platonic dialogue and the Socratic maieutics to analysis. I would like to challenge this all too easy assimilation by drawing attention to the fact that for Plato, there is a forgotten truth, and maieutics consists in bringing it to light, in such a way that the dialogue is a mixture of truth and error, and dialectic a kind of sieve for truth. In analysis, it isn't the same kind of truth, it is a historical truth, whereas the first kind appears, from one point of view, as a truth of natural science. It is rather surprising that the unconscious is sometimes called the forgotten language, as Eric Fromm does, and at other times the basic language, as Senatspräsident Schreber does, that is to say, sometimes wisdom and sometimes madness. So that what comes back to light in the analytical maieutics is the truth in error and the error in truth. That is completely different from what happens in a Platonic perspective. I also think that M. Koyré pulls orthè doxa onto the side of what primitives call the customs which people live by. Consequently, it can in fact happen that someone – Meno, and especially Anytos – who is attached to customs which people live by feels himself threatened in the face of epistemological investigation. It may be that here there is a conflict which reappears in analysis, when someone who is confident, who trusts in what he is doing, worries about what might happen if one put him on the spot.

It is true that there has been, and not only on the part of M. Koyré, a somewhat abusive inclination to compare the handling of the dialogue with Meno to the analytic experience.

Now, as far as truth is concerned, do take note what the aim of the Meno is. The Meno shows how one gets truth from the mouth of the slave, that is to say, from anyone, and that any and everybody is in possession of the eternal forms. If present experience presupposes reminiscence, and if reminiscence is what ensues from the experience of previous lives, then it must be the case that these experiences have also been had with the help of a reminiscence. There's no reason why this recurrence should come to an end, which shows us that it is indeed a matter of a relation to the eternal forms. It is their awakening in the subject which explains the passage from ignorance to knowledge. In other words, one can't know anything, if only because one already knows it. But this isn't, properly speaking, the aim of the Meno.

The aim and paradox of the Meno is to show us that the epistêmê, knowledge bounded by a formal coherence, does not cover the whole of the field of human experience, and in particular there is no epistêmê of what brings about perfection, the arété of this experience.

I should say now that we will have to ask ourselves what these relations are in Beyond the Pleasure Principle.

What is highlighted in this dialogue, is not simply that Meno doesn't know what he is saying, it is rather that he doesn't know what he is saying regarding virtue. Why? – because he was a bad pupil of the Sophists – he doesn't understand what the Sophists have to teach him, which isn't a doctrine which explains everything, but the use of discourse, which is really quite different. You can see how bad a pupil he is when he says – If Gorgias were here, he would explain all this to us. You would be knocked over by what Gorgias said. The system is always in the other.

What Socrates highlights is precisely the following, that there is no epistêmê of virtue, and more precisely of what is the essential virtue – for us no less than for the Ancients – political virtue, by which citizens are bound into one body. Excellent, pre-eminent, practitioners, who are not demagogues, Themistocles, Pericles, act at that highest level of action, political government, by reason of an orthodoxy, which isn't defined for us in any other way than the following, that there is here a truth which cannot be grasped by a bounded knowledge.

Orthèdoxa has been translated as a true opinion, and this is indeed the meaning.

If the constitution of an epistêmê, within the vast uproar, the hubbub, the confusion, of sophistry, is Socrates's role, it remains to be understood what he expects from it. Because Socrates doesn't believe that it is everything.

There would still be a lot to say about Socrates's points of reference. Socrates always includes a reference to techniques in his dialectics, not that he makes techniques the models for everything, because he knows very well that there are differences between those of the pilot, the shipbuilder, the physician, and the higher technique of those who govern the state. And in the Meno, he shows us again exactly where the breach is.

M. HYPPOLITE: You're somewhat avoiding Mannoni's question.

I'm not avoiding it. I have been skirting around it for a long time. But do you agree with what I've been saying?

M. HYPPOLITE: I'm waiting for what's to come, in order to decide. I think Mannoni just now made clear the fundamental difference between the Platonic dialogue and that of analysis.

I take that for granted, and it is completely irrelevant.

M. HYPPOLITE: I think one can avoid the radical aspect of this difference. And I was wondering if that was what you were trying to get at. I was waiting for what comes next.

You'll see.

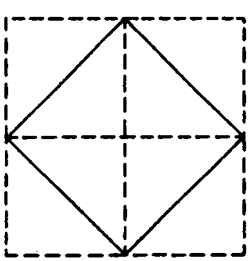
It isn't easy to wrap things up. That's because our epistêmê has made so much progress that it is evidently constituted completely differently from Socrates's. Nevertheless, it would be wrong not to realise that, even based on the model of experimental science, the modern epistêmê, as in Socrates's time, consists essentially in a certain coherence of discourse. It is simply a matter of knowing what this coherence means, what kind of bond it involves. It is to this word 'relation' that we will address a great many of the questions which we will be raising here starting off with what I will try to teach you about the ego.

I'll make another comment, before I lay my cards on the table. In wanting to give Meno an example of the way in which the discourse of science is constituted, in showing him that he doesn't need to know that much, that there is no need to believe that he'll find it in the discourse of the Sophists, Socrates says: Take this human life, this one here, the slave, and you will see that he knows everything. All that is needed is to awaken it. Now read again with some care the manner in which he makes the slave discover the truth in question, that is – how to double the surface of the square, after having realised that a certain number of surface units corresponds to one of its sides, units which are proportional to this side.

Well, the slave may be in possession of all the sciences in the book, as accumulated in his previous life, it won't change the fact that he will start by making a mistake. He goes astray by quite properly employing what we use as a starting-point in the standard intelligence test – he employs the relation of equivalence $A/B = C/D$, the means intelligence most consistently employs. This procedure leads him mathematically to the erroneous belief that in doubling the side one will double the surface.

With the figure drawn in the sand Socrates shows him that this could not be the case.

The slave sees clearly that the surface constructed by doubling the side of 2 is twice what one wanted to obtain – 16 instead of 8. But it doesn't help him in resolving the problem, and it is Socrates who shows him that by removing the four corners of the large square, one reduces it by exactly half, that is by 8, and that in this way the inside square is 8, and constitutes the required solution.



Don't you see there is a fault-line between the intuitive element and the symbolic element? One reaches the solution using our idea of numbers, that 8 is half of 16. What one obtains isn't 8 square-units. At the centre we have 4 surface units, and one irrational element, $\sqrt{2}$, which isn't given by intuition. Here, then, there is a shift from the plane of the intuitive bond to a plane of symbolic bond.

This demonstration, which is an example of the shift from the imaginary to the symbolic, is quite evidently accomplished by the master. It is Socrates who effects the realisation that 8 is half of 16. The slave, with all his reminiscence and his intelligent intuition, sees the right form, so to speak, from the moment it is pointed out to him. But here we put our finger on the cleavage between the imaginary, or intuitive, plane – where reminiscence does indeed operate, that is to say the type, the eternal form, what can also be called a priori intuitions – and the symbolic function which isn't at all homogeneous with it, and whose introduction into reality constitutes a forcing.

I will ask M. Riguet, who is a mathematician, if I am saying things which seem to him to be controversial?

M. RIGUET: I agree.

I do feel better for having a mathematician agree with me.

You see then that the function here shown to be generic to the bonds which Socrates incorporates into the epistêmê, fundamentally brings into question the value of the symbolic invention, the emergence of speech. There is a moment in the history of geometry when $\sqrt{2}$ appears. Up until then, they just hovered close to it. Retrospectively, one can say that the Egyptian and Indian geometers caught a glimpse of it, that they found a way of dealing with it. Similarly, Socrates, who right there on the sand, pulls a neat trick, and finds an equivalent for it. But the autonomy of $\sqrt{2}$ is not at all brought out in the dialogue. When it appears, it generates a great many things, a complete mathematical transformation, in which the slave no longer has any role to play.

M. HYPPOLITE: You argue then that in Plato any invention once made turns out to generate its own past, turns out to be an eternal discovery. Actually, we are perverted by Christianity, which makes us locate a given eternal truth as antecedent. Whereas Platonism, following to a great extent the movement which we might call historicity, shows us that the invention of the symbol, once invented, turns out to be an external past. The notion of eternal truth has perhaps not the meaning that the Middle Ages gave it, and upon which Mannoni's interpretation is clearly based. That is why I am saying that there could exist a paradoxical bond between the Platonic dialogue and analysis, and that that was what you were looking for in the relation between symbolism and truth.

That's still not quite right. I in fact believe that there are two sorts of relations to time. From the moment that a part of the symbolic world comes into existence it does indeed create its own past. But not in the same way as the form at the intuitive level. It is precisely in the confusion of the two planes that the error lies, the error of believing that what science constitutes by the intervention of the symbolic function has always been there, that it is given.

This error exists in all knowledge, in as much as it is only a crystallisation of the symbolic activity, and once constituted, it forgets it. In all knowledge once constituted there is a dimension of error, which is the forgetting of the creative function of truth in its nascent form. That it is forgotten in the experimental domain is just about understandable, since it is bound up with purely operant[2] activities – operational[2] as we say, I don't quite know why, when the word 'operant' says it just as well. But we analysts, we can't forget it, we who work in the dimension of this truth in its nascent state.

What we discover in analysis pertains to the level of orthè doxa. Everything which takes effect in the field of analytic action precedes the constitution of knowledge, which doesn't change the fact that in operating in this field we have constituted a knowledge, and one which has even proved itself to be exceptionally efficacious, as is quite natural, since any science arises from a use of language which precedes its own constitution, and that it is through this use of language that the analytic action develops.

This is also why the more we know, the greater the risks. All you are taught in a more or less pre-digested form in the so-called institutes of psychoanalysis – sadistic, anal stages etc. – all this is of course very useful, especially for people who aren't analysts. It would be stupid for a psychoanalyst systematically to neglect them, but he must be aware of the fact that that isn't the dimension in which he operates. He must fashion himself, come to be at ease in a domain other than the one where what in his experience is slowly constituted out of knowledge is deposited, laid down.

O. MANNONI: I entirely agree.

Except I think I am explaining to you what you put to us earlier as being an enigma. You said that on both sides there was truth and falsehood, falsehood and truth. They had, for you, a strictly symmetrical and inverse distribution.

O. MANNONI: I didn't put it forward as an enigma. What seemed enigmatic to me is that the opinion of the general public is all too eager to tag psychoanalysis on to Platonism.

There are two sorts of public, the one here, which at least has a chance of finding out what's what, and the other, which drops in from all kinds of places, to sniff out a little of what's happening, which thinks this is funny, a subject for passing comments on, for dinner-table conversation, and which understandably gets a bit lost. If they want to find out which way is up, all they need to do is to be a bit more assiduous. We can't discourage curiosity enough – these aren't lectures for the fashion-conscious. If they come in order to believe that we are going to turn psychoanalysis into the extension of the Platonic dialogue, they are wrong. They should get better informed.

Founding speech, which envelops the subject, is everything that has constituted him, his parents, his neighbours, the whole structure of the community, and not only constituted him as symbol, but constituted him in his being. The laws of nomenclature are what determine – at least up to a point – and channel the alliances from within which human beings copulate with one another and end up by creating, not only other symbols, but also real beings, who, coming into the world, right away have that little tag which is their name, the essential symbol for what will be their lot. Thus the orthè doxa which Socrates leaves behind him, but in which he feels completely enveloped – since after all that's also where he starts out from, since he is in the process of constituting this orthè doxa which he leaves behind – we ourselves place it, once again, at the centre. That's what analysis is.

In the end, for Socrates, though not necessarily for Plato, if Themistocles and Pericles were great men, it was because they were good psychoanalysts.

In their own register, they discovered what true opinion means. They are at the heart of this historical reality in which a dialogue is taken up, when no truth of any kind can be located in it in the form of a generalisable knowledge which is always true. To give the reply that one has to in response to an event in so far as it is significant, in so far as it is a function of a symbolic exchange between human beings – it could be the order given to the fleet to leave Piraeus – is to give the right interpretation. And to give the right interpretation at the right moment, that's to be a good analyst.

I don't mean to say that the statesman is a psychoanalyst. It is precisely Plato who, with the Statesman, begins to construct a science of politics, and God knows where it has led us since. But for Socrates, the good statesman is a psychoanalyst. That's my reply to Mannoni.

O. MANNONI: I don't quite agree. There is another side of the alternative which seems to me to be more Socratic. Pericles and Themistocles were good statesmen for another reason, they had orthè doxa, they were what today we call gentlemen.[3] They were so well integrated into their social milieu, they had so few problems, so little need of science, that it is almost the reverse.

That is what I'm in the middle of telling you, my dear fellow. It wasn't because they were born psychoanalysts, without having been psychoanalysed, that they weren't good psychoanalysts.

It is obvious that at that time, it was only the masters who made history, and that the slave who Socrates wanted to put through his paces has nothing to say. It will still take him some time to be Spartacus. For the moment he is nothing. It is precisely because only gentlemen[4] have something to say in this story that they find the right words. And even a chap like Socrates will be turned out[4] because he stepped a little too far out of line from the society of gentlemen.[4] By dint of epistêmê, he misses out on orthè doxa, and they will make him pay dearly for it, in a stupid way. But it is also that, as Maurice Merleau-Ponty has remarked, Socrates did show some good will – he might well have almost had them on. Maybe he wasn't altogether there at the time? He probably had his own reasons for staging another kind of demonstration. After all, it wasn't that ineffective. It did have a symbolic meaning.

There is a bit of time left. Have you anything to tell us today, Pontalis?

I think it is always best to begin to tackle questions at their most difficult point – then, you only have to work your way down. That's why I wanted us to begin with Beyond the Pleasure Principle. Of course, I didn't want Pontalis to be burdened with the task of giving us straight off an exhaustive analysis, because we will only understand this text after having been through everything Freud says concerning the ego, from one end to the other of his work.

I want to remind you that this year you must all read the following texts from cover to cover and with the greatest care.

Firstly, Aus den Anfängen der Psychoanalyse, which includes the letters to Fliess and the Entwurf, which is a preliminary, already self-contained, psychological theory. The great discovery of the period after the war was that of these youthful papers of Freud's. Read this Project for a so-called psychological theory, which is already a metapsychology with a theory of the ego. You'll also find it in English under the title The Origins of Psycho-analysis.

Secondly, the Traumdeutung, especially the chapter entitled 'The psychology of the dream-processes'. In the German edition or failing that in the English one.

Thirdly, the texts concerning what is considered to be Freud's second metapsychology, grouped together in the French translation under the title of Essais de Psychanalyse. It contains Beyond the Pleasure Principle, Group Psychology and the Analysis of the Ego and the The Ego and the Id, which are the three articles fundamental to the comprehension of the ego.

Fourthly, there are other things you can read, such as the articles 'Neurosis and psychosis', 'The loss of reality in neurosis and psychosis', 'Analysis terminable and interminable'.

Fifthly, you must be acquainted with Freud's last work, this incomplete essay called in German Abriss der Psychoanalyse, which provides some signposts as to the way in which Freud superimposed on the first topographical account he had given of the psyche – unconscious, preconscious, conscious – the new topography of the ego, the super-ego and the id. It is only in the Abriss that you will find any hints on this point.

With the above, which ranges from Freud's first to his last work, you have the element in which we will try to conduct the analysis of Freudian theory.

O. MANNONI: – May I draw our attention to the last article in the Collected Papers, 'Splitting of the ego'?[5]

That is precisely where all the confusions began.

Pontalis, you have ten minutes to tell us the questions which the initial reading of Beyond the Pleasure Principle has inspired in you.

M. LEFÈBVRE-PONTALIS: I will briefly remind you what the title means. You will recall that Beyond the Pleasure Principle is an essay in which Freud discovers that the pre-eminence which he had first accorded to the pleasure principle, tied to the principle of constancy, according to which the organism must be able to reduce tension to a constant level, he discovered then that this principle is not exclusive, contrary to what he had first asserted. It is as if he were somehow pushed by a certain number of facts to go beyond what he had first asserted. But he is in some difficulty in this text which I didn't know until now.

First of all there are the dreams of those with traumatic neuroses, that is, the strange fact that in the traumatic neuroses there always is a rerun of the dream of the traumatic situation. So that the idea of the dream as a hallucinatory fulfilment of desire collapses.

Next, the games endlessly repeated by children. There's the famous example of the eighteen-month-old child left by his mother, and who each time throws an object away and retrieves it again – a process of continual disappearance, and reappearance. The child tries to take on an active role in this situation.

Most important is what happens in the transference situation, when the analysand dreams the same dreams over and over again, always the same ones. And in a general way, he is led to repeat instead of simply remembering. It is as if resistance didn't only arise, as Freud first believed, solely from the repressed, but uniquely from the ego. And he finds his initial conception of the transference modified. The latter isn't simply defined as the product of a disposition for transference, but as a compulsion to repeat.

In short, these facts lead Freud to objectify, and to move on to assert that there is something other than the pleasure principle, that there is an irresistible tendency[6] to repeat, which would transcend the pleasure principle and the reality principle, which, although opposed in a way to the pleasure principle, would complete it, at the heart of the principle of constancy. It is as if, alongside the repetition of needs, there was a need for repetition, of which Freud is aware long before he actually introduces it.

[6] The French term is 'tendance'; 'compulsion' translates 'compulsion'.

At this point it is out of the question to follow Freud in the biological project which he seeks to offer as infrastructure. I would simply like to raise some questions concerning what we have covered up until now.

Something which struck me – since I am meant to play the part of the innocent – is that the tendency to repeat seems defined in a contradictory fashion.

It seems defined by its goal, and its goal, to take the example of the child's game, seems to be to master what threatens a given equilibrium, to assume an active role, to triumph over unresolved conflicts. At this point, the tendency to repeat seems to be the generator of tension, the purveyor[7] of progress, whereas the instinct, in the sense in which Freud uses it, is on the contrary only a principle of stagnation. The key idea is that the tendency to repeat modifies the pre-established harmony between the pleasure principle and the reality principle, that it leads to broader and broader integrations, that it is therefore the purveyor of human progress. The title of the article is then justified. The compulsion to repeat would be beyond the pleasure principle, since it would constitute the condition for a kind of human progress, instead of being, like the pleasure principle, a relation of security.

If we adopt the other point of view, if we cease to define the tendency to repeat by its goal, and define it by its mechanism, it appears as pure automatism, as regression. To illustrate this aspect, Freud uses many examples drawn from biology. The tension aspect is illustrated by the facts of human progress, while the regression aspect is illustrated by the phenomenon of alimentary hygiene.

That is the construction which I thought I discerned between the tendency to repeat, purveyor of progress, and the tendency to repeat, mechanism. One mustn't give up trying to describe this repetition in biological terms, and understand it in purely human terms. Man is led into mastering it by his death, his stagnation, his inertia, which he can always fall back into.

Second question. This inertia could be intimated by the ego, which Freud defines very explicitly as the nucleus of resistances in the transference. It is one step in the evolution of his doctrine – the ego in analysis, that is in a situation which challenges the precarious equilibrium, the constancy, the ego introduces security, stagnation, pleasure. In such a way that the function of the relation of which we spoke a moment ago will not define every subject. The ego, whose main task is to transform everything into secondary energy, into bound energy, won't define every subject, hence the appearance of the tendency to repeat.

The question of the nature of the ego could be bound to the function of narcissism. There again, I have found some contradictions in Freud, who sometimes seems to identify it with the self-preservative instinct, and sometimes speaks of it as a sort of quest for death.

That is more or less what I wanted to say.

[7] 'le facteur'.

Did it seem to be sufficiently intelligible, in its brevity?

As brief as it may have been, I think that the way in which Pontalis has raised the problem is remarkable, because he really points to the heart of the ambiguities with which we will have to deal, at least in the first stages, in our attempt to understand the Freudian theory of the ego.

You spoke of the pleasure principle as being equivalent to the tendency to adaptation. You do realise that this is precisely what you subsequently put into question. There is a profound difference between the pleasure principle and something else which differentiates itself off from it, like these two English terms which can render the word 'besoin' – need[8] and drive.[8]

You have put the question aptly by saying that a certain way of talking about it implies the idea of progress. But perhaps you haven't sufficiently insisted on the fact that the notion of the tendency to repeat as drive[8] is very explicitly opposed to the idea that there is anything at all in life which has a tendency towards progress, contrary to the perspective of conventional optimism, of evolutionism, which leaves the problematic of adaptation – and I would even go so far as to say that of reality – completely open.

You were right to underline the difference between the biological register and the human register. But this can only be of interest if one realises that the question of this text emerges from the confusion between these two registers. No other text so profoundly questions the very meaning of life. It leads to a confusion, I would almost say a radical confusion, of the human dialectic with something which is in nature. There is here a term that you did not mention, and which is, however, absolutely essential, that of the death instinct.

You very rightly showed that this isn't simply Freudian metaphysics. The question of the ego is entirely implicated here. You have only sketched it out – otherwise you would have accomplished what I am going to help you to do this year.

Next time I will take up the question of the ego and of the pleasure principle, that is to say, I will take up at one and the same time what figures at the end of Pontalis's question and what he encountered at the beginning.

The symbolic universe

DIALOGUES CONCERNING LÉVI-STRAUSS
LIFE AND THE MACHINE
GOD, NATURE AND THE SYMBOL
THE NATURAL IMAGINARY
FREUDIAN DUALISM

Yesterday evening's meeting marked a definite step forward in comparison with the first session, since we maintained the dialogue better and for longer.[1]

I have some evidence as to the comings and goings which this elicits in each person's subjectivity – Will I make an intervention? – Won't I make an intervention? – I didn't make an intervention – etc.

Surely you must have realised, if only by the way I conduct them, that these sessions are not analogous to so-called scientific meetings. It is in this sense that I ask you to take careful note of the following, that in these open sessions, you aren't by any means on display, despite the fact that we have outside guests, sympathisers and others. You musn't try to say elegant things, aimed at putting you in the limelight and increasing the esteem in which you are already held. You are here to be receptive to things you haven't as yet seen, and which are in principle unexpected. So, why not make the most of this opportunity by raising questions at the deepest level you can, even if that comes out in a way which is a bit hesitant, vague, even baroque.

In other words, the only criticism I have to make of you, if I may, is that you all want to appear too clever. Everybody knows you are. So why do you want to appear as such? And, in any case, what is so important, either about being or appearing to be so?

That said, those who weren't able to vent their spleen, or the opposite, yesterday, are asked to do so now, since the whole point of those meetings is what comes out of them.

Already Anzieu is volunteering. I would be grateful if he says what he has to say.

[1] On 30 November 1954, Claude Lévi-Strauss gave a lecture to the Société Française de Psychanaiyse, entitled 'Kinship versus the family'.

Anzieu's question is not reproduced here.

Durandin seemed to say that the violence of the prohibition of incest was something measurable, being translated into clearcut social acts. That isn't true. In order to discover the Oedipus complex, it was first necessary to examine neurotics, so as then to move to a much wider circle of individuals. That is why I said that the Oedipus complex, with the intensity of fantasy that we have discovered it to possess, the importance and the presence that it has on the imaginary level for the subject we are dealing with, must be conceived of as a recent, terminal and not original, phenomenon, in comparison with what Lévi-Strauss is telling us about.

But how can you attach such importance, my dear Anzieu, to the fact that Lévi-Strauss includes words like compensation in his vocabulary, when speaking, for example, of Tibetan or Nepalese tribes in which little girls are killed, which has as its consequence that there are more men than women? The term compensation in this case has only a statistical value, without any relation to the analytic term.

We are obliged to concede to Lévi-Strauss that numerical elements have a role in the constitution of a collectivity. M. de Buffon made some very apt remarks on this subject. What is troublesome is that when it comes to the monkey ladder, as you put your feet on one rung, you forget the steps below – or you let them rot. In consequence one always has only a strictly limited field to which the whole of the conception applies. But it would be wrong not to take in Buffon's extremely apt remarks on the role played by statistical elements in a group, in a society.

There's a lot in these remarks, since they deprive all kinds of pseudo-finalist questions of their relevance. There are questions which one doesn't need to ask oneself, because they are dispelled all by themselves as a consequence of the spatial distribution of numbers. Those sorts of problems still exist, and are studied at those demographical levels to which Lévi-Strauss made a vague reference.

Buffon asked himself why bees make such pretty hexagons.[2] He noticed that no other polyhedron fills a surface in so practical and pretty a manner. It is a kind of pressure on the occupation of space which requires that they be hexagons, and one doesn't have to create sophisticated problems of the type – do bees know geometry?

You can see the meaning which the word compensation might have in that case – if there are less women, there will necessarily be more men.

But your mistake goes even deeper when you speak of finality, when you believe that Lévi-Strauss confers a soul on the society when he speaks of the traffic from one family to another. There would be a lot to say about the usage even of the term finality, of its relations with causality, and intellectual rigour requires one to accord it some attention, if only to note that finality is always implied, in a variously embryonic form, in every causal notion – except when one expressly opposes causal thought to the finalist conception. For causal thought, finality doesn't exist, but the fact that one must emphasize that is sufficient proof that the notion is difficult to deal with.

What is original in Lévi-Strauss's notion of the elementary structure?

Throughout he emphasizes the fact that nothing is understood about the facts now collected for some considerable time concerning kinship and the family, if one tries to deduce them from any natural or naturalising dynamic. Incest as such doesn't elicit any natural feeling of horror. I don't say that we can base our work on this fact, all I'm saying is that this is what Lévi-Strauss says. There is no biological reason, and in particular no genetic one, to account for exogamy, and he demonstrates that with an extremely precise discussion of the scientific data. In a society – and we can imagine societies other than human societies – the permanent and constant practice of endogamy would not only not have any disadvantages, but would after a certain time have the result of eliminating the alleged hereditary defects. There is no possible means, starting from the natural plane, of deducing the formation of this elementary structure called the preferential order.

And what does he base this on? On the fact that, in the human order, we are dealing with the complete emergence of a new function, encompassing the whole order in its entirety. The symbolic function is not new as a function, it has its beginnings elsewhere than in the human order, but they are only beginnings. The human order is characterised by the fact that the symbolic function intervenes at every moment and at every stage of its existence.

In other words, the whole thing holds together. In order to conceive what happens in the domain proper to the human order, we must start with the idea that this order constitutes a totality. In the symbolic order the totality is called a universe. The symbolic order from the first takes on its universal character.

It isn't constituted bit by bit. As soon as the symbol arrives, there is a universe of symbols. The question one might ask – how many symbols, numerically, does it take to constitute the symbolic universe – remains open. But however small the number of symbols which you might conceive of as constituting the emergence of the symbolic function as such in human life, they imply the totality of everything which is human. Everything is ordered in accordance with the symbols which have emerged, in accordance with the symbols once they have appeared.

Everything which is human has to be ordained within a universe constituted by the symbolic function. It's not for nothing that Lévi-Strauss calls his structures elementary – he doesn't say primitive. Elementary is the opposite of complex. And, oddly enough, he hasn't written The Complex Structures of Kinship

yet. We are the representers of complex structures, and they are characterised by being much more amorphous.

DR BARGUES: Lévi-Strauss has spoken of complex structures.

Of course. He alludes to them, he indicates the points of insertion, but he hasn't discussed them.

In elementary structures, the rules of alliance are part of an extraordinarily rich, luxuriant network of preferences and prohibitions, of indications, of commands, of facilitations, and cover a much larger field than the complex forms. The closer we get, not to the origin, but to the element, the more the structuration, the amplitude, the intricacy of the specifically symbolic structure of nomenclature imposes itself. The nomenclature of kinship and alliance is more comprehensive in the elementary forms than in the so-called complex forms, that is to say those forms elaborated in cultural cycles of far greater extension.

This is one of Lévi-Strauss's fundamental points, one which shows the fertility of his thinking in this book. On this basis, we can formulate the hypothesis that this symbolic order, since it always presents itself as a whole, as forming a universe all by itself – and even constituting the universe as such, as distinct from the world – must also be structured as a whole, that is to say, it forms a dialectic structure which holds together, which is complete.

Some systems of kinship are more viable than others. Some lead to impasses which are properly speaking arithmetical and which presuppose that from time to time crises occur within the society, bringing with them ruptures and new beginnings.

On the basis of these arithmetical studies – understanding arithmetical not only as the manipulation of collections of objects, but also as including the significance of these combinatory operations, which exceeds any sort of given which might be deduced experimentally from the living relation of the subject to the world – Lévi-Strauss demonstrates that there is a correct classification of what the elementary structures of kinship make available to us. This presupposes that the symbolic agencies function in the society from the start, from the moment it takes on a human appearance. But this is nothing more nor less than what is presupposed by the unconscious such as we discover and manipulate it in analysis.

This is exactly where there was some uncertainty yesterday evening in Lévi-Strauss's answer to my question. For, in truth, in a manoeuvre often found in people who produce new ideas, a kind of hesitation to sustain all of their sharp edge, he almost returns back to the psychological level. The question which I put to him in no way implied a collective unconscious, as he called it. What solution could seriously be expected from the word 'collective' in this instance, when the collective and the individual are strictly the same thing? No, it isn't a matter of positing a communal soul somewhere, in which all these calculations would take place, it isn't a question of any psychological entification, it is a question of the symbolic function. The symbolic function has absolutely nothing to do with a para-animal formation, a totality which would make of the whole of humanity a kind of large animal – for in the end, that's what the collective unconscious is.

If the symbolic function functions, we are inside it. And I would even say – we are so far into it that we can't get out of it. A large part of the problems which confront us when we try to scientificate, that is to say to bring order to a certain number of phenomena, first in line being those of life, in the end it is always the paths of the symbolic function which lead us, much more than any sort of direct apprehension.

Thus, when it comes down to it, we always try to explain the living organism in terms of mechanism. The first question which we analysts must answer, and which can perhaps help us get away from the controversy which exists between vitalism and mechanism, is the following – why are we led to think of life in terms of mechanism? In what way actually are we, as men, parents of the machine?

M. HYPPOLITE: In so far as we are mathematicians, in so far as we have a passion for mathematics.

That's right. The philosophical criticisms made of strictly mechanistic research assume the machine to be deprived of freedom. It would be very easy to prove to you that the machine is much freer than the animal. The animal is a jammed machine. It's a machine with certain parameters that are no longer capable of variation. And why? Because the external environment determines the animal, and turns it into a fixed type. It is in as much as, compared to the animal, we are machines, that is to say something decomposed, that we possess greater freedom, in the sense in which freedom means the multiplicity of possible choices. This is a way of looking at it which is never highlighted.

M. HYPPOLITE: Hasn't the word machine fundamentally and sociologically changed its meaning, from its origins up to cybernetics?

I agree with you. I am in the process, for the first time, of trying to inculcate in my listeners the idea that the machine is not what a vain people think it is. The meaning of the machine is in the process of complete transformation, for us all, whether or not you have opened a book on cybernetics. You're behind the times, it's always like that.

People in the eighteenth century, the ones who introduced the idea of mechanism – an idea which it is in good taste to pour scorn on today, a notion of small machines quite removed from life, a superseded notion, so you believe – people like La Mettrie, whom I can't encourage you enough to read, those people who lived that, who wrote L'Homme-Machine, you can't imagine the extent to which they were still all caught up in the categories of an earlier age, which truly dominated their thinking. One must read the thirty-five volumes of the Encyclopédie des Arts et des Techniques from end to end, which sets the tone for the period, to become aware of the extent to which scholastic notions dominated what they were trying, not without an effort, to introduce. These attempts at reduction based on the machine, at the functionalisation of the phenomena which occur on the human level, were very far ahead of the complications which held good in their mental functioning when they took up any common or garden theme.

Look up the word amour, the word amour-propre in the Encyclopédie – you'll see how far removed their human feelings were from what they were trying to construct in the way of knowledge of man.

It is only much later, in our thinking or that of our fathers, that mechanism took on its full, purified, naked meaning, a meaning exclusive of all other interpretative systems. That is an observation which allows us to grasp what it means to be a precursor. What it isn't, which would be completely impossible, is the anticipation of the categories which emerge later and which haven't yet been created – human beings are always immersed in the same cultural network as their contemporaries, and the ideas they have can only be theirs as well. Being a precursor means seeing what it is one's contemporaries are constituting in the way of ideas, of consciousness, of action, of techniques, of political forms, seeing them as they will be seen a century later. Yes, that can happen.

There is a mutation taking place in the function of the machine, which is leaving all those who are still bent on criticising the old mechanism miles behind. To be a little ahead means realising that this has as its consequences the complete reversal of all the classical objections raised to the use of purely mechanistic categories. I think I'll have the opportunity to demonstrate this to you this year.

Has anyone still got a question to ask?

O. MANNONI: What interested me was the manner in which Lévi-Strauss addressed the problem of nature and culture. He said that for some time now, the opposition between nature and culture has no longer been visible. The work that was being done continued to look for nature somewhere on the side of affectivity, of impulsions, of the natural foundation of being. Now, what brought Lévi-Strauss to set himself the question of nature and culture was that it seemed to him that a certain form of incest, for instance, was both universal and contingent. And this type of contradiction brought him to a kind of conventionalism which has baffled a good number of listeners. I made the following observation – it is troubling to find this problem of the contingent and the universal elsewhere than in the institutional world. Right-handedness is a universal form, and yet it is contingent – we could be left-handed. And no one has ever been able to prove that it was social or biological. There is something profoundly obscure for us here, which is of the same kind as that in Lévi-Strauss. To go further, and show that the obscurity is really very serious, one can note that in molluscs of the helical variety, which are clearly not institutional, there is also a universal coiling round which is contingent, since they could be coiled the other way, and some individuals in fact are coiled the other way. It seems therefore that the question raised by Lévi-Strauss is much larger than the classical opposition of the natural and the institutional. It isn't surprising, therefore, if he also tries to feel which is his natural and which his institutional side, as every one did yesterday. That seems extremely important to me – we are confronted by something which dissolves both the old idea of nature and that of the institution.

M. HYPPOLITE: That would be a universal contingency.

O. MANNONI: I don't know.

I think you are bringing in things which perhaps were not implied by the notion of contingency that Lévi-Strauss invoked. I think that for him contingency was opposed to the idea of the necessary – in fact, he said as much. The question he posed, which we might well in the end think naive, concerns the distinction between the universal and the necessary. Which also ends up raising the question of what we could call the necessity of mathematics. It is quite clear that it warrants a special definition, and that is why I talked just now about the universe. With respect to the introduction of the symbolic system, I think that the answer to the question raised by Lévi-Strauss yesterday, is that the Oedipus complex is both universal and contingent, because it is uniquely and purely symbolic.

M. HYPPOLITE: I don't think so.

The contingency now suggested by Mannoni belongs to a completely different order. The value of the distinction between nature and culture which Lévi-Strauss introduces in his Elementary Structures of Kinship is that it allows us to distinguish the universal from the generic. There's absolutely no need for the symbolic universal to be spread over the entire surface of the world for it to be universal. Besides, as far as I know, there's nothing which entails the world unity of human beings. There's nothing which is concretely realised as universal. And yet, as soon as any symbolic system is formed, straightaway it is, de jure, a universal as such. The fact that men have, with some exceptions, two arms, two legs and a pair of eyes – which in any case they have in common with animals – the fact that they are, as someone once put it, featherless bipeds, plucked chickens, all of that is generic, categorically not universal.[3] You bring in your helix coiled one way or the other. The question you are asking pertains to the natural type.

O. MANNONI: That is what I am putting into question. Up until now, men have opposed to nature a pseudo-nature, the human institutions – one encounters the family in the same way one encounters the oak or the birch. And then they decided that these pseudo-natures were a result of human liberty or of the contingent choices of man. And in consequence they were led to attach the greatest importance to a new category, culture, opposed to nature. Studying these questions, Lévi-Strauss ends up no longer knowing which is nature, which is culture, precisely because one encounters problems of choosing, not only in the universe of nomenclatures, but in the universe of forms. From the symbolism of the nomenclature to the symbolism of the whole form, nature speaks. It speaks by coiling to the right or to the left, by being right- or left-handed. It is her own way of making contingent choices such as families or arabesques. At this point, it is true, I find myself at a watershed and I no longer know which way to go. I wanted to share my difficulty. I don't have a solution, just a difficulty.

M. HYPPOLITE: It seems to me that earlier on you quite rightly opposed the universal to the generic, by saying that universality was tied to symbolism itself, to the modality of the symbolic universe created by man. But then it is a pure form. Your term universality at bottom means that a human universe necessarily affects the form of universality, it attracts a totality which is universalised.

That is the function of the symbol.

M. HYPPOLITE: Does that answer the question? It only shows us the formal character which a human universe acquires.

There are two senses of the word formal. When one speaks of mathematical formalisation, we are dealing with a set of conventions from which you can generate a whole series of consequences, of theorems which follow on from one another, and establish certain structural relations, a law, in the strict sense of law, within a set. In the gestaltist sense of the word, in contrast, form, the good form,[4] is a totality, but it is actualised and isolated.

M. HYPPOLITE: Is this second sense yours, or the first?

Unquestionably the first.

M. HYPPOLITE: Nonetheless, you did speak of totality, so this symbolic universe is purely conventional. It affects the form in that sense in which one speaks of universal [3] See Aristotle, Posterior Analytics II 5, 92a 1–5.

[4] The corresponding German term within Gestalt psychology is usually rendered into English as 'good shape'. Occasionally in this Seminar, this is the translation given, but more often 'la bonne forme' is translated as 'good form'.

form, without, for all that, it being generic or even general. I wonder if you aren't giving a formal solution to the problem raised by Mannoni.

Mannoni's question has two sides.

First there is the problem he raises, which is stated in the form signatura rerum – do things themselves possess, naturally, a specifically asymmetrical character? There is something real, a given. This given is structured in a specific manner. In particular natural asymmetries exist. Within the present line of development of our understanding, are we going to get to the bottom of their mysterious meaning? One whole human tradition, known as the philosophy of nature, busied itself with this kind of reading. We know what that yields. It never gets very far. It leads to completely ineffable things, which moreover soon peter out – except if one wants to carry on regardless, ending up with what is commonly called a delirium. This is certainly not the case with Mannoni, whose mind is too sharp, too dialectical, not to raise such a question save in the form of a problem.

The second thing is knowing if this wasn't the point Lévi-Strauss was getting at when he told us yesterday evening that, after all, he found himself, at the edge of nature, prey to vertigo, asking himself whether the roots of the symbolic tree weren't to be rediscovered in her. Private conversations I've had with Lévi-Strauss allow me to enlighten you on this point.

Lévi-Strauss is in the midst of backtracking as regards the very sharp bipartition which he makes between nature and symbol, whose creative value he nonetheless well appreciates, because it is a method which allows him to distinguish between registers, and by the same token between orders of facts. He wavers, for a reason which may seem surprising to you, but which he has made quite explicit – he is afraid that the autonomy of the symbolic register will give rise to a masked transcendentalism once again, for which, as regards his affinities, his personal sensibility, he feels only fear and aversion. In other words, he is afraid that after we have shown God out of one door, we will bring him back in by the other. He doesn't want the symbol, even in the extraordinarily purified form in which he offers us it, to be only a re-apparition, under a mask, of God.

That is what lies at the base of the wavering which he showed signs of when he put into question the methodical separation of the symbolic from the natural plane.

M. HYPPOLITE: It isn't any the less true that to call on the symbolic universe does not even resolve the question of the choices man has made.

Certainly not.

M. HYPPOLITE: There is no doubt that what we used to call institutions, implying a certain number of contingent choices, enter into the symbolic universe. But, having said this, it doesn't give us the explanation for these choices.

It isn't a question of explanation.

M. HYPPOLITE: But we are nonetheless confronted with a problem.

It is precisely the problem of origins.

M. HYPPOLITE: I don't deny that the mark of a systematic universality has been imprinted by the symbolic relation. But this guise itself requires explanation and leads us to the problem which Mannoni raised. I would like to address a criticism to you. How does the use of the word symbolic help us? What does it give us? That's the question. I don't doubt that it is useful. In what way does it contribute? And what does it contribute?

I use it to give an account of the analytic experience. You were able to see that last year, when I showed you that it is impossible to bring the diverse aspects of the transference together correctly, if one doesn't start with a definition of speech, of the creative function, of full speech. In the analytic experience, we encounter it under different aspects – psychological, personal, interpersonal – it occurs in an imperfect, refracted, diversified way. Without a radical stand on the function of speech, transference is purely and simply inconceivable. Inconceivable in the true sense of the word – there is no concept of transference, nothing but a multiplicity of facts tied together by a vague and inconsistent bond.

Next time I will introduce the question of the ego in the following form: Relations between the function of the ego and the pleasure principle.

I think I can show that in order to gain an idea of the function which Freud designates by the word 'ego', as indeed to read the whole of the Freudian metapsychology, it is necessary to use this distinction of planes and relations expressed in the terms, the symbolic, the imaginary and the real.

What's the point? The point is to retain the meaning of a particularly pure symbolic experience, that of analysis. I will give you an example of it, by giving you a foretaste of what I will tell you regarding the ego.

In its most essential aspect, the ego is an imaginary function. That is a discovery yielded by experience, and not a category which I might almost qualify as a priori, like that of the symbolic. On account of this point, I would almost say on account of this point alone, we find in human experience a door opened out on to an element of typicality. Of course, to us this element appears on the surface of nature, but in a form which is always misleading. That is what I wanted to insist on when I spoke of the failure of the various philosophies of nature. It is also very misleading with respect to the imaginary function of the ego. But this is a deception to which we are committed up to the hilt. In as much as we are the ego, not only do we experience it, but it is just as much a guide to our experience as the different registers that have been called guides in life, that is, sensations.

The fundamental, central structure of our experience really belongs to the imaginary order. And we can even grasp the extent to which this function is already different in man from what it is in nature as a whole.

We rediscover the imaginary function in nature in a thousand different forms – all the Gestaltist captations linked up to the parade, so essential to sustaining sexual attraction within the species.

Now, in man the function of the ego possesses distinct characteristics. That's the great discovery of analysis – at the level of the generic relation, bound up with the life of the species, man already functions differently. In man, there's already a crack, a profound perturbation of the regulation of life. That's the importance of the notion introduced by Freud of the death instinct. Not that the death instinct is such an enlightening notion in itself. What has to be comprehended is that he was forced to introduce it so as to remind us of a salient fact of his experience, just when it was beginning to get lost.

As I observed a little while ago, when an apperception of the structure is ahead of its time, there is always a moment of weakness when one is inclined to abandon it.

That is what happened in the circle around Freud when the meaning of the discovery of the unconscious was pushed into the background. They reverted to a confused, unitary, naturalistic conception of man, of the ego, and by the same token of the instincts. It was precisely in order to regain the sense of his experience that Freud wrote Beyond the Pleasure Principle. I will show you what necessity led him to write those last paragraphs, of whose fate at the hands of the majority of the analytic community you are well aware. It is said they are incomprehensible. And even when one does show willingness to follow Freud, mouthing the death instinct, one doesn't understand it any more than the Dominicans, so prettily riddled by Pascal in Les Provinciales, had a clue about sufficient grace. I ask all of you to read this extraordinary text of Freud's, unbelievably ambiguous, almost confused, to read it several times, otherwise you won't understand the literal critique I am going to make of it.

The final paragraphs have quite literally remained a closed book, refusing to speak. As yet they have never been elucidated. They can only be understood if one understands what Freud's experience amounted to. He wanted to save some kind of dualism at all costs, just when this dualism was crumbling in his hands, and when the ego, the libido, etc., all of that was tending to produce a kind of vast whole, returning us to a philosophy of nature.

This dualism is none other than what I am getting at when I emphasize the autonomy of the symbolic. Freud never formulated that. To get you to understand it, a critique and exegesis of his text will be necessary. I can't now take for granted precisely what has to be proven this year. But I believe that I can show you that the category of symbolic action is well-founded.

M. HYPPOLITE: I wasn't denying that. The symbolic function is for you, if I understand it correctly, a transcendental function, in the sense that, quite simultaneously, we can neither remain in it, nor can we get out of it. What purpose does it serve? We cannot do without it, and yet we cannot inhabit it either.

Of course. It is presence in absence and absence in presence.

M. HYPPOLITE: I wanted to understand what there was to be understood.

If you want to stick by what you are giving me now, on the phenomenological plane, I have no objection. Only I believe it is insufficient.

M. HYPPOLITE: Doubtless. I believe so too.

And, to be candid, being purely phenomenological doesn't get us very far.

M. HYPPOLITE: I agree.

That can only obscure the path we have to follow, by setting in advance the tone which it will retain from then on. Does the use I make of the symbolic register just lead one into locating your transcendence somewhere, a transcendence which, after all, surely must exist? Is that what it is about? I don't think so. The allusions I have made to a completely different use of the notion of machine might well indicate that.

M. HYPPOLITE: My questions were only questions. I was asking you what enabled you to avoid answering Mannoni's question by saying that there was nothing to reply to, or at least that one would get side-tracked in answering it.

I said that I don't think that that is the meaning one has in mind in saying that Claude Lévi-Strauss is going back to nature.

M. HYPPOLITE: . . . refuses to go back to her.

I also said that we have, of course, to take the formal side of nature into account, in the sense in which I qualified it as possessing pseudo-significant symmetry, because that is what man embraces in order to produce his fundamental symbols. The important thing is what gives the forms of nature symbolic value and function, what makes them function in relation to one another. It is man who introduces the notion of asymmetry. Asymmetry in nature is neither symmetrical, nor asymmetrical – it is what it is.

Next time I wanted to tell you about the following – the Ego as function and as symbol. That is where the ambiguity is played out. The ego, the imaginary function, intervenes in psychic life only as symbol. One makes use of the ego in the same way as the Bororo does the parrot. The Bororo says I am a parrot, we say I am me [moi]. None of that has the slightest importance. The important thing is the function it has.

O. MANNONI: After Lévi-Strauss one has the impression that we can no longer use the notions of culture and nature. He destroys them. The same is true for the ideal of adaptation we talk about all the time. Being adapted simply means being alive.

There's something to that. It pertains to the same order as what I was implying just now by saying that at a given point in time Freud wanted to defend some sort of dualism at all costs. As a result of the rapid evolution of the theory and technique of analysis, Freud found himself faced with a drop in tension analogous to that which you discern in the mind of Lévi-Strauss. But, in his case, it may not be his last word.

A materialist definition of the phenomenon of consciousness

EXPERIENCE AND DESTINY

'THE CORE OF OUR BEING'

THE EGO IS AN OBJECT

FASCINATION, RIVALRY, RECOGNITION

Indem er alles schaft, was schaftet der Höchste? – Sich.
Was schaft er aber vor er alles schaftet? – Mich.

We are going to encounter this distich of Daniel von Chepko's again later on, if I manage to take you where I want to today.

The laws governing this kind of teaching in themselves contain a reflection of its meaning. Here I do not pretend to anything more than to get you to read Freud's works. I do not pretend to replace that, if you won't commit yourselves to it. You must realise that the form which I try to give here to the Freudian teaching will only take on its meaning and its full importance for you if you refer to the texts, so as to bring the insights I give you to bear on the difficulties you'll find in them.

Indeed, these texts are sometimes difficult, borrowing from a problematic weave of questions which manifests itself in contradictions. These contradictions are organised contradictions, but for all that they remain contradictions, and not just antinomies. Sometimes Freud, by following his own path, ends up with positions which seem contradictory even to him, and he reconsiders some of them – which, for all that, doesn't mean that he didn't think them justified at the time. In short, this movement of Freud's thought, which never reached journey's end, which was never cast into a definitive, dogmatic form, is what you must learn to comprehend for yourselves. It is to ease this comprehension that I try here to impart to you what I have myself gained from my reading of Freud's works, informed by an experience which, at least in principle, was directed in accordance with them. I say at least in principle, since here I continually put into question whether that thought has always been clearly understood, or even rigorously kept to in the development of analytic technique.

I am teaching you that Freud discovered in man the substance and the axis of a subjectivity surpassing the individual organisation considered as the sum of individual experiences, and even considered as the line of individual development. I am giving you a possible definition of subjectivity, by formulating it as an organised system of symbols, aiming to cover the whole of an experience, to animate it, to give it its meaning. And what are we trying to realise here, if not a subjectivity? The directions indicated, the doors opened for you here into our experience and our practice are intended to inspire you to extend them into concrete action.

In this teaching, as in an analysis, we have to deal with resistances.

The resistances always have their seat in the ego, so analysis teaches us. What corresponds to the ego, is what I sometimes call the sum of the prejudices which any knowledge comprises and which each of us has as individual baggage. It is something which includes what we know or think we know – for knowing is always in some way believing one knows.

On account of that fact, when you are shown a new perspective, in a manner which is decentred in relation to your experience, there's always a shift, whereby you try to recover your balance, the habitual centre of your point of view – a sign of what I am explaining to you, which is called resistance. What you should do, on the contrary, is open your minds to the notions being generated by another domain of experience, and turn it to your own profit.

Let us take an example. Claude Lévi-Strauss the other day opened up for us a perspective which implies the radical relativisation of familial reality, which should provide us with the occasion for revising what can for us be too fascinating, too absorbing, the reality which we have to deal with everyday. So, how did one of our longstanding companions choose to express himself on the subject? After all, he said, rather than worry ourselves about the conventionalism of the familial system, let us remind ourselves that in the family, there are not just the parents, there are also children. From the point of view of the child, the reality of the family is restored. What we analysts have to deal with, is the relation of the child to the parents. That is what stops us from getting lost in this extremely disorienting relativism.

To restore the family in this manner to the concrete reality of the child's experience certainly has far-reaching implications: locating the centre of the analytic experience in the fact that each individual is a child. But this intervention itself testified to this intellectual tendency to centre our analytic experience on individual, psychological experience.

What one shouldn't do, and I will illustrate this using what we encountered, no later than on the morrow, in the so-called supervision group.

A subject did in fact dream of a child, of a babe in arms in its primitive state of impotence, lying on its back, like a little up-turned turtle, flapping its four limbs about. He dreamt of this child, an isolated image. Straight off, for specific reasons, I felt obliged to say to the person who was reporting this dream to me – This child is the subject, there is no doubt about it.

Another dream was brought to me, confirming this imagery as representing the subject. The dreamer himself is swimming in a sea which has very special characteristics – let us say, going straight to the associations, the imaginary and verbal context, that it is so constituted as to be at the same time the analyst's couch, the cushions in the analyst's car and, of course, the mother. On this sea are written numbers which clearly refer to the birth date and the age of the subject.

What is the backdrop to this dream? The subject is extremely preoccupied with a child who is about to be born, for whom he feels responsible, and for whom he fantasises, it seems, an imaginary paternity. This crucial situation appears in such an ambiguous way that it cannot but occur to one to think that the subject must have deep motives for fantasising this, for reality does not cast light on the matter. In fact, in a kind of sub-delirious anxiety regarding his responsibilities as the progenitor, the subject reproduces a question which is essential to him, that is – is he himself a legitimate child, yes or no?

It is only because, to some degree or other, the analyst has already put to him – This story is really about you – that the subject comes up with this dream. And what underlies the dream is – Aren't I, after all, your child, you the analyst?

You can see that what this throws into relief isn't, as is usually believed, the concrete, affective dependency of the child in relation to supposedly more or less parental adults. If the subject asks himself the question what kind of child he is, it isn't in terms of being more or less dependent, but as having been recognised or not, having or not having the right to bear his name as the child of so-and-so. It is in as much as the relations in which he is caught up are themselves brought to the level of symbolism, that the subject questions himself about himself. For him, when it occurs it is as a problem of the second degree, on the plane of the symbolic assumption of his destiny, in the register of his auto-biography.

I wouldn't say that, in the analytic dialogue, everything always takes place at this level, but what you must get straight is that this is the essentially analytic level. A great many children fantasise about having another family, about being the children of people other than those who take care of them. I would say that it is a typical, normal phase in the development of the child, bringing all kinds of offspring into the world, and which cannot be neglected even outside the analytic experience.

So then – and this is what I've been leading up to – what is the analysis of resistances?

It doesn't mean, as one tends, if not to formulate it – and it is formulated, I could give you lots of examples – then at least to practice it, it doesn't mean intervening with the subject so that he becomes aware of the manner in which his attachments, his prejudices, the equilibrium of his ego, prevent him from seeing. It doesn't mean persuading him, which leads pretty quickly to suggestion. It doesn't mean reinforcing, as they say, the ego of the subject, or to make an ally of its healthy part. It doesn't mean convincing. What it means is, at every instant of the analytic relation, knowing at what level the answer should be pitched. Sometimes this answer may have to be pitched at the level of the ego. But that has nothing to do with the case I'm considering. The subject's question in no way refers to what might ensue from weaning, abandonment, vital lack of love or affection, or whatever, it concerns his history in as much as he fails to recognise [méconnaît] it, and that is what his entire behaviour really does express in spite of himself, in so far as he tries obscurely to recognise it. His life is oriented according to a problematic which isn't that of his actual experience, but that of his destiny, namely – what does his history signify?

Speech is mother to the misrecognised [méconnue] part of the subject, and that is the level peculiar to the analytic symptom – a level decentred in relation to individual experience, since it is that of the historical text which integrates it. From then on, what is certain is that the symptom will only give in to an intervention interceding at this decentred level. What will fail is any intervention inspired by a prefabricated reconstruction, one forged out of our notion of the normal development of the individual, and aiming at his normalisation – here is what he was lacking, here is what he must learn to submit to by way of frustration, for instance. What is at issue is knowing if the symptom is resolved in one register or in the other, there is no middle way.

The matter is nevertheless problematic in as much as the inter-ego dialogue cannot but include some reverberations, perhaps, why not – psychotherapeutic ones. Some kind of psychotherapy has always been practised, although no one knew quite what it was, and it has always involved the function of speech. What is at issue is determining whether, in analysis, this function of speech exerts its impact by substituting the authority of the analyst for the ego of the subject, or whether it is subjective. The order created by Freud demonstrates that the axial reality of the subject isn't in his ego. Intervening by substituting oneself for the ego of the subject, which is what is always done in one way of practising the analysis of resistances, is suggestion, not analysis.

The symptom, whatever it may be, isn't properly resolved when the analysis is practised without putting at the top of the agenda the question of ascertaining where the action of the analyst must be directed to, what point on the subject, if I can put it like that, he must aim at.

I'm going step by step. In the course of recent months, years even, I think I have sufficiently emphasized that the unconscious is the unknown subject of the ego, that it is misrecognised [méconnu] by the ego, which is der Kern unseres Wesens, Freud writes in the chapter of the Traumdeutung on the dream-processes, with which I have asked you to get acquainted – when Freud discusses the primary process, he means something having an ontological meaning, which he calls the core of our being.[1]

[1] (1900a) GW II/III 609; Stud II 572–3; SE V 603. The German word Kern is translated into English either as 'nucleus' (for instance, in the final chapter of Freud's Studies on Hysteria, in the phrase 'pathogenic nucleus', translated into French as 'noyau pathogène', and rendered in Sem I as 'pathogenic nucleus') or, as in this passage, by 'core'. Occasionally 'kernel' may be found.

The core of our being does not coincide with the ego. That is the point of the analytic experience, and it is around this that our experience is organised, and around this that these strata of knowledge which are now being taught have been deposited. But do you think that we should be content with that, and say – the I of the unconscious subject is not me [moi]? That is not good enough, because nothing, for those of you who think spontaneously, if one can say that, implies the inverse. And normally you start thinking that this I is the real ego. You think that the ego is nothing but an incomplete, erroneous form of this I. In this way, you have accomplished the decentring essential to the Freudian discovery, but you have immediately reduced it. An experiment well known to oculists demonstrates the same diplopia. Put two images very close to one another, so that they are almost overlapping – thanks to a certain cross-eyedness, sometimes they make up a single one, if they are brought close enough together. Similarly, you force the ego back into this I discovered by Freud – you restore the unity.

That is what happened in analysis the day when realising that – for a reason which will have to be elucidated in retrospect – the first fruitfulness of the analytic discovery was being exhausted in the practice, people reverted to what is referred to as the analysis of the ego, claiming to find in it the exact inverse of what has to be demonstrated to the subject. Because one had already reached the level of the puzzle, of demonstration. People thought that by analysing the ego, one would find the reverse-side of whatever it was that had to be made comprehensible. In that way a reduction of the kind I just mentioned was effected – two different images into a single one.

There's no doubt that the real I is not the ego. But that isn't enough, for one can always fall into thinking that the ego is only a mistake of the I, a partial point of view, the mere becoming aware of which would be sufficient to broaden the perspective, sufficient for the reality which has to be reached in the analytic experience to reveal itself. What's important is the inverse, which must always be borne in mind – the ego isn't the I, isn't a mistake, in the sense in which classical doctrine makes of it a partial truth. It is something else – a particular object within the experience of the subject. Literally, the ego is an object – an object which fills a certain function which we here call the imaginary function.

This thesis is absolutely essential to technique. I defy you not to extract this conception from the reading of the post-1920 metapsychological texts. Freud's research on the second topography was undertaken in order to put back in its place an ego which had begun to slide back to its old position. Whereas, through an effort at mental accommodation, one was falling back into the essential element of the classical illusion – I do not say error, it is quite strictly an illusion. Everything Freud wrote aimed at reestablishing the exact perspective of the excentricity of the subject in relation to the ego.

I claim that this is the essential, and that everything must be organised in relation to it. Why? I will show you my cards starting with the a, b, c, even starting at the level of what is called, or what one falsely takes to be, the evidence.

Your evidence, the evidence of the psychological experience which is your own, is determined by a confusion of the concepts of which you know nothing. We live amongst concepts far more than we think. Its mode of reflection is essential to the manner in which the being of a certain cultural era gains a sense of itself, and by the same token conceives itself.

However, the elevated, highly elaborated character of the phenomenon of consciousness is conceded as a postulate by us all, each and everyone of us, in this year of 1954, and I am certain that there isn't a single one of us who isn't in the end convinced that, however partial the apprehension of consciousness, hence of the ego, may be, even so that is where our existence is given. We think that the unity of the ego is, if not explored, then at least apprehended in this fact of consciousness.

On the contrary, what the analytic experience highlights and what Freud doesn't know what to do with, like a fish with a fig, are the illusions of consciousness.

In his Project of 1895, Freud does not manage, even though it is easy, to locate precisely the phenomenon of consciousness in his already elaborated schema of the psychic apparatus. Much later, in the metapsychology, when he tries to explain the different pathological forms – dream, delirium, mental confusion, hallucinations – through investments of systems, he repeatedly finds himself confronted with a paradox when it is a matter of making the system of consciousness function, and he tells himself that it must have some special laws. The system of consciousness does not enter into his theory. Freud's psycho-physical conception of the investments of the intra-organic systems is extremely ingenious at explaining what takes place in the individual. However hypothetical it may be, what we have since acquired in the way of experience concerning the diffusion and distribution of nervous input rather goes to show the validity of Freud's biological construction. But for consciousness it doesn't work.

You are going to tell me – it proves that Freud was confused. We will consider the issue from another angle.

What gives consciousness its seemingly primordial character? The philosopher does indeed seem to start with an indisputable given when he takes as his starting point the transparency of consciousness to itself. If there is consciousness of something it cannot be, we are told, that this consciousness does not itself grasp itself as such. Nothing can be experienced without the subject being able to be aware of himself within this experience in a kind of immediate reflection.

On this topic, doubtless, philosophers have taken a few steps forward since Descartes's decisive step. The question has been raised, and remains open, of knowing whether the I is immediately grasped in the field of consciousness. But one could already say of Descartes that he had differentiated the thetic consciousness from the non-thetic consciousness.

I won't go any deeper into the metaphysical investigation of the problem of consciousness. I am going to propose to you, not a working hypothesis – I claim that it isn't a hypothesis – but a way of being rid of it, of cutting the Gordian knot. For there are problems which one must resign oneself to abandon without having resolved.

Once again, we're dealing with a mirror.

What is the image in the mirror? The rays which return on to the mirror make us locate in an imaginary space the object which moreover is somewhere in reality. The real object isn't the object that you see in the mirror. So here there's a phenomenon of consciousness as such. That at any rate is what I would like you to accept, so that I can tell you a little apologue to aid your reflection.

Suppose all men to have disappeared from the world. I say men on account of the high value which you attribute to consciousness. That is already enough to raise the question – What is left in the mirror? But let us take it to the point of supposing that all living beings have disappeared. There are only waterfalls and springs left – lightning and thunder too. The image in the mirror, the image in the lake – do they still exist?

It is quite obvious that they still exist. For one very simple reason – at the high point of civilization we have attained, which far surpasses our illusions about consciousness, we have manufactured instruments which, without in any way being audacious, we can imagine to be sufficiently complicated to develop films themselves, put them away into little boxes, and store them in the fridge. Despite all living beings having disappeared, the camera can nonetheless record the image of the mountain in the lake, or that of the Café de Flore crumbling away in total solitude.[2]

Doubtless philosophers will have all kinds of cunning objections to make to me. But nevertheless I ask you to continue to listen to my apologue.

At this point the men return. It is an arbitrary act of Malebranche's God – since it is he who sustains us in every moment of our existence, there is no reason why he couldn't have obliterated us and a few centuries later put us back into circulation.

[2] The Café de Flore, on the Boulevard St Germain in Paris, was a favourite haunt of writers, artists and intellectuals, and later on of the existentialists, from the Second Empire on.

Perhaps men would have to learn everything anew, and especially how to read an image. It doesn't matter. What is certain is that – as soon as they saw on the film the image of the mountain, they would also see its reflection in the lake. They would also see the movements which took place on the mountain, and those of the image. We can take things further. If the machine were more complicated, a photo-electric cell focused on the image in the lake could cause an explosion – it is always necessary, for something to seem efficacious, for an explosion to take place somewhere – and another machine could record the echo or collect the energy of this explosion.

So then! this is what I want you to consider as being essentially a phenomenon of consciousness, which won't have been perceived by any ego, which won't have been reflected upon in any ego-like experience – any kind of ego and of consciousness of ego being absent at the time.

You'll tell me – Just a minute though! The ego is somewhere, it's in the camera. No, there's not a shadow of ego in the camera. But, on the other hand, I am quite happy to admit that there is an I in it – not in the camera – up to something in it.

I am explaining to you that it is in as much as he is committed to a play of symbols, to a symbolic world, that man is a decentred subject. Well, it is with this same play, this same world, that the machine is built. The most complicated machines are made only with words.

Speech is first and foremost that object of exchange whereby we are recognised, and because you have said the password, we don't break each other's necks, etc. That is how the circulation of speech begins, and it swells to the point of constituting the world of the symbol which makes algebraic calculations possible. The machine is the structure detached from the activity of the subject. The symbolic world is the world of the machine.

Then we have the question as to what, in this world, constitutes the being of the subject.

Some people get very worried when they see me referring to God. However it is a God we conceive of ex machina, unless we extract machina ex Deo.

The machine makes for the continuity, thanks to which the men who were absent for a while will have the recording of what, in the interim, took place in the way of phenomena of consciousness properly speaking. And there, I can speak of phenomena of consciousness without reifying any kind of cosmic soul, nor any presence in nature. For at the point we have got to, maybe because we are sufficiently committed to the manufacture of the machine, we've gone beyond confusing symbolic intersubjectivity with cosmic intersubjectivity. At least, I hope so.

I've not knocked this apologue together in order to develop a hypothesis, but as an act of salubrity. Just to start raising the question as to what the ego is requires one to detach oneself from what we might call the religious conception of consciousness. Implicitly, modern man thinks that everything which has happened in the universe since its origin came about so as to converge on this thing which thinks, creation of life, unique, precious being, pinnacle of creation, which is himself, with this privileged vantage-point called consciousness.

This perspective leads to an anthropomorphism which is so deluded that one has to start by shedding the scales from one's eyes, so as to realise what kind of illusion one has fallen prey to. This is a newcomer for humanity, this idiocy of scientistic atheism. Since within science one denies anything that could be considered as a recourse to the supreme Being, one ends up with vertigo, taking refuge elsewhere – to end up doing the very same thing, prostrating oneself. Here, there is nothing left to understand, everything is explained – consciousness has to appear, the world, history converge on this marvel, contemporary man, you and me, us men in the street.

The purely sentimental, in truth incoherent atheism of scientistic thought is pushed on the rebound into making consciousness the high-point of all phenomena. It strives as much as it can – just as one turns too absolute a king into a constitutional one – to make it clear that this consciousness is the masterpiece of masterpieces, the explanation for everything, perfection. But these epiphenomena are useless. When one deals with phenomena, one always acts as if one didn't take them into account.

This very precaution of not taking them into account underlines the fact that if you don't destroy its importance, you will become a cretin – you won't be able to think of anything else. I won't go on about the contradictory and hazardous varieties of aversions, of prejudices, of so-called inclinations for introducing forces, or vitalist entities, as they are called etc. But when one speaks in embryology of the formative force taking effect in the embryo, right away one assumes that since there is an organising centre there can be only one consciousness. Consciousness, eyes, ears – so then there is a little demon inside the embryo. So one no longer tries to organise what is apparent in the phenomenon, since one thinks that everything which is superior implies consciousness. However we do know that consciousness is linked to something entirely contingent, just as contingent as the surface of a lake in an uninhabited world – the existence of our eyes or of our ears.

To be sure, there is something unthinkable about this, an impasse in which all kinds of things come together, which seem to be organised in a contradictory manner in the mind. Common sense has reacted against them with a number of taboos. These are premises. Behaviourism says – As for us, we're going to observe total behaviour, we're not going to pay any attention to consciousness. But we know full well that this putting of consciousness into brackets wasn't that fruitful.

Consciousness isn't the monster one makes it out to be. Excluding it, chaining it up, doesn't bring any real benefits. Moreover, it has been said for some time now that behaviourism, under the alias of molar-behaviourism, has reintroduced it on the sly. Following Freud, they have learned to make use of the notion of the field. Without that, the little progress behaviourism has been able to make hinges around the fact that it was agreed to observe a series of phenomena at their own particular level – at the level, for instance, of behaviour taken as a whole, considered in an object constituted as such – without worrying too much what their elementary instruments, inferior or superior, were. It isn't any the less the case that in the very notion of behaviour there is a certain castration of human reality. Not because it doesn't take into account the notion of consciousness, which, in fact, is of absolutely no use to anyone, neither to those who use it, nor to those who don't – but because it eliminates the intersubjective relation, which is the foundation not only of behaviour, but of actions and of passions. That has nothing to do with consciousness.

I hope you'll consider – for a certain time, during this introduction – consciousness to occur each time – and it occurs in the most unexpected and disparate places – there's a surface such that it can produce what is called an image. That is a materialist definition.

An image – that means the effects of energy starting from a given point of the real – think of them as being like light, since that is what most clearly evokes an image in our mind – are reflected at some point on a surface, come to strike the corresponding same point in space. The surface of a lake might just as well be replaced by the area striata of the occipital lobe, for the area striata with its fibrillary layers is exactly like a mirror. In the same way as you don't need the entire surface of a mirror – if that actually means anything – for you to be aware of the content of a field or a room, in the same way as you obtain the same result by using a tiny little bit, so any small portion of the area striata can be put to the same use, and behaves like a mirror. All sorts of things in the world behave like mirrors. All that's needed is that the conditions be such that to one point of a reality there should correspond an effect at another point, that a bi-univocal correspondence occurs between two points in real space.

I say in real space – I'm going too fast. There are two cases – either the effects occur in real space, or else they occur in imaginary space. Earlier on I showed what happens in a point in imaginary space, in order to unsettle your habitual conceptions. In this way you can realise that everything which is imaginary, everything which is properly speaking illusory, isn't for all that subjective.

There are illusions that are perfectly objective, objectifiable, and it isn't necessary to make the whole of our distinguished company disappear for you to understand that.

What about the ego, in this perspective? The ego really is an object. The ego, which you allegedly perceive within the field of clear consciousness as being the unity of the latter, is precisely what the immediacy of sensation is in tension with. This unity isn't at all homogenous with what happens at the surface of the field, which is neutral. Consciousness as a physical phenomenon is precisely what engenders this tension.

The entire dialectic which I have given you as an example under the name of the mirror stage is based on the relation between, on the one hand, a certain level of tendencies which are experienced – let us say, for the moment, at a certain point in life – as disconnected, discordant, in pieces – and there's always something of that that remains – and on the other hand, a unity with which it is merged and paired. It is in this unity that the subject for the first time knows himself as a unity, but as an alienated, virtual unity. It does not partake in the characteristics of inertia of the phenomenon of consciousness under its primitive form, on the contrary, it has a vital, or anti-vital, relation with the subject.

It seems that this experience is a privileged one for man. Perhaps there is, after all, something of the kind in other animal species. That isn't a crucial issue for us. Let us not feign any hypotheses. This dialectic is found in experience at every level of structuration of the human ego, and that is enough for us.

So that you gain a firm grasp on this dialectic, I would like to give you a representation of it in an image whose outline you have not yet had time to wear down, since I haven't given you it yet, that of the blind man and the paralytic.[3]

Subjectivity on the level of the ego is comparable to this couple, which was introduced by the imagery of the fifteenth century – no doubt not without reason – in a particularly emphatic manner. The subjective half of the pre-mirror experience is the paralytic, who cannot move about by himself except in an uncoordinated and clumsy way. What masters him is the image of the ego, which is blind, and which carries him. Contrary to all appearances, and this is where the entire problem of the dialectic lies, it isn't, as Plato thinks, the master who rides the horse, that is, the slave, it's the other way round. And the paralytic, whose perspective this is, can only identify with his unity in a fascinated fashion, in the fundamental immobility whereby he finishes up corresponding to the gaze he is under, the blind gaze.

There's another image, that of the snake and the bird, fascinated by the gaze. Fascination is absolutely essential to the phenomenon of the constitution of the ego. The uncoordinated, incoherent diversity of the primitive fragmentation gains its unity in so far as it is fascinated. Reflection is also fascination, jamming. I will show you this function of fascination, of terror even, under Freud's pen, precisely in discussing the constitution of the ego.

A third image. If machines could embody what's at stake in this dialectic, I would offer you the following model.

[3] See Freud (1905c) GW VI 34; Stud IV 36; SE VIII 34.

Take one of these small turtles or foxes, which we have known how to make for some time, and which are the playthings of the scientists of our time – automata have always played a very great role, and they are playing a revived role in our time – one of those small machines which we now know, thanks to all kinds of intermediary organs, how to furnish with homeostasis and something like desires. Let us suppose that this machine is constituted in such a way that it is incomplete, and will jam, will only be definitively structured as a mechanism once it perceives – by whatever means, a photo-electric cell, for instance, with relays – another machine identical to itself, with the sole difference being that it would have already perfected its unity through what we may call a prior experience – a machine can have experience. The movement of each machine is thus conditioned by the perception of a certain stage attained by another. That is what corresponds to the element of fascination.

You see, by the same token, how a circle can be set up. As long as the unity of the first machine hangs on that of the other, as long as the other gives it the model and even the form of its unity, whatever it is that the first is oriented towards will always depend on what the other is oriented towards.

What will result from this is nothing less than the situation of impasse which is that of the constitution of the human object. The latter, in fact, hangs entirely on this dialectic of jealousy-sympathy, expressed precisely in traditional psychology by the incompatibility of consciousnesses. This doesn't mean that one consciousness cannot conceive another, but that an ego which hangs completely on the unity of another ego is strictly incompatible with it on the plane of desire. An apprehended, desired object, it's either he or I who will get it, it has to be one or the other. And when the other gets it it's because it belongs to me.

This rivalry, which is constitutive of knowledge in the pure state, is obviously a virtual stage. There is no such thing as knowledge in the pure state, for the strict community of ego and other in desiring the object initiates something completely different, namely recognition.

Recognition obviously presupposes a third thing. For the first machine which is jammed on the image of the second to be able to come to an agreement, for them not to be forced to destroy themselves on account of the convergence of their desire – which in fact is the same desire, since at this level they are one and the same being – it would be necessary for the little machine to inform the other, to say to it – I desire that. That's impossible. Admitting that there is an I would immediately turn it into you desire that. I desire that means – You, the other, who is my unity, you desire that.

It may be thought that here we have rediscovered that essential form of the human message whereby one receives one's own message from the other in an inverted form. Don't believe that for one moment. What I am telling you now is purely mythical. The first machine has no means of saying anything whatsoever, for it is prior to unity, it is immediate desire, it has no speech, it is no one. It is no more anyone than the reflection of the mountain in the lake is. The paralytic is aphonic, he has nothing to say. For something to become established, it would require the presence of a third, placed inside the machine, the first one, for instance, pronouncing an I. But this is quite unthinkable at this level of experience.

However, this third party is what we find in the unconscious. But that's it, it is in the unconscious – there where it must be located for the ballet of all the little machines to get going, namely above them, in this elsewhere in which, as Claude Lévi-Strauss told us the other day, the system of exchanges is to be found, the elementary structures. It is necessary for the symbolic system to intervene in the system conditioned by the image of the ego so that an exchange can take place, something which isn't knowledge [connaissance], but recognition [reconnaissance].

That shows you that the ego can in no way be anything other than an imaginary function, even if at a certain level it determines the structuration of the subject. It is as ambiguous as the object itself, of which it is in some way, not only a stage, but the identical correlate.

The subject sets itself up as operating, as human, as I, from the moment the symbolic system appears. And this moment cannot be deduced from any model of the order of individual structuration. To put it another way, for the human subject to appear, it would be necessary for the machine, in the information it gives, to take account of itself, as one unity amongst others. That is precisely the one thing it cannot do. To be capable of taking itself into account, it would have to be something more than the machine it in fact is, because one can do anything, except get a machine to include itself as an element in a calculation.

Next time, I will talk about things from a less arid angle. The ego isn't just a function. From the moment when the symbolic system is instituted, it can itself be used as a symbol, and that is what we are considering.

As we want the ego to be the subject, as we unify it as function and as symbol, today we have had to busy ourselves divesting it of its fascinating symbolic status, which makes us believe in it. Next time we will restore this status to it, and we will see the strict relevance all this has for our practice.

IDOLATRY

SELF-COUNTING OF THE SUBJECT

HETEROTOPIA OF CONSCIOUSNESS

THE ANALYSIS OF THE EGO ISN'T THE ANALYSIS OF THE UNCONSCIOUS INSIDE OUT

If I wanted to find an image for whatever it is we are investigating here, I would begin by rejoicing in the fact that given the accessibility of Freud's work I do not find myself forced, save by some unexpected intervention of the deity, to go and seek them on some Sinai, in other words to leave you by yourselves too soon. In actual fact, what we always see being reproduced in the most tightly argued parts of Freud's text is something which, while it isn't quite the adoration of the Golden Calf, is still an idolatry. What I am trying to do here is tear you away from it once and for all. I hope that I will do enough so that one day your tendency to use highly imagistic formulations will disappear.

In his presentation yesterday evening, our dear Leclaire did not quite prostrate himself before the calf, but there was a bit of that in it. You all felt it, the tenor of some of his terms of reference is of that order. The need to give an image certainly has its merits in scientific presentation no less than in other domains – but maybe not as much as one thinks. And nowhere does it offer more traps than in the domain we find ourselves in, which is that of subjectivity. When one speaks of subjectivity, the problem is not to turn the subject into an entity.

I think that, with the aim of making his constructions hold up – and it is indeed this aim which accounts for the fact that he presented his model to us as a pyramid, firmly seated on its bottom, and not on its tip – Leclaire made the subject into some sort of idol. There was no other way he could do it than represent it for us.

This remark comes up at the right moment in the course of our demonstration here, which is centred on the question – What is the subject? – raised both by a naive understanding and by the scientific, or philosophical, formulation of the subject.

Let us take up the discussion at the point where I left you last time, that is at the moment when the subject grasps his unity.

The body in pieces finds its unity in the image of the other, which is its own anticipated image – a dual situation in which a polar, but non-symmetical relation, is sketched out. This asymmetry already tells us that the theory of the ego in psychoanalysis has nothing in common with the learned conception of the ego, which on the contrary partakes of a kind of naive understanding which I told you was peculiar to the historically datable psychology of modern man.

I brought you up short at the moment when I was showing you that this subject, really, is no one.

The subject is no one. It is decomposed, in pieces. And it is jammed, sucked in by the image, the deceiving and realised image, of the other, or equally by its own specular image. That is where it finds its unity. Laying hold of a reference taken from the most modern of these mechanistic problems, which have such importance in the development of science and of thought, I'll show you this stage of development of the subject by using a model whose utility is that it doesn't in any way idolise the subject.

At the point where I left you, the subject was nowhere. We had our two little mechanical tortoises, one of which was stuck on the image of the other. We were in effect supposing that, through a regulative part of its mechanism – the photoelectric cell, for instance, but let's leave that, I'm not here to tell you about cybernetics, even an imaginary variety – the first machine was dependent on the image of the second, hanging on its unitary functioning, and consequently captivated by its procedures. Hence a circle, which can be vast, but whose essential set-up is given by this imaginary dual relation.

I showed you the consequences of this circle regarding desire. Let us be clear – what could the desire of a machine be, except to restock on energy sources? A machine can scarcely do anything other than feed itself, and that is indeed what Grey Walter's courageous little animals do. Machines which reproduce themselves have yet to be built, and have yet even to be conceived of – the schema of their symbolic has not even been established. The sole object of desire which we can presume of a machine is therefore its source of nourishment. Well then, if each machine is intent on the point to which the other is going, somewhere there will necessarily be a collision.

That is where we had got to.

Now let us suppose our machines to have some sound recording equipment, and let us suppose that a loud voice – we can easily imagine that someone supervises their operation, the legislator – intervenes so as to regulate the ballet which up until now was only a round which might lead to a disastrous end. What's being introduced is a symbolic regulation, of which the unconscious mathematical subjacency of the exchanges of the elementary structures gives us the schema. The comparison ends there, for we aren't going to make an entity of the legislator – that would be yet another idol.

DR LECLAIRE: I'm sorry, but I'd like to reply. If I have a tendency to idolise the subject, it's because I think it necessary – you can't do otherwise.

Well, then, you are a little idolator. I come down from Sinai and break the Tables of the Law.

DR LECLAIRE: Let me finish. I have the impression that in refusing this deliberate entification, the subject, we have a tendency, and you have a tendency, to carry this idolisation over to another point. At that moment, it won't be the subject, it will be the other, the image, the mirror.

I realise this. You aren't the only one. You and your transcendental preoccupations lead you to a specifically substantialist idea of the unconscious. Others have an idealist conception, in the sense of critical idealism, but they also think that I reintroduce what I am chasing away. There is more than one person here whose formation is in, let us say, traditional philosophy, and for whom consciousness's awareness of itself is one of the pillars of his conception of the world. That is doubtless something which shouldn't be treated lightly, and last time I did warn you that I was taking the step of cutting the Gordian knot, by deliberately being partial and radically neglecting one entire point of view. Someone here, whose identity I have no need to disclose, said to me after my last lecture – This consciousness, it seems to me that after having badly maltreated it you bring it back in with this voice which reintroduces order, and which regulates the ballet of the machines.

Our deduction of the subject however demands that we locate this voice somewhere in the interhuman game. To say that it is the legislator's voice would doubtless be an idolification, albeit of a high, though characterised, order. Isn't it rather the voice Which knows itself when it resounds/No longer to be no one's voice/But that of the waves and the woods?[1]

It's language Valéry is speaking of here. And shouldn't we perhaps in the end recognise it, this voice, as the voice of no one.

That is why I undertook to tell you last time that we are led to require that it be the machine which speaks commandingly. And, moving on a bit faster, as happens sometimes at the end of a discourse when I am forced both to tie it up and initiate its resumption, I said the following – suppose that the machine could take itself into account [se compter elle-même]. In fact, for the mathematical combinations which control object exchange to function, in the sense in which I defined them earlier, it is necessary that in the combinatory each of the machines be able to count itself.

What do I mean by that?

When does the individual in his subjective function take himself into account – if not in the unconscious? One of the most obvious phenomena discovered by the Freudian experience is exactly that.

Think of that very strange game Freud mentions at the end of The Psychopathology of Everyday Life, which consists in inviting the subject to say numbers at random.[2] The associations which then come to him bring to light significations which reverberate so neatly with his remembrance, his destiny, that, from the point of view of probabilities, what he chose goes well beyond anything we might expect from pure chance.

If philosophers warn me against the materialisation of the phenomenon of consciousness, which would make us lose a precious handhold when it comes to grasping the radical originality of the subject – this is in a world structured à la Kant, even à la Hegel, for Hegel did not abandon the central function of consciousness, although he does allow us to free ourselves from it – for my part, I would warn philosophers against an illusion which has some affinity with what is highlighted by this extraordinarily significant, amusing, period-piece of a test, called the Binet and Simon.

The plan is to detect the mental age of a subject – a mental age which in fact isn't that changeable – by putting absurd sentences to him, amongst which there's this one – I have three brothers, Paul, Ernest and me. There certainly is an illusion of this order in believing that the fact that the subject takes himself into account is an operation of consciousness, an operation attached to an intuition of a consciousness transparent to itself. Besides, the model of it is not unequivocal, and not all philosophers have described it in the same way.

I don't presume to criticise the way in which Descartes does it, because the dialectic is there governed by an aim, the demonstration of the existence of God, in such a way that in the end, it is in arbitrarily isolating the cogito that one gives it a fundamental existential value. However, it wouldn't be difficult to show that, from the existentialist point of view, the grasp of consciousness by itself, at the limit, loses its moorings in any kind of existential apprehension of the ego. The ego only figures in it as a particular experience, tied to objectifiable conditions, within the limits of the inspection that is believed simply enough to be this reflection of consciousness on itself. And the phenomenon of consciousness has no privileged character in such an apprehension.

The issue is how to free our notion of consciousness of any mortgage as regards the subject's apprehension of itself. It is a phenomenon which is, I wouldn't say contingent in relation to our deduction of the subject, but heterotopic, and that is why I gave myself and you the pleasure of showing you a model of it in the physical world itself. Invariably you'll see consciousness appear with very great irregularity in subjective phenomena. In the reversal of perspective which analysis imposes, its presence always appears tied to conditions which are more physical, material, than psychic.

Thus, doesn't the register of consciousness enter into the phenomenon of the dream? A dream is conscious. This imaginary iridescence, these moving images, this is something which belongs entirely to the same order as that illusory aspect of the image on which we insist in relation to the formation of the ego. The dream is very much akin to reading in the mirror, a most ancient means of divination, which can also be used in the technique of hypnosis. In becoming fascinated by a mirror, and preferably by a mirror as it has always been since the beginning of humanity until a relatively recent period, more obscure than clear, mirror of burnished metal, the subject may succeed in revealing to himself many of the elements of his imaginary fixations. Well then, where does that leave consciousness? In what direction to look for it, to locate it? In more than one passage in his work, Freud puts the problem in terms of psychic tension, and attempts to find out by what mechanisms the system of consciousness is invested or disinvested. His speculation – see the Project and the Metapsychology[3] – leads him to consider that there is a discursive necessity for holding the system of consciousness to be excluded from the dynamic of the systems of the psyche. The problem remains unresolved for him, and he leaves to the future the task of giving to this matter a clarity which eludes him. He evidently ends up in an impasse.

So we are thus confronted with the necessity of a third pole, which is exactly what our friend Leclaire was trying to argue yesterday evening with his triangular schema.

We do indeed need a triangle. But there are a thousand ways of acting on a triangle. It isn't necessarily a solid figure resting on an intuition. It is just as much a system of relations. In mathematics, we only really begin to deal with the triangle, for instance, once none of its sides is privileged.

So here we are, in search of the subject in so far as it takes itself into account. The question is to know where it is. That it is in the unconscious, at least so far as we analysts are concerned, is the point which I believe I've led you to and which I am now reaching myself.

[3] Métapsychologie is the French title of a collection of articles which includes Freud (1912g) and the papers published in SE XIV under the title Metapsychology; it does not include The Ego and the Id, Beyond the Pleasure Principle, etc.

M. LEFÈBVRE-PONTALIS: Just a word, since I think I recognise myself as the anonymous interlocutor who drew your attention to the fact that you were only conjuring consciousness away at the beginning to find it again all the more at the end. I never said that the cogito was an untouchable truth, and that one could define the subject by this experience of complete transparency of self to itself. I never said that consciousness entirely exhausted subjectivity, which would in any event be rather difficult given phenomenology and psychoanalysis, but simply that the cogito represented a sort of model of subjectivity, that is to say rendered quite apparent the idea that there must be somebody for whom the word like has a meaning. And that, you appeared to omit. For when you went into your apologue about the disappearance of men, you forgot one thing, which is that men had to return in order to grasp the relation between the reflection and the thing reflected. Otherwise, if one considers the object in itself and the film recorded by the camera, it is nothing other than an object. It isn't a witness, it's nothing. Similarly, in the example you proposed of so-called random numbers, for the subject to realise that these numbers which he said at random are really not as random as all that, requires that there be a phenomenon, which we can call whatever you like, but which seems to me in fact to be this consciousness. It isn't just the reflection of what the other said to him. I really can't see why it is so important to demolish consciousness if it is to bring it back in at the end.

It's not the demolition of consciousness that's important – we aren't here to produce great crashings of glass. What's important is the extreme difficulty the analytic experience has in giving the system of consciousness a formulation within the order which Freud calls the energetic reference, to locate it in the interplay of different psychic systems.

The central object of our study this year is the ego. This ego is to be stripped of the privilege which it receives from a certain kind of evidence, concerning which I try to underline for you in a thousand different ways that it is only a historical contingency. The place which it has taken up in philosophical deduction is one of the clearest manifestations of that. The notion of the ego today draws its self-evidential character from a certain prestige given to consciousness in so far as it is a unique, individual, irreducible experience. The intuition of the ego retains, in so far as it is centred on the experience of consciousness, a captivating character, which one must rid oneself of in order to accede to our conception of the subject. I try to lead you away from its attraction with the aim of allowing you to grasp at last where, according to Freud, the reality of the subject is. In the unconscious, excluded from the system of the ego, the subject speaks.

The question is – is there an equivalence to be found between these two systems, the system of the ego – about which Freud at one point went so far as to say that it was the only organised thing in the psyche – and the system of the unconscious? Is there opposition like that of a yes and a no, of a reversal, of a pure and simple negation? Doubtless the ego makes a great many things known to us by means of the Verneinung. Why, while we are at it, couldn't we simply go on to read the unconscious by changing the sign of everything that is said? We haven't got to that point yet, but something analogous has been done.

Freud's introduction of his new topography has been understood as a return to the good old ego – texts by some of the best analysts attest to that, including Anna Freud's Defence Mechanisms, written ten years later. There was a true liberation, an explosion of joy – Ah, it's back, we can busy ourselves with it again, not only do we have the right to, but it is recommended. That is how Miss Freud expresses herself in the Defence Mechanisms. It must be said that being concerned with something other than the ego was felt by analysts, so strange an experience was it to them, like a defence against being concerned with the ego.

Obviously Freud always talked about the ego. And this function always greatly interested him, as external to the subject. In the analysis of resistances do we have the equivalent of what we call the analysis of material? Is working on the procedures of the ego, or exploring the unconscious, of the same order? Are the two systems complementary? Are they the same with a change of sign, just about? Are the unconscious and what thwarts its revelation, are they like the inside out and the right side up? If that is the case, then it is legitimate to speak, as one analyst, Sandor Rado, has dared to, of unconscious egology.

I am alluding to his very pretty article, in the Psychoanalytic Quarterly, Volume VIII, which places the rid principle[4] in the foreground, as the essential king-pin of this egology. This is a principle new to analytic theory, and you will rediscover it again under a thousand different guises, because this is in reality the one which at present directs the activity of most analysts. To rid[4] means to free oneself of something, to rid of,[4] to avoid. This new principle is meant to govern every manifestation of the subject, from top to bottom. It presides over the most elementary processes of stimulus-response – the frog gets rid of a little bit of acid which you've put on its leg by means of a reflex, the spinal character of which can easily be shown by cutting off its noddle – as it does over the reactions of the ego. It goes without saying that references to consciousness are completely abandoned, and it is only for heuristic purposes that I have proceeded as I have. That is an extremist position, particularly useful because it makes explicit in a coherent manner ideas which are usually hidden. Now, if Freud does have something to say when he introduces his new topography, it is precisely the opposite. The point for him is to remind us of the fact that not only is there an absolute dissymmetry between the subject of the unconscious and the organisation of the ego, but also a radical difference.

Please read Freud. You are going to have three weeks. And while worshipping the Golden Calf, keep a small book of the law in your hand, read Beyond the Pleasure Principle with the introduction I am giving you as a small key. You'll see that either it makes not the least bit of sense or it has exactly the sense I say it has.

From when we started up to the present, Freud says, we took as a principle that the psychic apparatus, in so far as it is organised, is to be placed between the pleasure principle and the reality principle. Freud, of course, in his thinking isn't inclined to idolification. It never occurred to him that there wasn't a pleasure principle in the reality principle. For if you follow reality, it is only because the reality principle is a delayed-action pleasure principle. Conversely, if the pleasure principle exists, it is in conformity to some reality – this reality is psychic reality.

If the psyche has any meaning, if there is a reality which is called psychic reality, or, in other words, if living beings exist, it is in so far as there is an internal organisation which up to a certain point tends to oppose the free and unlimited passage of forces and discharges of energy, such as we may assume to exist, in a purely theoretical way, intercrossing in the inanimate reality. There is a closed precinct, within which a certain equilibrium is maintained, through the action of a mechanism which we now call homeostasis, which absorbs, moderates the irruption of quantities of energy coming from the external world.

Let us call this regulation the restitutive function of the psychic organisation. At a very elementary level, the frog's leg gives us an idea of it. Not only is there discharge, but withdrawal – which testifies to the still very primitive functioning of a principle of restitution, of equilibration of the machine.

Freud doesn't have the term homeostasis. he uses that of inertia, and that is an echo of Fechnerism. Do you know that there are two sides to Fechner? On one side, he is the psycho-physicist, asserting that only the principles of physics can allow one to symbolise psychic processes. But there is another side of Fechner, which few people know, which is quite unique. He goes a long way down the path of universal subjectivisation, and would no doubt have given a realist reading of my little apologue the other day, which was very far from being my intention. I wasn't telling you that the reflection of the mountain in the lake was a dream of the cosmos, but you would be able to find that in Fechner.

Discharge and return to the position of equilibrium – this law of regulation is valid for both systems, says Freud. But by the same token he is led to ask himself – what is the relation between these two systems? Is it simply that what is pleasure in the one is unpleasure in the other, and vice versa? If the two systems were the inverse of one another, one should be able to arrive at a general law of equilibrium, and on that account, there would be an analysis of the ego which would be the analysis of the unconscious inside out. That, put in a theoretical way, is the problem I put to you earlier.

This is where Freud realises that something doesn't satisfy the pleasure principle. He realises that what comes out of one of the systems – that of the unconscious – has a very particular insistence – that is the word I wanted to bring in. I say insistence because it expresses rather well, in a familiar way, the meaning of what has been translated into French as automatisme de répétition, Wiederholungszwang [compulsion to repeat]. The word automatisme has resonances for us of the complete ascendancy of neurology. That isn't how it should be understood. What it is is a compulsion to repeat [compulsion à la répétition], and that is why I think I am making it concrete by introducing the notion of insistence.

This system has something disturbing about it. It is dissymmetrical. It doesn't quite fit. Something in it eludes the system of equations and the evidence borrowed from the forms of thought of the register of energetics as they were introduced in the middle of the nineteenth century.

Yesterday evening, Professor Lagache brought out for you, a bit quickly, Condillac's statue. I cannot recommend the rereading of the Traité des Sensations too highly. Firstly, because it is an absolutely delightful read, with an inimitable period style. In it, you will see that my primitive state of a subject to be found everywhere, and which in some sense is the visual image, has some sort of ancestry. In Condillac, the scent of the rose seems a very solid starting-point, out of which the entire psychic edifice has to be drawn, without any apparent difficulty, like a rabbit from a hat.

The jumps in his reasoning give us cause for consternation, but that wasn't the case for his contemporaries – Condillac wasn't deluded. Why, it must be asked, doesn't he give an explicit formulation to the pleasure principle? Because, as M. de la Palice would reply,[5] he didn't have a formula for it, because he came before the steam engine. The era of the steam engine, its industrial exploitation, and administrative projects and balance-sheets, were needed, for us to ask the question – what does a machine yield?

For Condillac, as for others, more comes out than was put in. They were metaphysicians. Whatever one makes of it – my usual discourse isn't generally coloured by a progressivist tendency – one must admit that new things do emerge in the symbolic order. At some point it was realised that to draw the rabbit out of the hat you always have to have put it in beforehand. That is the principle of energetics, and that is why energetics is also a metaphysics.

It is the principle of homeostasis which obliges Freud to inscribe all his deductions in terms of investment, charge, discharge, energy relations between different systems. However, he realises that something doesn't work in all this. That's what Beyond the Pleasure Principle is about, no more no less.

At first, he picks up on a very local point, the well-known phenomenon of the repetition of dreams in cases of traumatic neuroses, which contravene the rule of the pleasure principle, in as much as for dreams it is embodied in the principle of the imaginary fulfilment of desire. Freud asks himself – Why on earth is there an exception in this particular case? But one sole exception can't put into question something as fundamental as the pleasure principle, which is the principle of regulation which enables one to inscribe the concrete functioning of man considered as a machine in a coherent system of symbolic formulations. This principle isn't deduced from his theory, it forms the basis of his thought in as much as in his time one thought in that particular register. So if you read this text, you will see that among the different exceptions he mentions, none seems to him quite sufficient to put the principle into question. But the exceptions, taken as a whole, seem to him to converge.

You were telling me earlier on that I would end up by getting ship-wrecked on a reef, and that somewhere we'll meet up with this subject, in the form of an idol. Are we playing hunt-the-slipper here? Anyway, that is what Freud is playing. For the very phenomenon on which analysis is based is the following – aiming at remembering, and whether we encounter it or not, we come upon the reproduction, in the guise of the transference, of something which manifestly belongs to the other system.

DR LECLAIRE: I would like to answer all at once, because I feel somewhat got at. I think that you are reproaching me a great deal for having pulled the rabbit out of the hat in which I had placed it. But really, I'm not so sure that it was me who put it there. I did pull it out, true, but it wasn't me who put it in. That is the first thing I had to say to you, but that's not all. The second is this. Regarding the subject of the unconscious, you have accused me of idolification; however, I said that I was representing it, even though to be rigorous, it, like Jehovah, should be neither represented, nor named. Nonetheless, I did represent it, knowing what I was doing. I have the feeling you carry this idolification over from one side to the other.

Dear Leclaire, it seems to me that many people here may not have felt that you were put on the line to the extent you feel you were. Of course, I acknowledge and indeed admire the fact that you did things as you say you did, knowing what you were doing. What you did last night was very much under control, you knew perfectly well what you were doing, you didn't do it innocently. That is greatly to your credit. Having said that, we are going to see whether what you are suggesting now is true. What you forewarned me would be a reef is more than avoidable – it's already avoided.

DR LECLAIRE: I simply have the feeling that this phenomenon of avoidance is reproduced every time we speak of the subject. Every time, it is a kind of reaction, when we speak of the subject.

What do you mean by avoidance?

DR LECLAIRE: Riddance,[6] just that.

Let us not get side-tracked here please. It isn't the same avoidance.

There is a restitutive function, which is that of the pleasure principle. But there is also a repetitive function. How do they fit together?

The subject may reproduce one experience indefinitely, some characteristics of which are discovered through remembering. Lord knows what difficulty you have in apprehending what satisfaction the subject gains from it. I already explained this to you some years back, in relation to the Wolfman. What is this insistence on the part of the subject to reproduce? Reproduce what? Is it in his behaviour? Is it in his fantasies? Is it in his character? Is it even in his ego? All kinds of things, from entirely different registers, can be used as material and as elements in this reproduction.

The reproduction in the transference within analysis is obviously only a particular case of a far more diffuse reproduction, which we take on in what is called character analysis, analysis of the total personality, and other nonsenses.

Freud asks himself what the inexhaustible nature of this reproduction means, from the point of view of the pleasure principle. Does it occur because of something unruly, or does it obey a different, more fundamental principle?

I leave the question open – what is the nature of the principle which governs what is at issue, namely the subject? Is it assimilable, reducible, symbolisable? Is it something? Or can it neither be named, nor grasped, but only structured?

This will be the theme of the lectures for our next term.

Freud, Hegel and the machine

THE DEATH INSTINCT
FREUD'S RATIONALISM
THE MASTER'S ALIENATION
PSYCHOANALYSIS IS NOT A HUMANISM
FREUD AND ENERGY

You have been spoilt. M. Hyppolite gave you something good yesterday evening. Now the question is to know what you are going to do with it.

Some of you may still have a mnemic trace of what I left you with at the end of our last talk, namely the Wiederholungszwang – which we will translate as compulsion de répétition [compulsion to repeat] rather than automatisme de répétition. This Zwang was singled out by Freud right from the start of his writings, the last to be made public, in the Project for a Scientific Psychology to which I frequently allude, an analysis and critique of which we must undertake here in the weeks to come.

What Freud then defined as the pleasure principle is a principle of constancy. There is another principle, which our theoretician-analysts are as nonplussed by as a fish by a fig, the Nirvana principle. It is remarkable to see how, in the writings of an author like Hartmann, the three terms – principle of constancy, pleasure principle, Nirvana principle – are totally identified, as if Freud had never shifted out of the one mental category with which he sought to put a construction on the facts, and as if it were always the same thing he was talking about. One wonders why all of a sudden he would have called the Nirvana principle the beyond of the pleasure principle.

At the beginning of Beyond, Freud gives us a representation of two systems, and shows us that what is pleasure in the one is translated into pain in the other, and conversely. Now, if there were symmetry, reciprocity, a perfect coupling up of the two systems, if the primary and secondary processes were in fact the converse of one another, they would simply become one, and it would be enough to work on one to work on the other at the same time. In working on the ego and resistance, one would by the same token get at the heart of the problem. Freud wrote Beyond the Pleasure Principle precisely to explain that the matter can't be left like that.

Indeed, the manifestation of the primary process at the level of the ego, in the form of a symptom, is translated into unpleasure, suffering, and yet, it always returns. This fact alone should give us pause for thought. Why does the repressed system manifest itself with such insistence, as I called it last time? If the nervous system is set to reach a position of equilibrium, why doesn't it attain it? These matters, when put like that, are so obvious.

But that's the point, Freud was a man who, once he had seen something – and he knew how to see, and be the first – would not lose sight of the cutting edge. And that is what makes for the prodigious value of his work. Of course, no sooner had he made a discovery than it would immediately be set upon by the work of gnawing away which always takes place around any kind of speculative novelty, and tends to make everything fit back into the routine. Just look at the first great original notion he contributed at the purely theoretical level, the libido, and the mark, the irreducible character he gives it by saying – libido is sexual. These days, in order to make ourselves understood, we would have to say that what Freud put forward is that the essential motor of human progress, the motor of the pathetic, of the conflictual, of the fruitful, of the creative in human life, is lust. And already, after only ten years, there was Jung ready to explain that libido is psychic interest. No, libido is sexual libido. When I speak of the libido, I am speaking of the sexual libido.

What everyone acknowledges as the turning-point in the technique of analysis, centring on resistance, was well-founded and proved its fertility, but it lent itself to a theoretical confusion – by working on the ego, it was thought that one was working on one of the two halves of the apparatus. At this point in time, Freud chose to remind us that the unconscious as such cannot be reached and makes itself known in a fashion which is paradoxical, painful, and cannot be reduced to the pleasure principle. He thus brings back into the foreground the essence of his discovery, which one tends to forget.

Have you read Beyond the Pleasure Principle? If one of you is willing to tell us what he read in that text, I will hand over to him.

O. MANNONI: I would very much like to ask for clarification on a point which troubles me a little. It seems, when reading Freud, that he maintains there are two aspects of the compulsion to repeat. In the one, it is a matter of renewing an attempt that has failed so as to make it succeed – this takes the form of protection against danger, against trauma. In the other, it seems that one reverts to a more comfortable position, because one has failed to attain the position which, from an evolutionary perspective, is posterior. I can't see how these two positions are finally made to agree, or at least I've missed the agreement, and I'm troubled by this difficulty.

There is, as Lefèbvre-Pontalis observed, an ambiguity in the use of the word Wiederholungszwang. There are two registers intermingling, interweaving, a restitutive tendency and a repetitive tendency, and between the two, I wouldn't want to say that Freud's thought vacillates, because there is no less vacillating thought than his, but one does have the feeling that his research retraces its steps. It is as if each time he goes too far in one direction, he stops to say – isn't this simply the restitutive tendency? But at each turn he remarks that that isn't enough, and that, after the restitutive tendency has manifested itself, something is left over which at the level of individual psychology appears to be gratuitous, paradoxical, enigmatic and is genuinely repetitive.

In effect, according to the hypothesis of the pleasure principle, the entire system should always return to its starting-point, should always act in a homeostatic way, as we say these days. How is it that there is something which, from whatever end we approach it, does not fit into the movement, into the framework of the pleasure principle? Each time, Freud tries to make the phenomena he's observed fit inside this framework, and experience again and again requires him to relinquish it. It is the most paradoxical facts which are the most instructive. And in the end, it is the solid fact of reproduction in the transference which forces on him the decision to admit the compulsion to repeat as such.

O. MANNONI: My question was aimed at clarifying the point – did the compulsion to repeat in the second sense oblige him to reshape the initial conception, or are they superimposed as distinct? I haven't quite made out if that made him return to the idea that there was a pure and simple restitution, or whether, on the contrary, he added to the pure and simple restitution, a compulsion now . . .

That is precisely why he was led straight to the function of the death instinct. There, he tips over the limit of the blueprint.

M. HYPPOLITE: Why does he call it death instinct? One gets the impression of something terribly enigmatic, one gets the impression that he cites heterogeneous phenomena which, quite simply, do not fit into the framework of the blueprint. What relation is there between the word death instinct and the phenomena beyond the pleasure principle? Why call it death instinct? This all of a sudden opens up perspectives some of which seem quite strange, such as the return to matter.

O. MANNONI: He would have been better off calling it anti-instinct.

M. HYPPOLITE: Once he calls it death-instinct, that leads him all of a sudden to discover other phenomena, to open up perspectives which had not been implied by what pushed him into baptising it death-instinct.

That's right.

M. HYPPOLITE: It is an extraordinary enigma, the return to matter, and a bit vague in my opinion. One has the impression that one is in the presence of a series of enigmas, and the very name he gives them, death instinct, is itself a leap in relation to the phenomena accounted for, an enormous leap.

M. BEJARANO: I have the same difficulty in understanding that leap. He seems to be saying that the life-preserving instincts lead to death, he says in effect that death is sought out by the preservative instincts. This seems to me to be as specious as saying, by transposition, that fire, that is to say heat, is cold. I can't understand why he calls that death instinct.

M. HYPPOLITE: Isn't it a somewhat woolly philosophy? He ends up by saying that the libido leads to the formation of groups which are more and more bound to one another, and organic, whereas the death instinct leads to a return to the elements.

That doesn't give one the feeling of being vague. One gets the impression, reading the text, that Freud is following what I call his little hunch.[1] There's something at work in him. And at the end, he himself admits the extremely speculative nature of the whole of his argumentation, or more precisely of his circular interrogation. He constantly returns to his starting points, and completes another circle, and again rediscovers the passage, and finally ends up making a leap, and having made the leap, admits that there is something there which does indeed move completely off the edges of the blueprint, and can in no way be grounded solely in a reference to experience. He asserts finally that if this articulation has seemed to him to be worth communicating, it is because he was of necessity brought down the path of this problematic.

M. HYPPOLITE: One gets the impression that, according to him, the two instincts, of life and of death, are but one in the unconscious, but what is worrisome is when the components are separated. There is something very beautiful, very striking, mixed up, in all this, just like a child who kisses you by scratching you – in fact he says it explicitly. It is true, there is in what we call human love a share of aggressivity, without which there would only be impotence, but which can go so far as killing the partner, and a share of libido, which would end in actual impotence if there weren't a share of aggressivity. If they work together, it makes for human love. But when they come apart, when one of the components functions alone, then the death instinct appears.

That is at the level of what we might call the immediate, to be found in the psychological experience of the individual, we might say, taking it a long way, so as to give an image to our thinking, at the level of the puppet. But Freud is interested in knowing what pulls the strings on the puppet. That is what he is talking about when he talks of death instinct or life instinct.

Which brings me back to the question which I thought I had to ask you following yesterday evening's discussion – is psychoanalysis a humanism? It's the same question as when I ask whether the autonomous[2] ego is in the spirit of the Freudian discovery. The question of knowing what is man's portion of autonomy is age-old and everyone's concern. What does Freud contribute to the topic? Is it a revolution or no? And by the same token there arises the third question I raised yesterday evening – what is there that's new, if we place them on the same register, in moving from Hegel to Freud?

M. HYPPOLITE: A lot is.

I certainly won't give you an exhaustive reply today, because we have some ground to cover, perhaps a long way to go. To start with I will simply try in my own way to locate the meaning of what just a moment ago I called Freud's little, or big, hunch, when there he is vacillating, wheeling around the function of the death instinct.

It is very surprising that laboratory scientists should still entertain this mirage, that it is the individual, the human subject – and why him amongst all the others? – who is truly autonomous, and that, somewhere in him, be it in the pineal gland or elsewhere, there's a signalman, the little man within a man, who makes the apparatus tick. That is exactly what the whole of analytic thought, with few exceptions, has returned to, for the moment.

People tell us about the autonomous ego, about the sane part of the ego, about the ego which must be strengthened, about the ego which isn't sufficiently strong to support us in doing an analysis, about the ego which should be the ally of the analyst, the ally of the analyst's ego, etc. You see these two egos, arm in arm, the analyst's ego and that of the subject, in fact subordinated to the other in this so-called alliance. Nothing in experience gives us the faintest hint of it, since precisely the contrary takes place – it is at the level of the ego that all the resistances occur. One really does wonder where they could start if not from this ego.

I don't have the time today to extract a few texts from my papers, but I will some day, and then I will cite recently published paragraphs, in which the idea is complacently set down, set down with the satisfaction of well-earned repose, that it is very simple, as simple as saying 'hallo', that there are some good things in this decent little subject, that there is a conflict-free sphere in which the libido is neutralised, delibidinised, in which aggressivity itself is deaggressivised. It's like Archimedes – you give him his little point outside of the world, and he can move it. But this little point outside the world doesn't exist.

One must have a clear sense of the scope of the question. Its scope is as broad as this – is psychoanalysis a humanism? – which puts into question one of the fundamental premises of classical thought, from a certain period in Greek history on. We are told that man is the measure of all things. But where is his own measure? Is it to be found in himself?

M. HYPPOLITE: Don't you think – this is almost an answer to your question, which I was led to reflect upon for some of the night, but which does chime in with what you are saying – that in Freud there is a deep conflict between a rationalist – by rationalist I mean someone who thinks that it is possible to render humanity rational, and this happens by way of the ego – and an entirely different man, absolutely detached from the curing of men, eager for a knowledge of an entirely different depth, who at every moment is opposed to this rationalist? In The Future of an Illusion Freud wonders what will happen when all illusions are gone. And there the ego, the reinforced ego, the human, acting, ego intervenes. One sees humanity freed. But in Freud there is a more profound aspect. Isn't the discovery of the death instinct tied to that deeper aspect which the rationalist does not express? There are two men in Freud. From time to time, I see the rationalist, and that is the humanist side – we will rid ourselves of all illusions, what will be left? Then there is the pure speculator, who is revealed on the side of the death instinct.

That is the adventure of Freud as creator. I don't at all think that, for him, there was a conflict there. One could maintain this if he had embodied the rationalist aspiration in a dream of rationalisation. However, as far as he was able to go, in The Future of an Illusion for instance, or in Civilisation and its Discontents, his dialogue with Einsteinian utopism, that of Einstein when he leaves his mathematical genius behind to find himself in the midst of platitudes . . .

M. HYPPOLITE: Freud's materialism has a certain grandeur.

Platitudes also have their grandeur. I don't think that was Freud's level.

M. HYPPOLITE: That is why I like him, because that wasn't his level. His is something far more enigmatic.

In Civilisation and its Discontents, he knows how to see where it resists. No matter how far one extends, I won't say rationalism, but rationalisation, it will necessarily blow up somewhere.

M. HYPPOLITE: That is what is most profound in Freud. But there's also the rationalist in him.

His thought deserves to be qualified, at the highest level, and in the firmest manner, as rationalist, in the full sense of the word, and from one end to the other. This text, so difficult to penetrate, around which we have been turning, makes present the most lively, the most pressing demands of a reason which never abdicates, which does not say – Here begins the opaque and the ineffable. He enters, and even at the risk of appearing lost in obscurity, he continues with reason. I don't believe there is any abdication on his part, nor any final prostration, nor that he ever renounces working with reason, nor that he retires to the mountains, thinking that everything is just fine as it is.

M. HYPPOLITE: To be sure, he goes right up to the light, even if this light, the most complete, must be antithetical. By rationalism, I didn't mean to say that he was engaging in a new religion. On the contrary, the Ausführung is a religion against religion.

Its antithesis – let us call it that – is precisely the death instinct. It is a decisive step in the grasp of reality, a reality which surpasses by far what we designate as such in the reality principle. The death instinct isn't an admission of impotence, it isn't a coming to a halt before an irreducible, an ineffable last thing, it is a concept. We will now try our best to take some steps in its direction.

I will begin, since this where we've got to, with what you suggested yesterday evening about The Phenomenology of Spirit. The way you see it, it is clear that it concerns the progress of knowledge. Bewusstsein in Hegel is far closer to knowledge than to consciousness. However, if yesterday's assembly hadn't been so well-behaved, one of the questions which I would have asked would have been – what is the function of non-knowledge in Hegel? You should give us a second talk about that next term. Freud wrote a number of articles on the subject of knowing what one should really expect from the reconquest of this psychological Zuider Zee which is the unconscious.[3] When we will have drained the polders of the id, what will it bring in the way of human returns? Well, this perspective didn't seem particularly exalting. It seemed to him that one risked bursting some dikes. All that is in Freud, and I only mention it to show that we are still continuing the commentary on Freud's thought. Within the Hegelian perspective, what is the realisation, the end of history? I think that, to put it succinctly, the entire forward march of the phenomenology of spirit is all of you – that's what you are here for. That's what what you are doing means, even when you don't think about it. Always the puppet strings. Will M. Hyppolite give me his approval if I say that the whole of the forward march of this phenomenology of spirit is an ever more elaborated mastery?

M. HYPPOLITE: That depends on what you are going to put under mastery.

Quite. I am going to try to illustrate it, without rounding off the corners. I don't mean to ease my term in, but on the contrary to show in which way it can cut.

M. HYPPOLITE: Don't take me as your adversary. I'm not Hegelian. I'm probably against. Don't take me as representing Hegel.

That is going to simplify matters greatly for us. I'm only asking you, because you are still more of a Hegel specialist than I, to tell me whether I'm not going too far, that is to say whether major texts might contradict me.

[3] A reference to the last two sentences of Lecture XXXI of the New Introductory Lectures, GW XV 86; Stud I 516; SE XXII 80.

As I have often pointed out, I don't much like hearing that we have gone beyond Hegel, the way one hears we have gone beyond Descartes. We go beyond everything and always end up in the same place. Hence, an ever more elaborate mastery. Let us illustrate it.

The end of history, that's absolute knowledge. You can't get out of that – if consciousness is knowledge, written as such in Hegel.

M. HYPPOLITE: Yes, but Hegel can be interpreted. One can ask whether there is a moment, in the wake of experience, which appears as absolute knowledge or whether absolute knowledge is in the whole presentation of experience? That is to say – are we always and at every moment in absolute knowledge? Is there, in the Phenomenology, a series of stages which are prior to absolute knowledge, then a final stage which Napoleon, anyone, etc., reaches, and which one would call absolute knowledge? Hegel says so somewhat, but he can be understood in an entirely different fashion. Heidegger's interpretation, for instance, is tendentious, but fortunately it is tenable. That is why one doesn't go beyond Hegel. It may be highly likely that absolute knowledge be, so to speak, immanent at every state of the Phenomenology. Only consciousness misses it. Consciousness makes of this truth which absolute knowledge would be another natural phenomenon, which is not absolute knowledge. Absolute knowledge therefore would never be a moment in history, and it would always be. Absolute knowledge would be experience as such, and not a moment in experience. Consciousness being in the field, doesn't see the field. Seeing the field, that's it, absolute knowledge.

Still, in Hegel this absolute knowledge is embodied in a discourse.

M. HYPPOLITE: Certainly.

I think that according to Hegel, everything is always there, all of history is always actually present, vertically so. Otherwise, it would be a childish tale. And the thing with absolute knowledge, which indeed is here, ever since the first Neanderthal idiots, is that discourse closes in on itself, whether or not it is in complete disagreement with itself, whether or not everything which can be expressed in the discourse is coherent and justified.

That is where I am stopping you. We are going step by step, but it is better to go slowly in order to go assuredly. This will bring us to what we are looking for – to the meaning, to the originality of what Freud contributes in relation to Hegel.

Within the Hegelian perspective, completed discourse – doubtless, from the moment discourse has reached its completion, there won't be any further need to speak, that is what we call the post-revolutionary stages, let's leave that to one side – completed discourse, the embodiment of absolute knowledge, is the instrument of power, the sceptre and the property of those who know. Nothing implies that everyone partakes in it. When the scientists I mentioned yesterday evening – this is more than a myth, it is the very meaning of the forward march of the symbol – succeed in bringing human discourse to a close, they are in possession of it, and those who don't have it have nothing left but to turn to jazz, to dance, to entertain themselves, the good fellows, the nice guys, the libidinal types. That is what I call elaborated mastery.

Within absolute knowledge, there remains one last division, one last separation, ontological if I may say, within man. If Hegel has gone beyond a certain religious individualism which grounds the existence of the individual in his unique tête-à-tête with God, it is by showing that the reality, so to speak, of each human being is in the being of the other. In the end, there is a reciprocal alienation, as you so well explained it yesterday evening, and, I want to insist on this, it is irreducible, with no way out. What could be more stupid than the primitive master? A real master. We have as a matter of fact all lived long enough to realise what actually happens when the aspiration to mastery gets a hold on men! We saw it during the war, the political error of those whose ideology it was to believe themselves the masters, to believe that all it takes is to stretch out the hand to take. The Germans advance towards Toulon to catch the fleet there – a true story of masters. The mastery is entirely on the slave's side, because he elaborates his mastery against the master. Now, this reciprocal alienation, it must last until the end. Think how little effect the elaborated discourse will have on those who are busy with jazz at the corner café. And how much the masters will be aching to go and join them. While conversely the others will consider themselves wretches, nobodies, and will think – how happy the master is in enjoying being master? – whereas, of course, he will be completely frustrated. That is where, I think, in the last instance, Hegel leads us to.

Hegel is at the limit of anthropology. Freud got out of it. His discovery is that man isn't entirely in man. Freud isn't a humanist. I will try and explain to you why.

Let us turn to basics. Freud was a physician, but he was born about a century later than Hegel, and a lot of things happened in the meantime, which were not lacking in consequences for the meaning which might be given to the word 'physician'. Freud wasn't a physician as Aesculapius, Hippocrates or Saint Luke were. He was a physician in the way we all more or less are. In short, he was a physician who no longer is one, as we ourselves are of a type of physician which no longer partakes in the tradition of what the physician has always been for man.

It is very odd to say, there's a truly strange incoherence in saying – man has a body. For us it makes sense, it is even probable that it has always made sense, but it makes more sense for us than for anybody else, since, with Hegel and without knowing it, in so far as everybody is Hegelian without knowing it, we have pushed to an extreme degree the identification of man with his knowledge, which is an accumulated knowledge. It is very strange to be localised in a body, and this strangeness can't be minimised, despite the fact that a great deal of time is spent puffing ourselves up and boasting about having reinvented human unity, which that idiot Descartes had cut in two. It is completely useless to make great declarations about returning to the unity of the human being, to the soul as the body's form, with large dosages of Thomism and Aristotelianism. The division is here to stay. And that is why physicians of our day and age aren't the physicians of other times, except those who spend their time convinced that there are temperaments, constitutions, and other things of that sort. The physician has with respect to the body the attitude of the man who dismantles a machine. All statements of principles notwithstanding, this attitude is a radical one. That's the point where Freud started, and that was his ideal – to do pathological anatomy, anatomical physiology, to discover what this little complicated apparatus embodied there in the nervous system is for.

This perspective, which splits the unity of the living, certainly does have something of a disturbing, scandalous aspect, and one entire line of thought tries to counter it – I'm thinking of gestaltism and other well intentioned theoretical elaborations, which hope to return to the benevolence of nature and to a pre-established harmony. Of course, nothing proves that the body is a machine, and in fact there's every chance that it isn't. But that isn't the problem. The important thing is that this is the way in which one has tackled the question. I named him just now, the one in question, it's Descartes. He wasn't the only one, for it took quite a bit for him to begin to think of the body as a machine. What in particular it took was for there to be one which not only worked by itself, but which could embody in a quite striking way something essentially human.

Admittedly, while this was taking place, nobody actually realised it. But now we have a tiny bit of hindsight. The phenomenon occurs sometime before Hegel. Hegel, who only played a small part in all this, is perhaps the last representative of a certain classical anthropology, but in the end, he is almost, with respect to Descartes, a bit behind.

The machine I'm talking about is the clock. It is rare in our day and age for a man to be sufficiently wonderstruck by a clock. Louis Aragon talks about this in Le Paysan de Paris in words which only a poet could find to salute the miraculous character of a thing, this thing, which, he says, pursues a human hypothesis, whether man be there or not.

So there were clocks. They weren't very miraculous yet, since it was a long time after the Discourse on Method before there was a real one, a good one, with a pendulum, Huygens's clock – I have already referred to it in one of my texts. There were already some worked by weights, which, year in year out, nonetheless embodied the measure of time. It was obviously necessary for us to cover a certain distance in history before we realised to what extent it is essential to our being-there, as they say, to know the time. A lot can be said about this time not being the real one, it still passes there, in the clock, all alone like an adult.

I can't recommend too strongly to you the reading of a book by Descartes called Of Man. You will be able to get hold of this Man on the cheap, it isn't one of the most sought-after-works, it will cost you less than the Discourse on Method, dear to the dentists. Flip through it, and confirm that what Descartes is looking for in man is the clock.

This machine isn't what a vain people think it is. It isn't purely and simply the opposite of the living, the simulacrum of the living. That it was constructed so as to embody something which is called time and is the mystery of mysteries, should put us on the right track. What is in play in the machine? That at the same time someone called Pascal busied himself constructing a machine, still very modest, making additions, shows us that the machine is tied to radically human functions. It isn't a simple artifact, as could be said of chairs, tables, and of other more or less symbolic objects, among which we live without realising that they make for our own portrait. Machines are something else. They go much further in the direction of what we are in reality, further even than the people who build them suspect.

Hegel thought himself to be something like the embodiment of the Spirit of his time, and he dreamt that Napoleon was the Weltseele, the soul of the world, the other pole, more feminine, more carnal, of power. Well, both of them distinguished themselves by the fact that they completely failed to apprehend [méconnu] the importance of this phenomenon which was beginning to come into view in their time – the steam engine. Yet Watt wasn't that long in coming, and there were already things which worked all by themselves, little bombs down the mines.

The machine embodies the most radical symbolic activity of man, and it was necessary so that questions could be raised – you may not notice it in the middle of all this – at the level at which we are raising them.

In Freud something is talked about, which isn't talked about in Hegel, namely energy. That is the major preoccupation, the dominant preoccupation, which from the speculative point of view is more important than this purely homonymic confusion we got caught up in yesterday evening when we were talking of the opposition between consciousness in Hegel's time, and the unconscious in Freud's time – it's like talking about the contradiction between the Parthenon and hydroelectricity, they've got nothing to do with one another. Between Hegel and Freud, there's the advent of the world of the machine.

Energy, I had you observe last time, is a notion which can only emerge once there are machines. Not that energy hasn't always been there. Except that people who had slaves didn't realise that one could establish equations for the price of their food and what they did in their latifundia. There are no examples of energy calculations in the use of slaves. There is not the hint of an equation as to their output. Cato never did it. It took machines for us to realise they had to be fed. And more – they had to be looked after. But why? Because they tend to wear out. Slaves do as well, but one doesn't think about it, one thinks that it is natural for them to get old and croak. And later on, it dawned on people, something which was never thought of before, that living things look after themselves all on their own, in other words, they represent homeostats.

From then on, you begin to see the dawn of modern biology, with its characteristic of never calling upon any notion concerning life. Vitalist thought is alien to biology. The founding spirit of modern biology, who died prematurely, and whose statue adorns the old faculty of medicine, Bichat, expressed this in the most succinct manner. He was someone who had somehow maintained a vague belief in God, but who was extremely clear-sighted – he knew that a new period had begun, and that from now on life was going to be defined in relation to death. That converges with what I am trying to explain to you, the decisive character of the reference to the machine so far as the founding of biology is concerned. Biologists think that they devote themselves to the study of life. It's not clear why. Until further notice, their fundamental concepts' point of origin has nothing to do with the phenomenon of life, which in its essence remains completely impenetrable. The phenomenon of life continues to elude us, whatever we do, despite the reiterated reaffirmations that we are getting closer to it. Biological concepts remain completely inadequate to it, which doesn't prevent them from retaining all their value.

Some people were surprised by the approbation which I bestowed yesterday evening on Françoise, when in relation to this third term we are looking for in the inter-human dialectic, she brought in biology. She may not have been thinking about biology exactly as I'm going to describe it to you, but let us say that the truth came out of the mouth of someone who was saying it naively.

We will take biology by antiphrasis. Freudian biology has nothing to do with biology. It is a matter of manipulating symbols with the aim of resolving energy questions, as the homeostatic reference indicates, thus enabling us to characterise as such not only the human being, but the functioning of its major apparatuses. Freud's whole discussion revolves around that question, what, in terms of energy, is the psyche? This is where the originality of what in him is called biological thought resides. He wasn't a biologist, any more than any of us are, but throughout his work he placed the accent on the energy function.

If we know how to reveal the meaning of this energy myth, we see the emergence of what was, from the start and without it being understood, implicit in the metaphor of the human body as a machine. Here we see the manifestation of a certain beyond of the inter-human reference, which is in all strictness the symbolic beyond. That is what we are going to study, and surely we will then understand this kind of dawn which the Freudian experience is.

Freud started from a conception of the nervous system according to which it always tends to return to a point of equilibrium. That is what he started with, because it was then a necessity in the mind of any physician of that scientific age concerned with the human body.

Anzieu, look at the Entwurf, which is what I am talking about, and give us an account of it. On this foundation, Freud tried to build a theory of the functioning of the nervous system, by showing that the brain operates as a buffer-organ between man and reality, as a homeostat organ. And he then comes up against, he stumbles on, the dream. He realises that the brain is a dream machine. And it is in the dream machine that he rediscovers what was there all along and which hadn't been noticed, namely, that it is at the most organic and most simple, most immediate and least manageable level, at the most unconscious level, that sense and speech are revealed and blossom forth in their entirety.

Hence the complete revolution in his thinking, and the move to the Traumdeutung. It is said that he abandons a physiologising perspective for a psychologising perspective. That's not the point. He discovers the operation of the symbol as such, the manifestation of the symbol in the dialectical state, in the semantic state, in its displacements, puns, plays on words, jokes working all on their own in the dream machine. And he has to take a line on this discovery, accept it or ignore it, as all the others had to when they were that close to it. It was such a turning-point that he didn't know anything about what was happening to him. It took him another twenty years of a life which was already quite advanced at the time of this discovery, to be able to look back to his premises and to try to recover what it means in terms of energy. That is what required him to produce the new elaboration of the beyond of the pleasure principle and of the death instinct.

In this re-elaboration, one can see the meaning we needed yesterday evening, together with the reference of man to his fellow man, so as to make up that third term where, since Freud, the true axis of the realisation of the human being is to be found. That I cannot name for you as yet, given the point I've got to today.

MAURICE MERLEAU-PONTY AND UNDERSTANDING
- CONSERVATION, ENTROPY, INFORMATION PLEASURE PRINCIPLE AND REALITY PRINCIPLE
GRIBOUILLE'S APPRENTICESHIP
REMINISCENCE AND REPETITION

We are going to reflect on yesterday evening's extraordinary paper.[1] Did you make some sense of it? The discussion was remarkably well focused, and I was very pleased with that. But do you really see the heart of the problem, and the distance which Merleau-Ponty unyieldingly keeps from the analytic experience?

There is a term towards which the discussion could have turned if we had had more time, namely Gestaltism. I don't know whether you spotted it in passing, it arose at one point in Merleau-Ponty's talk as what for him is truly the measure, the standard of the encounter with the other and with reality. And, indeed, what lies at bottom of his teaching is understanding. In spite of the distance he tries to keep from what he calls the traditional liberal position, well, as was quite rightly pointed out to him, he isn't that far from it. Because in the end, his only advance is to have realised that some things are difficult to understand, hard to swallow.

It's no accident that he has taken his point of reference from contemporary political experience. You know how greatly concerned he is about this, the breaking off of the dialogue with communism. For him it's a historical crisis spanning human experience. He realises both that we don't understand one another, and he reaffirms that we must understand. As the title of one of his recent articles in a weekly expressed it – D'abord comprendre les Communistes.

A very paradoxical title, since he realises precisely that, from his point of view, he can't understand.

It was just the same yesterday evening. It is unfortunate that he didn't examine more closely, no doubt because of insufficient familiarity with this area, whether understanding has a place in the field of analysis. In other words, can the field of analysis accede to homogeneity? Can everything in it be understood? That is the question which Jean Hyppolite raised – is Freudianism a humanism, yes or no? Merleau-Ponty's position is essentially a humanist one. And you can see where that leads him.

In effect, he hangs on to the notion of totality, of unitary functioning, he always presupposes a given unity accessible to what in the end will be an instantaneous, theoretical, contemplative apprehension, to which the experience of the good form, so very ambiguous in Gestaltism, gives a semblance of support. Not that this notion doesn't correspond to measurable facts, a wealth of experimentation. But the ambiguity lies in a theorisation in which physics becomes confused with phenomenology, in which a drop of water, so long as it takes on a spherical form, is on the same level as this something which requires that we always tend to perceive the approximate form we see as circular.

That is a correlation which to be sure makes for a striking image, but it elides the essential problem. No doubt something tends to produce this good form at the back of the retina, something in the physical world tends to produce certain analogous forms, but putting these two facts together isn't a way of giving an account of experience in all its richness. In any case, if one does so, one can no longer assert, as Merleau-Ponty would like to, the primacy of consciousness. Consciousness, in the end, itself becomes a mechanism. And it plays, without him realising it, the function which I argue here to be the first stage [temps] of the dialectic of the ego. Except, for Merleau-Ponty, it's all there, in consciousness. A contemplative consciousness constitutes the world through a series of syntheses, of exchanges, which at every moment place it within a renewed, more enveloping totality, but which always finds its origin in the subject. (To M. Hyppolite) Don't you agree?

M. HYPPOLITE: I'm listening to the movement you're unfolding starting off from the Gestalt. In the end, it is a phenomenology of the imaginary, in the sense in which we use this word.

O. MANNONI: It can nonetheless go beyond the imaginary level. I see the seed of Gestaltist thinking in Darwin's thinking. When he replaces variation with mutation, he discovers a nature which yields good forms. But the existence of forms which aren't simply mechanical then raises a problem. It seems to me that the Gestalt is an attempt to resolve it.

Of course. What you just said is one more step, which I don't take, because I don't want to go beyond the level Merleau-Ponty keeps to. But in fact, in following him, in taking the word form in its fullest possible acceptation, one would be led back to a vitalism, to the mysteries of the creative force.

The idea of living evolution, the notion that nature always produces superior forms, more and more elaborated, more and more integrated, better and better built organisms, the belief that progress of some sort is immanent in the movement of life, all this is alien to him, and he explicitly repudiates it. Since Freud is a subject little inclined to make his decisions from positions of principle, I think that it is his experience of man which guides him. It is a medical experience. It allowed him to locate the register of a certain kind of suffering and illness, of fundamental conflict, in man.

To explain the world with a natural tendency to create superior forms is quite the opposite of the essential conflict such as he sees it played out in the human being. But this conflict goes beyond the human being. It's as if Freud were hurled into Beyond the Pleasure Principle, which is an incontestably metaphysical category, he steps outside of the limits of the domain of the human in the organic sense of the word. Is it a conception of the world? No, it is a category of thought, to which every experience of the concrete subject cannot but refer itself.

M. HYPPOLITE: I'm not at all challenging the crisis described by Freud. But he opposes the libido to the death instinct, and he defines it as the tendency of the organism to come together with other organisms, as if that constituted progress, integration. So, independently of this undeniable conflict of which you speak and which doesn't make him an optimist from the human point of view, we nevertheless find in him a conception of the libido, what is more ill defined, which asserts clearly the broader and broader integration of organisms. Freud says it quite succinctly in the text itself.

I understand that. But note that the tendency to union – Eros tends to unite – is only ever apprehended in its relation to the contrary tendency, which leads to division, to rupture, to a redispersion, most especially of inanimate matter. These two tendencies are strictly inseparable. No notion is less unitary than that. Let us go over it step by step.

What impasse had we reached last time? The organism already conceived by Freud as a machine, has a tendency to return to its state of equilibrium – this is what the pleasure principle states. Now, at first sight, this restitutive tendency is not clearly distinguishable, in Freud's text, from the repetitive tendency which he isolates, and which constitutes his original contribution. So we ask ourselves the following question – what distinguishes these two tendencies?

In this text, the middle terms are very strange, because they are part of a circular dialectic. Freud is constantly returning to a notion which always seems to elude him. It resists, but he doesn't stop, he tries to maintain the originality of the repetitive tendency at all costs. Without the shadow of a doubt, there was something he lacked, of the order of categories or of images, so as to give us a clear sense of it.

From the beginning of Freud's work to the end, the pleasure principle is explained in the following way – when faced with a stimulus encroaching on the living apparatus, the nervous system is as it were the indispensable delegate of the homeostat, of the indispensable regulator, thanks to which the living being survives, and to which corresponds a tendency to lower the excitation to a minimum. To a minimum, what does that mean? There is an ambiguity here, which puts analytic authors under some difficulty. Read them, you'll see them slide down the slope which Freud's way of rendering the question dialectical opens to them.

Freud here offered them the opportunity for yet one more misunderstanding, and in chorus they all succumb to it, in their panic.

The minimum tension can mean one of two things, all biologists will agree, according to whether it is a matter of the minimum given a certain definition of the equilibrium of the system, or of the minimum purely and simply, that is to say, with respect to the living being, death.

Indeed one can consider that with death, all tensions are reduced, from the point of view of the living being, to zero. But one can just as well take into consideration the processes of decomposition which follow death. One then ends up defining the aim of the pleasure principle as the concrete dissolution of the corpse. That is something which one cannot but see as excessive.

However, I can cite you several authors for whom reducing the stimuli to the minimum means nothing more nor less than the death of the living being. That is to assume that the problem has been resolved, that is to confuse the pleasure principle with what we think Freud designated under the name of the death instinct. I say what we think, because, when Freud speaks of the death instinct, he is, thank God, designating something less absurd, less anti-biological, anti-scientific.

There is something which is distinct from the pleasure principle and which tends to reduce all animate things to the inanimate – that is how Freud puts it. What does he mean by this? What obliges him to think that? Not the death of living beings. It's human experience, human interchanges, intersubjectivity. Something of what he observes in man constrains him to step out of the limits of life.

No doubt there is a principle which brings the libido back to death, but it doesn't bring it back any old how. If it brought it back there by the shortest paths, the problem would be resolved. But it brings it back there only along the paths of life, it so happens.

The principle which brings the living being back to death is situated, is marked out behind the necessity it experiences to take the roads of life – and it can only take that way. It cannot find death along any old road.

In other words, the machine looks after itself, maps out a certain curve, a certain persistence. And it is along the very path of this subsistence that something else becomes manifest, sustained by this existence it finds there and which shows it its passage.

There is an essential link which must be made right away – when you draw a rabbit out of a hat, it's because you put it there in the first place. Physicists have a name for this formulation, they call it the first law of thermodynamics, the law of the conservation of energy – if there's something at the end, just as much had to be there at the beginning.

The second principle – I'll try to give you a striking image of it – stipulates that the manifestation of this energy has undegraded modes and others which aren't. To put it another way, you can't swim against the current. When you do a job, a part of it is expended, as heat for instance – there's a loss. That's called entropy.

There is no mystery to entropy, it's a symbol, a thing you can write on the blackboard, and you'd be very wrong to think it exists. Entropy is a capital E, absolutely indispensable to our thinking. And even if you couldn't care less about this capital E, because a man called Karlus Mayer, a doctor in the navy, founded it, it is the principle, actually, of everything – one cannot avoid taking it into account when one runs a factory, atomic or otherwise, or a country. Karlus Mayer started thinking seriously about it while bleeding his patients – sometimes the paths of thought are mysterious, those of the Lord are unfathomable. It is quite striking that having thought this one out, and this is, to be sure, one of thought's great moments, he was extremely enfeebled by it – as if giving birth to capital E might have left its mark on the nervous system.

You'd be wrong to think that, when I take up positions which are commonly thought of as anti-organicist, it is because – as someone I like a lot said one day – the nervous system annoys me. I don't take such sentimental reasons as my guide. I think ordinary organicism is a stupidity, but there is another variety which doesn't in any way neglect material phenomena. Which leads me to tell you – in all honesty, if not in complete truth, for truth would require looking for its traces in experience – that I think that, for an unhappy individual to have been charged by I know not what, the holy language as Valéry put it, with the task of bringing capital E to life, doesn't perhaps come about without cost. Karlus Mayer certainly had two parts to his life, the one before and the one after, when nothing else happened – he had said what he had to say.

Well, this entropy, Freud encounters it, and he already does so by the end of the Wolfman. He has a firm sense that it has some kind of relation to his death instinct but without being able, there either, to be quite at ease with it, and throughout this article he pursues his infernal little merry-go-round, like Diogenes seeking a man with his lantern. He was missing something. It would be too easy if I were to tell you – I will tell you – that all you have to do is add a capital F or a capital I to the capital E. That is certainly not it, because it hasn't thereby been entirely elucidated.

Contemporary thought is in the process of trying to get ahold of this down paths which are often ambiguous, even confusional, and you can't be unaware that you are present at its birth. I would go even further – in so far as you are here, following my seminar, you are in the process of see-sawing into this childbirth. You are entering into that dimension in which thought tries to order itself and find its correct symbol, its capital F following on from capital E. In the present state of things, it's the quantity of information.

Some aren't taken aback by this. Others seem completely baffled.

The great adventure of the research concerning communication began at some distance, at least ostensibly, from our concerns. Rather let's say, for how are we to know where it all began, that one of its significant moments is to be found in the company of telephone engineers.

The Bell Telephone Company needed to economise, that is to say, to pass the greatest possible number of communications down one single wire. In a country as vast as the United States, it is very important to save on a few wires, and to get the inanities which generally travel by this kind of transmission apparatus to pass down the smallest possible number of wires. That is where the quantification of communication started. So a start was made, as you can see, by dealing with something very far removed from what we here call speech. It had nothing to do with knowing whether what people tell each other makes any sense. Besides, what is said on the telephone, you must know from experience, never does. But one communicates, one recognises the modulation of a human voice, and as a result one has that appearance of understanding which comes with the fact that one recognises words one already knows. It is a matter of knowing what are the most economical conditions which enable one to transmit the words people recognise. No one cares about the meaning. Doesn't this underline rather well the point which I am emphasising, which one always forgets, namely that language, this language which is the instrument of speech, is something material?

In this way it was realised that there was no need for everything that gets inscribed on to the small sheet of an apparatus which has been more or less perfected, and become electronic in the meantime, but which in the end is still a Marey's apparatus,[2] which oscillates and represents the modulation of the voice. To obtain the same result all that is needed is to take a small slice from it, reducing the whole oscillation by a great deal – of the order of 1 to 10. And not only does one hear, but one recognises the voice of the dearly beloved or of dear Mrs So-and-so, at the other end. The things of the heart, the conviction passed on from one individual to another, comes over in its entirety.

The quantity of information then began to be codified. This doesn't mean that fundamental things happen between human beings. It concerns what goes down the wires, and what can be measured. Except, one then begins to wonder whether it does go, or whether it doesn't, when it deteriorates, when it is no longer communication. This what is called, in psychology, the jam,[2] an American word. It is the first time that confusion as such – this tendency there is in communication to cease being a communication, that is to say, of no longer communicating anything at all – appears as a fundamental concept. That makes for one more symbol.

You must get acquainted with this symbolic system, if you want to gain entrance to entire orders of reality which very much concern us. If you don't know how to manipulate these capital E's and these capital F's correctly, you can't be qualified to speak about inter-human relations. And this is in fact an objection which we could well have made yesterday evening to Merleau-Ponty. At some point in the symbolic system's development, not everyone can speak with everyone else. When we talked of closed subjectivity to him, he said – If you can't talk with communists, the foundation of language vanishes, for the foundation of language is that it is universal. Well of course. But one still has to be introduced into the circuit of language, and know what one is talking about when one talks about communication. And you'll see that this is essential in relation to the death instinct, which seems the opposite.

Mathematicians qualified to handle these symbols locate information as that which moves in the opposite direction to entropy. When people had become acquainted with thermodynamics, and asked themselves how their machine was going to pay for itself, they left themselves out. They regarded the machine as the master regards the slave – the machine is there, somewhere else, and it works. They were forgetting only one thing, that it was they who had signed the order form. Now, this fact turns out to have a considerable importance in the domain of energy. Because if information is introduced into the circuit of the degradation of energy, it can perform miracles. If Maxwell's demon can stop the atoms which move too slowly, and keep only those which have a tendency to be a little on the frantic side, he will cause the general level of the energy to rise again, and will do, using what would have degraded into heat, work equivalent to that which was lost.

This seems far removed from our subject. You will see how we will meet up with it again. Let us start again with our pleasure principle, and let's plunge back into the ambiguities.

At the level of the nervous system, when there are stimuli, everything works, everything comes into action, the efferents, the afferents, so that the living being returns to a state of repose. That's the pleasure principle, according to Freud.

On the intuitive level, there is, isn't there, some discordance between the pleasure principle defined thus, and what pleasure evokes in the way of raciness. Every man runs after his lady, that's what it looked like until now. In Lucretius, it was clear, and rather fun. And from time to time, analysts, despairing after all at having to use categories which seem to them so contrary to the feeling, remind us that there is indeed a pleasure in activity, a taste for stimulation. One seeks out entertainment, and one is taken in by the game. And, after all, wasn't it Freud who introduced the function of the libido into human behaviour? This libido, isn't it something rather libidinous? People seek their pleasure. So, why is this expressed theoretically by a principle which states the following – what is sought is, in the end, the cessation of pleasure. But you can see that the direction the theory takes at this point goes exactly in the opposite direction to that of subjective intuition – in the pleasure principle, pleasure, by definition, is bent on its end. The pleasure principle – the principle of pleasure – is that pleasure should cease.[3]

Within this perspective, what becomes of the reality principle?

The reality principle is usually introduced with the simple remark that too much pleasure-seeking ends in all kinds of accidents – you get your fingers burnt, you get the clap, you get your face smashed in. That is how we have the genesis of what is called human learning described to us. And then we are told that the pleasure principle is opposed to the reality principle. In our perspective, that obviously acquires another meaning. The reality principle consists in making the game last, that is to say, in ensuring that pleasure is renewed, so that the fight doesn't end for lack of combatants. The reality principle consists in husbanding our pleasures, these pleasures whose aim is precisely to end in cessation.

Don't get the idea that analysts are satisfied with this way of looking at the pleasure principle, which is nonetheless absolutely essential, from one end to the other, to the theory – if you don't think of the pleasure principle in this register, it is useless to introduce you to Freud.

The notion that there is a kind of pleasure proper to activity, pleasure in play, for instance, cripples the very categories of our thinking. What need would we then have of our technique? It would simply be a matter of teaching people gymnastics, music or anything else you want. Pedagogical procedures belong to a completely alien register to that of analytic experience. I'm not saying that they are without value, or that they might not be made to play an essential role in the Republic – we need only refer to Plato.

One may want to fit man in to a harmonious, natural mode of functioning, one may want to get him to connect the stages of his development, allow him the free blossoming of what in his organism, reaches, in its own time, maturity, and to give to each of these stages its time for play, then its time for adaptation, time for stabilisation, until the new living feature makes its appearance. An entire anthropology can be ordered around this. But is that the anthropology that justifies psychoanalyses, that is to say, sticking them on a couch so that they can tell us a lot of bloody nonsense? What's the relation between that and gymnastics, music? Would Plato have understood what psychoanalysis was about? No, he wouldn't have understood it, despite appearances, because at this point there's an abyss, a fault, and this is what we are in the process of looking for, with Beyond the Pleasure Principle.

I'm not saying that analysands are incapable of learning. You can teach people to play the piano – though it has to exist – and you notice, for instance, that having learned to play the piano with large keys, they can play on a piano with small keys, on a harpsichord, etc. But this is only a matter of determinate segments of human behaviour, and not, as in analysis, of man's destiny, his conduct when the piano lesson has ended and he goes and visits his girlfriend. Then what he learns is more or less the same as Gribouille.

You know the story of Gribouille. He goes to a funeral, and says – Many happy returns! He gets himself in a mess, gets his hair pulled, goes back home – Come now, you don't say 'Many happy returns' at a funeral, you say – May God rest his soul! He goes back out, comes upon a wedding – May God rest his soul! And he still gets into trouble.

Well that is what learning is, so analysis shows us, and that is what we come upon in the first analytic discoveries – trauma, fixation, reproduction, transference. What in the analytic experience is called the intrusion of the past into the present pertains to this order. It is always the learning of someone who will do better next time. And when I say that he will do better next time, that means that he'll have to do something completely different next time.

When we are told, employing the notion metaphorically, that analysis is an apprenticeship[4] in freedom, you must admit that it has an odd ring to it. All the same, at our point in history, as Merleau-Ponty was saying yesterday, one should be on one's guard.

What does analysis uncover – if it isn't the fundamental, radical discordance of forms of conduct essential to man in relation to everything which he experiences? The dimension discovered by analysis is the opposite of anything which progresses through adaptation, through approximation, through being perfected. It is something which proceeds by leaps, in jumps. It is always the strictly inadequate application of certain complete symbolic relations, and that implies several tonalities, immixtions, for instance of the imaginary in the symbolic, or inversely.

There is a radical difference between any investigation of human beings, even in the laboratory, and what happens in animals. On the animal side, one shifts within a fundamental ambiguity between instinct and learning, as soon as one tries, as is done now, to keep rather close to the facts. In animals, the so-called preformations of the instinct don't in any way exclude learning. In addition, one constantly finds in them possibilities for learning within the instinctual frameworks. What is more, one discovers that the actualisations of instinct would not occur without a call from the environment, as they say, which stimulates and provokes the crystallisation of forms, of behaviour and modes of conduct.

There is a convergence, a crystallisation, here which gives us the feeling, however sceptical we may be, of a pre-established harmony, subject to be sure to all kinds of difficulties cropping up. The notion of learning is in some way incapable of being differentiated from the maturation of instinct. It is in this domain that Gestalt categories naturally arise as indicators. An animal recognises its brother, its fellow being, its sexual partner. It finds its place in paradise, its environment, it also moulds it, it impresses itself on it. The stickleback makes a certain number of small holes, for no apparent reason, but one can tell that it is its leap which marks, its leap of which its entire body is the bearer. The animal fits into its environment. There's adaptation, and it's an adaptation which, quite precisely, has its end, its term, its limit. In this way, animal learning displays the characteristics of an organised and finite mode of becoming perfect. How different it is from what the same research – so one thinks – reveals about learning in man! These researches clearly show the function of the desire to return to it, the privilege of tasks which haven't been completed. Mrs Zeigarnik is invoked without knowing quite what she said, for saying that a task will be memorised all the better for having failed under determinate conditions. Don't you see that all of that goes totally against animal psychology, and even totally against the account we might give of memory as being the stacking up of engrams, of impressions, in which the individual being is formed? In man, it is the wrong form which prevails. In so far as a task is not completed the subject returns to it. The more abject the failure, the better the subject remembers it.

In all this, we are not considering things at the level of the being and of destiny – the thing was measured within the limitations of a laboratory. But it is not enough to measure, one must also try to understand.

I am perfectly well aware that the mind is always abundant in modes of understanding. I often say that to people I supervise – be very careful not to understand the patient, there is no surer way of getting lost. The patient says something which one can make neither head nor tail of, and, in repeating it to me – Well, I understand him, I'm told, to mean this. That is, in the name of intelligence, what should stop us in our tracks, what isn't comprehensible, is simply dodged.

The Zeigarnik effect, the abject failure, or the task left incomplete, everyone understands that. We all remember Mozart – he gulped down the cup of chocolate, and he came back to strike the last chord. But one fails to understand that it isn't an explanation. Or if it is one, that means we aren't animals. We aren't musicians the way my little dog is, going all dreamy when I put on certain records. A musician is always the musician of his own music. And except for people who write their own music, that is, who keep their distance from this music, there aren't many people who come back to strike their last chord.

I would like to get you to understand at what level the need for repetition is situated. And once again, we will find our reference some way away.

Kierkegaard, who was, as you know, a humorist, discussed the difference between the pagan world and the world of grace, which Christianity introduces. Something of the ability to recognise his natural object, so apparent in animals, is present in man. There is being captured by form, being seized by play, being gripped by the mirage of life. That is what a theoretical, or theorial, or contemplative, or Platonic thought refers itself to, and it isn't an accident that Plato places reminiscence at the centre of his entire theory of knowledge. The natural object, the harmonic correspondent of the living being, is recognisable because its outline has already been sketched. And for it to have been sketched, it must already have been within the object which is going to join itself to it. That is the relation of the dyad. Plato's entire theory of knowledge – Jean Hyppolite won't contradict me – is dyadic.

But for certain specific reasons, a change occurred. Sin is from then on present as the third term, and it is no longer by following the path of reminiscence, but rather in following that of repetition, that man finds his way. That is precisely what puts Kierkegaard on the track of our Freudian intuitions, in a small book called Repetition. I recommend reading it to those who are already somewhat ahead. Those who don't have much time should at least read the first part.

Kierkegaard wants to avoid precisely those problems which stem from his accession to a new order, and he encounters the dam of his own reminiscences, of who he thinks he is and of what he knows he will never be able to become. He then tries the experiment of repetition. He returns to Berlin where, during his previous stay he had experienced infinite pleasure, and he retraces his own steps. You will see what happens to him, seeking his well-being in the shadow of his pleasure. The experiment fails totally. But as a result of that, he puts us on the track of our problem, namely, how and why everything which pertains to an advance essential to the human being must take the path of a tenacious repetition.

I'm getting close to the model which I want to leave with you today, so you can see the meaning of man's need for repetition. It's all to do with the intrusion of the symbolic register. Only, I'll illustrate it for you.

Models are very important. Not that they mean anything – they mean nothing. But that's the way we are – that's our animal weakness – we need images. And, sometimes, for lack of images, some symbols don't see the light of day. In general, it is rather the symbolic deficiency which is worrisome. The image comes to us from an essentially symbolic creation, that is to say from a machine, that most modern of machines, far more dangerous for man than the atom bomb, the adding machine.

You've been told, you've understood, and you don't believe it – the adding machine has a memory. You quite like saying it, but you don't believe it. Do get it right! The sort of memory it has is destined to put all the images of memory which up to now we had given ourselves into question. The best thing we've found for giving an image of the phenomenon of memory is the Babylonian wax seal, a thing with a few little reliefs and some lines which you roll out on to a wax plaque, what we call an engram. The seal is also a machine, only no one notices that.

For machines to remember every question, questions which have already been put to them, which is sometimes necessary, something a bit more cunning was discovered – the machine's first experience circulates inside it in the form of a message.

Suppose that I send a telegram from here to Le Mans, with the request that Le Mans send it back to Tours, from there to Sens, from there to Fontainebleau, and from there to Paris, and so on indefinitely. What's needed is that when I reach the tail of my message, the head should not yet have arrived back. The message must have time to turn around. It turns quickly, it doesn't stop turning, it turns around in circles.

It's funny, this thing turning back on itself. It's called feedback,[5] and its related to the homeostat. You know that that is how the admission of steam into a steam-engine is controlled. If it heats up too quickly, a governor registers it, two things are forced apart by the centrifugal force, and the admission of steam is regulated. We have oscillation about a point of equilibrium.

Here, it's more complicated. We call that a message. It's very ambiguous. What is a message inside a machine? Something which proceeds by opening and not opening, the way an electronic lamp does, by yes or no. It's something articulated, of the same order as the fundamental oppositions of the symbolic register. At any given moment, this something which turns has to, or doesn't, come back into play. It is always ready to give a reply, and be completed by this selfsame act of replying, that is to say by ceasing to function as an isolated and closed circuit, by entering into the general run of things. Now this comes very close to what we can conceive of as Zwang, the compulsion to repeat.

As soon as we have this little model, we realise that in the very anatomy of the cerebral apparatus there are things which return back on themselves. Thanks to Riguet, on whose recommendation I read the work of an English neurologist, I became very interested in a certain octopus. It seems that its nervous system is sufficiently simple to have an isolated nerve which governs what is called the jet, or the propulsion of liquid, thanks to which the octopus has this delightful way of moving. You can also think of its memory apparatus being pretty much reduced to this message circulating between Paris and Paris, on tiny points of the nervous system.

Think back on what we said in preceding years about those striking coincidences Freud noted in the sphere of what he calls telepathy. Very important things, in the way of transference, occur in parallel in two patients, whether one is in analysis and the other just on its fringes, or whether both are in analysis. At that time, I showed you how it is through being links, supports, rings in the same circle of discourse, agents integrated in the same circle of discourse, that the subjects simultaneously experience such and such a symptomatic act, or discover such and such a memory.

At the point we have reached, I propose, looking ahead, that you conceive of the need for repetition, such as it concretely manifests itself in the subject, in analysis for instance, as the form of behaviour staged in the past and reproduced in the present in a way which doesn't conform much with vital adaptation.

Here we rediscover what I've already pointed out to you, namely that the unconscious is the discourse of the other. This discourse of the other is not the discourse of the abstract other, of the other in the dyad, of my correspondent, nor even of my slave, it is the discourse of the circuit in which I am integrated. I am one of its links. It is the discourse of my father for instance, in so far as my father made mistakes which I am absolutely condemned to reproduce – that's what we call the super-ego. I am condemned to reproduce them because I am obliged to pick up again the discourse he bequeathed to me, not simply because I am his son, but because one can't stop the chain of discourse, and it is precisely my duty to transmit it in its aberrant form to someone else. I have to put to someone else the problem of a situation of life or death in which the chances are that it is just as likely that he will falter, in such a way that this discourse produces a small circuit in which an entire family, an entire coterie, an entire camp, an entire nation or half of the world will be caught. The circular form of a speech which is just at the limit between sense and non-sense, which is problematic.

That's what the need for repetition is, as we see it emerge beyond the pleasure principle. It vacillates beyond all the biological mechanisms of equilibration, of harmonisation and of agreement. It is only introduced by the register of language, by the function of the symbol, by the problematic of the question within the human order.

How does Freud project that in the most literal manner on to a level which ostensibly belongs to the order of biology? We will have to come back to that the next few times. Life is only caught up in the symbolic piece-meal, decomposed. The human being himself is in part outside life, he partakes of the death instinct. Only from there can he engage in the register of life.

THE FREUDIAN SCHEMATA OF THE PSYCHIC APPARATUS

VIII

Introduction to the Entwurf

ON THE LEVEL OF PSYCHOSOMATIC REACTIONS
THE REAL IS WITHOUT FISSURE
THE REDISCOVERY OF THE OBJECT

In a quite precise manner, Professor Lagache was looking for an empiricism yesterday evening, in a way which cannot fail to make one suspicious.[1] For no empiricism is possible without an advanced conceptualisation, as Freud's work clearly shows. One can only make headway in the empirical domain to the extent that the conceptualisation be taken up again at every moment and enriched. Look up the article 'Instincts and their vicissitudes'.[2]

We have often heard it maintained that sciences should be built up on clear and sharply defined basic concepts. In actual fact no science, not even the most exact, begins with such definitions. The true beginning of scientific activity consists rather in describing phenomena and then in proceeding to group, classify and correlate them. Even at the stage of description it is not possible to avoid applying certain abstract ideas to the material in hand, ideas derived from somewhere or other but certainly not from the new observations alone. Such ideas – which will later become the basic concepts of the science – are still more indispensable as the material is further worked over. They must at first necessarily possess some degree of indefiniteness; there can be no question of any clear delimitation of their content. So long as they remain in this condition, we come to an understanding about their meaning by making repeated references to the material of observation from which they appear to have been derived, but upon which, in fact, they have been imposed. Thus, strictly speaking, they are in the nature of conventions – although everything depends on their not being arbitrarily chosen but determined by their having significant relations to the empirical material, relations that we seem to sense before we can clearly recognise and demonstrate them. It is only after more thorough investigation of the field of observation that we are able to formulate its basic scientific concepts with increased precision, and progressively so to modify them that they become serviceable and consistent over a wide area.

They say Freud isn't a philosopher. I don't mind, but I don't know of any text concerning the working up of scientific theory which is philosophically more profound.

Then, indeed, the time may have come to confine them in definitions. The advance of knowledge, however, does not tolerate any rigidity even in definitions. Physics furnishes an excellent illustration of the way . . .

This was written in 1915.

O. MANNONI: After Galileo, though.

But before Einstein. So, a continual reworking of concepts, which can shatter what we call rational frameworks.

. . . in which even 'basic concepts' that have been established in the form of definitions are constantly being altered in their content.

A conventional basic concept of this kind, which at the moment is still somewhat obscure but which is indispensable to us in psychology, is that of an 'instinct', in other words: drive. Let us try to give a content to it by approaching it from different angles.

Note that 'l'instinct' is here the invention of Mme Anne Berman.[3] Freud's text is only concerned with 'pulsion'.[4]

I don't think it was such a mistake on Perrier's part yesterday evening to have emphasized, at the end of his talk, psychosomatic problems and object relations.

The object relation has become an empty catch phrase, allowing one to avoid lots of problems. But, given the point we have reached in our discussions of the various registers in which the relations of the subject are established, the object, in the sense we can give it, is something else. For there to be an object relation, there must already be a narcissistic relation of the ego to the other. Moreover, that is the primary condition for any objectification of the external world – of naive, spontaneous objectification no less than that of scientific objectification.

Perrier wanted to distinguish between organic functions in which there's a representation of the relational element and others, which he contrasted to the first as the inside to the outside, thinking in this way to join up again with a theme constantly in the forefront in the Freudian theory of the psychic economy. I think that that intuition is a good one, but he didn't know how to express it in an adequate manner. The distinction at stake in the psychosomatic reactions of organs is one of a completely different level.

The issue is knowing which organs come into play in the narcissistic

[3] The French translator of many of Freud's works.

[4] 'Drives and their destinies' would be a more accurate translation of the paper's title. The English terms corresponding to the debate between 'instinct' and 'pulsion' are 'instinct' and 'drive'. See Editor's Note in the Introduction, SE XIV 111–12, and SE I xiv–xvi.

imaginary relation to the other whereby the ego is formed, bildet. The imaginary structuration of the ego forms around the specular image of the body itself, of the image of the other. Now, the relation of looking and being looked at does indeed involve an organ, the eye, to give it its name. Some very surprising things can happen here. How are we to approach them, when all aspects of psychosomatics are plunged in the greatest confusion?

(Dr Perrier arrives.)

My dear Perrier, I was in the middle of saying that you lacked a basic distinction, which would probably have shielded your account from some of Valabrega's criticisms.

You were looking for a distinction which takes account of the organs involved in the true psychosomatic process, as you tried to define it. I would like to point out in connection with that, that this process is very far from including everything you told us – if one puts an epileptic in a more settled environment, he sometimes does have fewer fits, but that has nothing to do with psychosomatics. You talked about relational organs, which have a relation to the external world. With respect to the others, you thought they were closer to the immense reserve of excitations of which Freud gives us a picture when he talks about internal instincts. Well, I don't think that's a good distinction.

What's important is that certain organs are caught up in the narcissistic relation, in so far as it structures both the relation of the ego to the other and the constitution of the world of objects. Behind narcissism, you've got auto-erotism, that is, a mass invested with libido inside the organism, whose internal relations, I would say, are as much beyond our ken as entropy is.

In passing, I should like to draw your attention to the fact that in the Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality, the passage on libido is added later, sometime around 1920 if I remember right.[5] To think that the theory of the libido was developed at the same time as that of the instinctual phases is an illusion, a result of the fact that the Three Essays was revised several times. Freud fully developed his theory of the libido, the one which occupies the median part of his work, only after having introduced the function of narcissism – I did enough last year to show you that – and only after having realised that the latter was directly involved in the libidinal economy.

I'm coming back to my comparison with entropy so that you appreciate all its import. Among the energy equivalences we can apprehend with respect to a living organism, we can only really know about metabolism, that is, the balance sheet – what goes in and what comes out. There are quantities of energy the organism assimilates, by various means, and there's what, taking everything into account – muscular expenditure, effort, dejections – comes out of the mechanism. To be sure, the laws of thermodynamics are respected – there is degradation of energy. But about everything which happens inside, we know absolutely nothing. For one simple reason – we have no means whatever of measuring the interaction of neighbouring parts, in the way we can in the physical world, the specificity of an organism lying in that everything which happens in one of its points has repercussions in all the others.

The libidinal economy is something which isn't equivalent, but is analogous.

The properly intra-organic investments, which in analysis we call auto-erotic, certainly play a very important role in psychosomatic phenomena. The eroticisation of this or that organ is the metaphor which comes up most often, through our sense of what order of phenomena is at stake in psychosomatic phenomena. And your distinction between psychosomatic neurosis and the psychosomatic phenomenon is precisely marked by this line of separation constituted by narcissism.

Obviously in the neuroses one always comes across defence mechanisms. One musn't talk about it in a loose way, as if these were homogeneous with the defence mechanisms, with the reactions one speaks of within a certain economic conception of the illness. Those implicated here, which are enumerated by Anna Freud as originally constituting the defences of the ego, are always tied to the narcissistic relation in so far as it is strictly structured on the relation to the other, the possible identification with the other, the strict reciprocity between the ego and the other. Indeed, in any narcissistic relation, the ego is the other, and the other is me [moi].

The neurosis is always given its framework by the narcissistic structure. But, as such, it is beyond, on another level.

This other level isn't the level of the object relation, as you claimed, or as Pasche says, with a very unfortunate lapse in conceptual rigour – I say it all the more readily given that he is someone who, at one time, showed greater promise. If psychosomatic reactions as such suggest something, it is that they are outside the register of neurotic constructs. It isn't an object relation. It's a relation to something which always lies on the edge of our conceptual elaborations, which we are always thinking about, which we sometimes speak of, and which, strictly speaking, we can't grasp, and which is nonetheless there, don't forget it – I talk about the symbolic, about the imaginary, but there is also the real. Psychosomatic relations are at the level of the real.

DR PERRIER: That is precisely what I tried to say.

But you didn't say it. You cited Pasche on the object relation. If you put things at that level, you get yourself lost in the relations to the primal, maternal object, you end up with a kind of clinical pat.[6] Nothing comes out of it. In contrast, reference to the term 'real' can on this occasion make its fruitfulness felt.

DR PERRIER: After citing Pasche, I believe I insisted on the fact that the psychosomatic patient had a direct relation to the real, the world, and not to the object, and that the therapeutic relation he established with a physician, however undifferentiated it was, reintroduced the register of narcissism to him. And it is to the extent that this buffer enabled him to come back to a more human dimension that he was cured of his psychosomatic cycle.

I'm not saying that what you said was silly. What I'm saying is that, from the point of view of terminological rigour, you wouldn't have been vulnerable to Valabrega's criticisms if you had introduced the term 'real', rather than that of 'object'.

M. VALABREGA: The reference to narcissism is essential. Narcissism does however lead to an object relation, with the body itself.

That's all I'm saying.

I spoke earlier on of voyeurism-exhibitionism, and of a drive whose source lies in an organ, the eye. But its object isn't the eye. Similarly, what pertains to the register of sado-masochism also has its origin in an organic set-up, the musculature, but everything points to the fact that its object, although not unrelated to this muscular structure, is something other. In contrast, when it is a matter of those investments we call auto-erotic, we can't distinguish the source from the object. We know nothing about it, but it seems that what we can conceive of is an investment in the organ itself.

You see the difference. You also see the extent to which auto-erotism remains mysterious, almost impenetrable. This doesn't mean that we won't make some progress later on. If Perrier doesn't mind, after the effort he made, not slipping immediately into the reaction of sleepiness and repose, which is what the pleasure principle naturally longs for, but sustaining that effort, and preparing for us next time this little chapter entitled 'Instincts and their vicissitudes'.

Remember this, regarding externality and internality – this distinction makes no sense at all at the level of the real. The real is without fissure. What I teach you about Freud's convergence with what we may call philosophy of science is that we have no means of apprehending this real – on any level and not only on that of knowledge – except via the go-between of the symbolic.

The real is absolutely without fissure. Let us not conceal the flaw in theories initially so appealing, even fruitful, as that of von Frisch. Reciprocal holism, taking an Umwelt to correspond to an Innenwelt is a petitio principii right at the outset of biological investigation. It may be of interest as a hypothesis, but nothing obliges us to think such a thing. The notion of reflected relations of the living being with its environment, the hypothesis of a pre-established harmony, even if we give it the broadest sense, is a premise whose validity nothing goes to demonstrate. If other modes of research, such as atomism, associationism, etc., against which we can raise all kinds of criticisms, are more fruitful, it is because they move away from this hypothesis, because without knowing it they place symbolism in the foreground. They project it into the real, they imagine that it is the elements of the real which are of relevance. But it is simply symbolism which they bring into operation inside the real, not by virtue of projection, nor as a framework of thought, but by virtue of being an instrument of investigation. The real is without fissure. And in that hypothetical state of auto-enclosure which is presupposed by Freudian theory to be that of the subject right at the start, what could it possibly mean to say that the subject is everything?

M. VALABREGA: The problem doesn't arise apropos of the real, but apropos of the distinction between apparatuses with relations to the real and the non-relational ones.

The distinction is drawn between what is included in the narcissistic relation and what isn't. It is at the seam where the imaginary joins the real that the differentiation takes place.

Last time I wanted to give you an initial insight into the meaning of the question – what happens beyond the pleasure principle? My great friend Jean Hyppolite, who isn't here today because he is in Germany, told me he had read Beyond the Pleasure Principle again. I think he is at least as busy as most of you. So, it's time to think of reading. In a fortnight we will talk about it again text in hand.

Last time I told you that symbolism is essential to all the most basic manifestations of the analytic domain, namely to repetition, and that we must think of it as tied to a circular process of the exchange of speech. There is a symbolic circuit external to the subject, tied to a certain group of supports, of human agents, in which the subject, the small circle which is called his destiny, is indeterminately included.

I make an image, I incurve my thought, you do realise that that's not quite how understanding comes about.

A certain exchange of relations, both external and internal, takes place which has to be represented as a speech that is recited. With a recording machine, one could isolate it, preserve it. For the most part, it escapes the subject, who doesn't possess the recording machines in question, and continues, comes back, always ready to re-enter the dance of the inner speech.

Naturally, the subject can spend his entire life without making out what it's about. It is after all what most commonly happens. Analysis is made for him to make out, for him to understand in what circle of speech he is caught, and by the same token into what other circle he must enter.

Now we are going to retrace our steps and talk about the Entwurf.

It is a manuscript which Freud didn't publish, and which was discovered. It dates from September 1895, so from before The Interpretation of Dreams, from the period during which Freud was engaged in, not his self-analysis, but simply his analysis, that is to say when he was on his road of discovery. It tells us how Freud conceived of the psychic apparatus. This text is vital to the history of Freud's thought and, in the light of the punctuation which we will give it, it reveals the signification of what was to follow, of the theory of the Traumdeutung. It tells us how Freud was forced to rework his original conceptions. You will see the dream machine join up with this machine whose sketch I gave you earlier on apropos of the discourse of the other, and many others.

Today Anzieu will give us an analysis of what should be brought out in this text.

Interventions in the course of Anzieu's presentation.

In 1895, the theory of the neuron hadn't got anywhere. Freud's ideas on the synapse are entirely original. He plumps for the synapse as such, that is to say for rupture in continuity from one nerve cell to the next.

. . . . . .

What we are given as being the vitalist system, the reflex arc, according to the simplest schema of stimulus-response, seems to obey solely the law of discharge. There is a pure and simple general inertia. The circuit is drawn shut by the shortest path. To this, Freud tags on a buffer-system, a system inside the system, from which the ego system originates. The reality principle is here introduced in reference to the ψ system, turned towards the inside. Later on, the terms will criss-cross.

The ω system is already a prefiguration of the id system. Explain what makes its invention necessary. For, when all is said and done, until then, everything worked very well. Not the least bit of consciousness. But it must nonetheless be brought back in, and Freud does so in the paradoxical form of a system which has quite exceptional laws. The period has to pass through it with the minimum expenditure of energy, with almost no expenditure of energy – he can't say none at all.

Here for the first time we find ourselves faced with this difficulty, which reoccurs at every turn throughout Freud's work –one doesn't know what to do with the system of consciousness. Very special laws must be attributed to it, and it has to be placed outside of the laws of energy equivalence which govern the movements of quantity. Why can't he dispense with bringing it in altogether? What is he going to do with it? What function does it have?

. . . . . .

Apropos of states of desire, what Freud puts into play is the correspondence between the object which appears and the structures already constituted in the ego. He stresses the following – either what appears is what is expected and that isn't in the least interesting – or it doesn't work out well and that's very interesting, for any kind of construction of the object world is always an attempt to rediscover the object, Wiederzufinden.[7] Freud distinguishes two completely different structurations of human experience – one which, along with Kierkegaard, I called ancient, based on reminiscence, presupposing agreement, harmony between man and the world of his objects, which means that he recognises them, because in some way, he has always known them – and, on the contrary, the conquest, the structuration of the world through the effort of labour, along the path of repetition. To the extent that what appears to him corresponds only partially with what has already gained him satisfaction, the subject engages in a quest, and repeats his quest indefinitely until he rediscovers this object.

The object is encountered and is structured along the path of a repetition – to find the object again, to repeat the object. Except, it never is the same object which the subject encounters. In other words, he never ceases generating substitutive objects.

Within this theory, which seems to hold up, we find then the first hint, at a materialist level, of the process of the function of repetition as structuring the world of objects.

This is the sketch of this fruitful something which is going to be the foundation of the psychology of conflict, and which makes a bridge between libidinal experience as such and the world of human knowledge, which is characterised by the fact that, for the most part, it escapes from the field of the forces of desire. The human world isn't at all structurable as an Umwelt, fitting inside an Innenwelt of needs, it isn't enclosed, but rather open to a crowd of extraordinarily varied neutral objects, of objects which no longer even have anything to do with objects, in their radical function as symbols.

The ego experiences reality not only in so far as it lives it, but in so far as it neutralises it as much as possible. And this takes place to the extent that the system of derivation comes into play. You didn't put enough stress on the fact that Freud locates the process of derivation in the branching of neurons, thus accounting for the fact that the scattered and individuated influx of energy doesn't pass through. And it is to the extent that it doesn't pass through that a comparison becomes possible with the information which the system gives us in terms of periodicity, namely on account of the energy reduced, not perhaps in its potential, but in its intensity.

In this initial sketch of the ego, there is a first hint of what will be revealed to be like the structural condition of the construction of the object world in man – the rediscovery of the object. But the reference to the other, which is also essential to the structuration of the object, is completely missing. In other words, as in Condillac's statue, the objectivated organisation of the world seems to be a matter of course. And the discovery of narcissism for us takes on all of its significance for not having at all been perceived by Freud at this earlier point in time.

Following the path of eighteenth-century philosophers, and like every one else at the time, Freud reconstructs everything, memory, judgement, etc., starting off from sensation, and only stopping for one moment in the quest for the object in itself. But he finds himself returning to the primary process in so far as it concerns sleep and dreams. And this is how even this mechanical reconstruction of reality still leads to the dream.

Let us stop there for today. Does Valabrega want to assume responsibility for establishing the link with the completed theory of the primary and secondary processes in the Traumdeutung?

OPPOSITION AND MEDIATION
THE PRIMARY PROCESS
THE ENTIFICATION OF PERCEPTION-CONSCIOUSNESS

Yesterday evening, after Lang's talk,[1] Lefèbvre-Pontalis made the following comment to you all, that we should control ourselves about the mirror stage.

His remark has my assent, in that its use should not be abused. The mirror stage isn't a magic word. It's already a bit dated. Since I put it out in 1936, it's about twenty years old. It's beginning to be in need of a bit of renovation – which isn't always for the best, for in order to make progress, one should know how to go back over things. It isn't so much repeating it that is a bore, as not using it properly. And in this respect, Lang gets full marks.

(M. Lefèbvre-Pontalis arrives.)

Ah, here comes the rebel! I assure you that there is something it's possible you, Lefèbvre-Pontalis, have not the faintest idea about, which is the extent to which the diagnosis of psychosis in a child is debated and debatable. In a way, one never knows if it is a good thing to use the same word for psychoses in children and in adults. For decades, everyone refused to believe that there could be genuine psychoses in children – one sought to link the phenomena to various organic conditions. Psychosis isn't structured at all in the same way in the child and in the adult. If we legitimately speak of psychosis in children, it is because, as analysts, we can advance a step further than the others in our conception of psychosis.

As we don't yet have a doctrine on this subject, not even in our group, Lang was in a difficult position.

The greatest confusion still reigns when it comes to adult psychosis, a fortiori concerning child psychosis. But if Lang's work seemed to me entirely appropriate, it is because he tried to do something which is indispensable when it is a matter of analytic understanding, and especially when one goes up to the limits, namely – stepping back.

[1] On 1 February 1955, Dr J. L. Lang led a discussion at the Société Française de Psychanalyse under the title 'A psychoanalytic approach to psychosis in the child'.

There are two dangers in anything related to the understanding of our clinical domain.

The first is not to be sufficiently curious. Children are taught that curiosity is a terrible fault, and on the whole, it's true, we aren't curious, and it isn't easy to generate this feeling in an automatic way.

The second is to understand. We always understand too much, especially in analysis. Most of the time, we're fooling ourselves. One thinks one can do a good therapeutic analysis if one is gifted, intuitive, when one has made contact, if one puts to work the genius which each person deploys in an interpersonal relation. And from the moment one doesn't demand extreme conceptual rigour of oneself, one always finds some way to understand. But one is left without a compass, you know neither where you started, nor where you are trying to get to.

Can the contrast with the psychosis of children enlighten us as to what we should think about adult psychosis? That is what Lang tried to do, and he did it very well. With great tact he pointed out the incoherences, divergences and gaps in the systems of Melanie Klein and of Anna Freud, to the benefit, in the end, of Melanie Klein, because the system of Anna Freud is, from the analytical point of view, in an impasse.

I really liked what he said about regression. He pointed out that it was a symbol, and not a mechanism which will occur in reality. You know that I don't like to resort to the term of magical thought at every turn, but this is indeed something which resembles a magician's thought. Do we ever see any adult actually regress, return to the state of a small child, start wailing? Regression doesn't exist. As Lang remarks, it is a symptom which must be interpreted as such. There is regression on the plane of signification and not on the plane of reality. In the child, it is sufficiently well borne out by the simple observation that he hasn't much room to regress in.

I reread a note in The Interpretation of Dreams about the processes and mechanisms of the psychology of the dream, in which Freud cites Jackson – Find out all about dreams and you will have found out all about insanity.[2]

Well, that's just not true. It's got nothing to do with it. Get that clear in your heads. They indubitably work with the same elements, the same symbols, and one can find analogies between them. But that isn't our way of looking at things. It all hangs on this – why isn't a dream madness? Or inversely, what needs to be defined in madness is how it is that its determining mechanism has got nothing to do with what happens every night in dreams.

[2] (1900a) GW II/III 575; Stud II 542; SE V 569 n2.

You mustn't think that this should all be credited to Freud. The French edition is incomplete, and doesn't mention that it is a kind of good mark given to Ernest Jones, who had thought it worthwhile to make this link, which he no doubt thought appropriate for linking analysis up with what was already well thought of in England. Let us render up to Jones that which is Jones's, and to Freud that which is Freud's. And don't let go of the idea that the problem of the dream leaves all the economic problems of psychosis completely unresolved.

I can't tell you more about that today. This is a foretaste of things to come. We may be able to start thinking about psychosis already this year. In any case, we will have to devote ourselves to it next year.

Let us return to Freud's text.

I asked Valabrega to continue the commentary, but I will immediately draw you a schema on the blackboard, to which you will be able to refer so as to grasp the trend of what is being explored here. In fact, I will draw four schemata, of comparable structure, whose differences illustrate the progress of Freud's development.

The first refers to what is sketched out in his first general psychology, which wasn't published, and constituted a reference for himself, full of fruitful insights. The second brings it up to The Interpretation of Dreams, the theory of the psychic apparatus having the explanation of the dream for its object. Take good note of the fact that – after he had supplied all the elements for the interpretation of dreams, he still had to give an account of the dream as psychical function. The third refers to the level of the much later theory of the libido. It isn't at all coeval with the Three Essays, but rather correlative with the advent of the function of narcissism. Finally, the fourth schema – Beyond the Pleasure Principle.

Although they refer to entirely different functions, these schemata are somewhat similar in form. In fact, they are always schemata of the analytic field. At the beginning, Freud calls that psychic apparatus, but you will see the advances he makes, the advances in his conception with respect to what we can call the human being.

That is what it is about. Behind your exigencies at the theoretical level, behind, for instance, Lefèbvre-Pontalis's call yesterday evening, there's the idea that you are confronted with something individual, if not unique, that everything is there, concentrated in the form of what is in front of you, that that is the unity of the object in psychoanalysis, if not in psychology, whose limits and laws are thought to be knowable.

All of you believe yourselves still to be within the domain of psychology, and that the psyche is a kind of double, a kind of property, of this something you see.

It is very odd that you don't grasp the fact that all scientific progress consists in making the object as such fade away. In physics, for instance, the further you advance, the less you grasp the object. What pertains to the order of perception interests physicists only at the level of exchanges of energy, atoms, molecules, which only produce the perceptible appearance in a contingent and transitory way.

This isn't to say that for us the human being fades away.[3]

You must know, being philosophers, that being and the object aren't at all the same thing. From the scientific point of view, we cannot grasp being, of course, since it doesn't belong to the scientific order. But even so, psychoanalysis is an experience which delineates, if one can say it, its vanishing point. It stresses that man isn't an object, but a being in the process of becoming, something metaphysical. Is that our object, our scientific object? Certainly not, but neither is our object the individual who apparently embodies this being.

In every dream, Freud says, there's an absolutely incomprehensible point, belonging to the domain of the unknown – he calls this the navel of the dream.[4] Such things aren't emphasised in his text because people probably think it's poetry. It isn't. It means that there is a point which cannot be grasped in the phenomenon, the point where the relation of the subject to the symbolic surfaces. What I call being is that last word, which is certainly not accessible to us in our scientific position, but whose direction is indicated to us in the phenomena of our experience.

What matters to us is knowing where we have to locate ourselves in our relation to what we call our partner. Now, if there is anything that is obvious, it is that there are two different dimensions in this unique phenomenon of the inter-human relation, although they never cease getting caught up with one another – one is that of the imaginary, the other is that of the symbolic. In some way, they criss-cross, and we must always know what function we have, in what dimension we are located, in relation to the subject, in a way which produces either an opposition, or a mediation. To think that these two dimensions are in fact one, because they are mixed up together in the phenomenon, is simply wrong. You end up with a kind of magical communication, a universal analogy, which is what many people base the theorisation of their experience on. In the concrete and the particular, it can often be very rewarding, but can in no way be developed, and is liable to every error in technique.

All this is very abbreviated, but it will both be made precise and illustrated by the fourth schema, which corresponds to the last stage in Freud's thought, Beyond the Pleasure Principle.

[3] The verb here. 's'évanouir', also means 'to faint'. Cf. Lacan's later usage of 'fading' (English in the original) apropos of the movement of the subject. e.g. E 835.

Interventions in the course of M. Valabrega's presentation.

What is Freud calling the system ϕ? He starts from the schema of the reflex-arc in its simplest version, which offered such hope of grasping the relations of the living being with its environment. This schema displays the essential property of the system of relations of a living being – it receives something, an excitation, and it responds with something.

Don't forget that the notion of response always implies that we are dealing with an adapted being. This reflex-arc schema came out of the first experiments on frogs, for instance, at the time when electricity, which, as you will see, will teach us so many things as a model, was starting to make its appearance in the world. The frog is electrically stimulated, or else a drop of acid is placed on its leg. It scratches this leg with the other – that's what one calls the response. There isn't just the afferent-efferent pair. One must also assume that the response has a purpose, which is to say that the living being is an adapted being.

All this is taken on by Freud when he begins his construction. And already he seems to include in it the notion of equilibrium, in other words a principle of inertia. But that isn't at all legitimate. The stimulus that Valabrega calls somewhat prematurely information, is nothing more than an in-put,[5] a put-inside. This is a pre-scientific way of approaching the problem, it dates from before the introduction of the notion of energy, and even from well before Condillac's statue. There is no consideration of energy in this basic schema. It is only when Freud takes into account that what happens in the ϕ system must have an affect on the ψ system, that the notion of a quota of energy comes up. And it is only then that he specifies that the ψ system has to deal with internal promptings, that is to say needs.

What are needs? They are things which are closely linked to the organism, and which are clearly distinguishable from desire. Yesterday evening, Lang was deploring the fact that desire is always confused with need, and, indeed, it isn't at all the same thing. Need[5] expresses how this system, which is a special system within the organism, connects up with the general homeostasis of the organism. Here therefore the notion of energy constancy necessarily comes up, already emerging at this point in Freud's work, in transversal fashion. Freud considers that there is an energy equivalence between ψ, which experiences something from within the organism, and ϕ which produces something related to its needs. That becomes completely mysterious – we are absolutely ignorant as to what it might mean, to say that there's an equivalence of energy between the internal pressure, tied to the equilibrium of the organism, and what results from it. So what use does it serve? It's an x, which, after having been used as a starting point, is totally abandoned.

Freud can't be satisfied with the in-put,[6] with what is brought in from the external world, and he has to improvise. So he introduces a supplementary apparatus, ω. We said it already last time, all this is a play of writing.

The task is to build everything up from notions of energy, that is to say, from the idea that in order to pull a rabbit out of a hat, one must first put it in it. For something to come out, something must go in. Everything will be constructed on this basis. Most probably it involves the system of perception. Let us not be premature and call it consciousness. In what follows, Freud confounds it with the system of consciousness, but he has to introduce the latter as a supplementary hypothesis. Why? Because he needs not only stimuli from the external world, but the external world itself. He needs an internal apparatus which reflects not only the stimuli of the external world, but also, in a manner of speaking, its structure.

Freud isn't a Gestaltist – one cannot give him credit for everything – but he does sense the theoretical demands which gave rise to the Gestaltist construction. Indeed, so that a living being doesn't perish every time it turns round, it must possess some adequate reflection of the external world. This tells you that this schema is in fact based on what will later be isolated in the term 'homeostasis'. We find this here already in the notion of an equilibrium which has to be conserved and of a buffer-zone, which maintains the excitations at the same level, which therefore serves as much for not recording as for recording badly. It records, but in a filtered fashion. The notion of homeostasis is therefore already there, implying something which is called an energy both at the entry and the exit.

Except, this schema proves to be inadequate. If the nervous system in fact operates a filtering, it is an organised, progressive filtering, which brings with it facilitations.[7] However, nothing here entitles one to think that the facilitations will ever have a functional utility. The sum total of all these facilitations, the events, the incidents which have occurred in the development of the individual, constitutes a model which provides the measure of the real. Is that the imaginary? The imaginary must indeed be here. But as such it includes an intervention from the Gestalten predisposing the living subject to a certain relation with a typical form which specifically corresponds to it, it presupposes a biological coupling of the individual with an image of its own species, with the images of what is biologically useful for it in a determinate environment. Of this, there is no trace here. There is only a zone of experience and a zone of facilitation.

[7] Freud's term is 'Bahnung', translated in SE (and here) as 'facilitation', and in the French edition as 'frayage'.

In short, memory is here conceived of as a succession of engrams, as the sum of a series of facilitations, and this conception proves to be completely inadequate if we don't introduce the notion of image into it. If one assumes that a series of facilitations, a succession of experiences, brings into existence an image in a psychic apparatus conceived of as a simple sensitive sheet, it goes without saying that as soon as the same series is reactivated by a new excitation, pressure, a need, the same image is reproduced. In other words, all stimuli tend to produce hallucinations. The principle of operation of the ϕ apparatus is hallucination. That is what primary process means.

From then on the problem is that of the relation of hallucination to reality. Freud is led to reinstate the consciousness system and its paradoxical autonomy, from the point of view of energy. If the sequence of experiences has hallucinatory effects, there must be a correcting apparatus, a test of reality. This test of reality presupposes a comparison between the hallucination and something which is given in experience and preserved in the memory of the psychic apparatus. From then on, the price for having wanted to eliminate completely the consciousness system is that Freud is forced to reinstate it with an added autonomy.

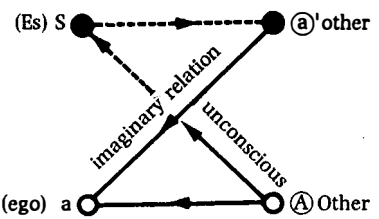
Optical schema for the theory of narcissism



The imaginary function of the ego and the discourse of the unconscious

I'm not saying that this is illegitimate. But you can see where it leads. What detours will he have to take in order to conceive of this reference comparison between what is given in experience in the system ψ, the buffer-system, the homeostasis system, which moderates the promptings, and the registration of these promptings? To what supplementary hypothesis is he brought? In effect the supplementary hypotheses provide the measure of the difficulties he faces.

They can be grouped under the two headings which Valabrega distinguished – inhibitions and information.

The system ω is made up of differentiated organs which do not register the massive energies coming from the external world. One can imagine energies so massive – changes in temperature, considerable pressures – that they put into question the continued existence of the living organism. If it is no longer capable of buffering, there isn't much else for it to do but take flight. But that is absolutely irrelevant to what is interesting. What concerns us here are the relations of the psyche with the subtle determinations of the external world. Take solar energy – the specialised apparatus retains only a part of the phenomenon. It selects a certain frequency, gets in tune, not really with the energy as such – what would we be like as transformers, photoelectric cells? – but with the period. When an eye receives light, it retains far less energy than a green leaf, which does all sorts of things with this same light. Freud is therefore led to identify quality as pertaining to the specialised apparatus, implying the almost complete erasure of any energy contribution.

You do perceive that the notion of an exclusively perceptive discharge corresponds, in this apparatus, to a simple need for symmetry. He really is obliged to concede a certain constancy of energy as well, and that what is let in must turn up again somewhere.

But the emphasis is placed on the fact that between excitation and discharge, there is the minimum displacement of energy. Why? Because this system must be as independent as possible of displacements of energy. He is obliged to detach, to distinguish from the energy, pure quality, that is, the external world seen as a simple reflection.

For there to be a comparison, a common scale, between the inside, where the image depends only on memory, where it is hallucinatory by nature, and the outside, the ego, doubly emphasising the regulatory function of this buffer, must allow the maximum inhibition of the passage of energy through this system. What enters as a prompting, already considerably filtered, must be filtered again, so it can be compared with the specific images which arise in consequence of need. What has to be ascertained is the level of the pressure of the need, whether it will impose itself in the face of all counter-evidence, or whether the quantity of displaced energy can be sufficiently buffered, sifted, by the ego for it to realise that the image isn't actually real.

In other words, thinking within the tradition that starts with the reflex and little by little succeeds in deducing the entire gamut – perception, memory, thought, ideas – Freud is led to construct a consciousness-perception which is turned into an entity within a system. Which is not completely absurd. This differentiated system does exist, we do have some notion of it, we can even locate it more or less. It demarcates two zones in the psychic apparatus – a zone of imagination, of memory, or better still of memorial hallucination, in relation to a perceptual system which is specialised as such. Here consciousness is a reflection of reality.

M. VALABREGA: Yes, but that comes to light only much later. Freud still doesn't as yet have a clear idea of the notion of the psychic apparatus which he will set up later with the perception-consciousness system. Here, there are only the elements.

The elements, that's ω.

M. VALABREGA: They aren't conceived of as being what he will later call the psychic apparatuses.

On the contrary I think that the apparatuses as such are already present here. Why would he call them ψ, ϕ, ω if he didn't distinguish them as being apparatuses?

M. VALABREGA: In what follows, he distinguishes two basic elements in the ψ system itself, and that is what yields the psychic apparatus.

But what I want to show you next time is precisely that the term psychic apparatus is totally inadequate to cover what is in the Traumdeutung, where the temporal dimension begins to emerge.

M. VALABREGA: When it comes to the ego and the indications of reality, there are three distinctions to be made. Firstly, if the ego is in a state of desire[8] at the time when the indication of reality appears, a discharge of energy through the specific action takes place. This first case simply corresponds to the satisfaction of the desire. Secondly, an increase in unpleasure coincides with the indication of reality. The system ψ reacts by initiating defence through a lateral investment.

That means that the quantity of energy passing through several neuronic filters arrives with a smaller level of intensity at the synapses – that's the electrical schema. If you pass a current down three or four wires instead of one, each of these wires will require less resistance, in proportion to the number of wires. Finally, thirdly, if neither one nor other of these two cases occurs the investment can augment without hindrance, in accordance with the dominant tendency.

Judgement, thought, etc., are inhibited discharges of energy. Freud was to continue to employ this construct, when he later said that thought is an act carried out with a minimum level of investment. It is in a way a simulated act. That it is a reflection of the world must be conceded, in as much as experience obliges us to posit a neutral perception – I say neutral from the point of view of investments, that is to say, a perception with minimal investments.

If animal psychology has made any progress, it is in so far as it has emphasised lines of force in the world, in the Umwelt of the animal, lines of forces, configurations which are for it preformed points of appeal corresponding to its needs, that is to say to what is also called its Innenwelt, the structure linked with the preservation of its form.

[8] Here, as elsewhere, Freud's 'Wunsch' is rendered in French by 'désir', which has here been translated by 'desire'. The corresponding passages in the Project are thus those dealing with 'wishful states' (see SE I 319ff).

In fact, it isn't enough to speak of the homeostasis of energy. The needs of a crab aren't those of a rabbit, and the one isn't interested in the same things as the other.

But explore just the field of perception of a rabbit, a crab, or a bird. Offer a rat or a chicken something it finds eminently desirable, food, the object which satisfies one of its needs, and systematically place this object in correlation with a form or a colour. It's amazing, the number of things which a chicken, even a crab, is capable of perceiving, whether it be through senses analogous to ours – sight, hearing – or through apparatuses which have every indication of being sensory apparatuses without our being able to give them an anthropomorphic analogue – in the case of grasshoppers, for instance. In any case, you will see that the sensory field which is at the disposition of a given animal is extremely extended in comparison with what acts so as electively to structure its Umwelt. In other words, there isn't just a simple coaptation of the Innenwelt to the Umwelt, a preformed structuration of the external world as a function of needs. Each animal has a zone of consciousness – we say consciousness in as much as a reception of the external world inside the sensory system occurs – much larger in scope than anything we could structure in the way of preformed responses to its pivotal needs.

In a certain sense, this corresponds closely with the schema's generalised sensitive layer. Man has in fact much more information about reality than he could acquire through the simple pulsation of his experience. But he lacks what I call the preformed paths. Man starts with nothing at all. He has to learn that wood burns and that you musn't throw yourself into the void.

It isn't true that he must learn all of that. But what does he know at birth? It's ambiguous. It is likely that he learns it, but by paths other than those of the animal. He already has a certain detector, a certain knowledge – in Claudel's sense, co-naissance[9] of reality, which is none other than these Gestalten, the preformed images. It is not only a necessity for Freudian theory to admit it, but something which animal psychology requires – either there is a neutral recording apparatus, which constitutes a reflection of the world, which we call, with Freud, conscious, or there isn't.

Except, in man, it becomes visible with the particular configuration we call consciousness, in as much as the imaginary function of the ego comes into play. Man gets to see this reflection from the point of view of the other. He is an other for himself. This is what gives you the illusion that consciousness is transparent to itself. We aren't present, in the reflection; to see the reflection, we are in the consciousness of the other.

As you can see, the rational schema of the psychic apparatus proposed by Freud isn't elaborated, and this is what makes for the thanklessness of our discourse today. It is the first occasion on which Freud spreads his wings. Everything is simultaneously crude, ambiguous, and, in certain respects, superfluous, and yet, nonetheless, it was to be fruitful.

The notion of equivalence, for instance, is here a bastard notion. Needs exist, Freud says, and these needs push the human being into reactions aimed at satisfying them. Now, this notion, far from being vitalist, far from being forcibly introduced into the pseudo-mechanistic schema, is in reality an energetic notion. The quantity of neuronal energy is there from the start. The conjunction of this conception with the experience of the dream will produce a striking transformation in the schema, as you will see.

All this probably seems sterile and archaic to you. But what's important for us is to grasp what in this schema opens on to the future, and forces Freud's conception to develop. It is not at all, as Kris would like to have us believe, that Freud moved from a mechanistic to a psychological conception, a crass opposition which doesn't mean anything. He never did abandon his schema. He elaborated it in his theory of the dream, without marking, nor even perceiving, the differences, and he thus took the decisive step which introduces us into the psychoanalytic domain proper. There is no such thing as Freud's conversion to organo-psychological thought. It is always the same thought unfolding. One might say that his metaphysics never changes, but that he completes his schema, by introducing something entirely different into it, namely the notion of information.

Learn how to let your thoughts dwell on these thankless moments, and don't forget that these are the first moments of a creative thought, whose development carries us far beyond.

THE CONVERSATION WITH FLIESS

It is a fundamental law of all healthy criticism that it applies to a work the very principles which it itself employs in its own construction. Try, for instance, understanding Spinoza according to the principles which he sets up for himself as being the most valuable for the conduct of thought, for the reform of the understanding.

Another example – Maimonides, also someone who gives us certain keys to the world. Within his work, there are explicit warnings as to the manner in which one should conduct one's research. Applying them to the work of Maimonides himself enables us to understand what he meant.

So it is a law with a quite general application which leads us to give a reading of Freud which tries to apply to the work itself the rules of comprehension and understanding which it formulates.

Three seminars ago, I began to initiate you into the comprehension, in Beyond the Pleasure Principle, of this x which is called either automatisme de répétition, or Nirvana principle, or death instinct, depending on the case. You have already heard me invoke the notion of entropy. It isn't arbitrary. Freud himself indicates that what he is talking about must be something of the sort. It isn't a question here of taking Freud literally. However, many an analyst, indeed some of the best ones, notably Bernfeld, have failed to forgo the pleasure of making themselves ridiculous in this way.

Bernfeld is an analyst of repute, who knew how to discover one of Freud's childhood memories, behind the veil of anonymity with which the latter had cloaked it when he wrote it up as a screen memory. Freud had presented it in a camouflaged manner by attributing it to a patient, but the text itself, not biographical detective work, but the very structure of the text, enabled Bernfeld to show that it couldn't be a real dialogue with a real patient, that it had to be a transposition, and that the example had to have been taken from Freud's life, which he demonstrates by comparing it to two or three dreams from The Interpretation of Dreams. Those of you who heard my commentary on the Ratman know the passage.

Bernfeld, therefore, some ten years after the publication of the major text which we are in the middle of commenting upon, gave, with Feitelberg, in the International Journal of Psycho-analysis for 1931, an account of I know not what, for which no language has a name, which is a piece of research. The title of it is – The Principle of Entropy and the Death Instinct. They tried to study the paradoxical pulsation of entropy within a living organism, to be more exact, in man's nervous system, by comparing the brain and the rectal temperature. In this way they thought to acquire evidence of paradoxical variations, that is to say, variations not conforming to the principle of entropy as it functions in physics for an inanimate system.

It is very odd to read it, if only because it indicates the aberrations which taking a theoretical metaphor literally can lead to.

In fact for Freud it is a matter of understanding human behaviour. To this end, he wonders whether there might not be room for employing a category analogous to those used in physics. So he introduces the dimension of entropy in so far as it is found in the analytic situation, this novel form of communication. One must keep a hold on all of these dimensions, in order to understand Freud's proposals, which concern not only the living organism as objectifiable at the psychic level, but the signification of its behaviour, precisely in so far as it comes into play in this particular relation, the analytic relation, which can only be understood as a communication. That is the framework which gives the comparison between the death instinct and entropy its meaning. To take this analogy literally, to translate it into the precise terms used in physics, is a misinterpretation as absurd as the work of Borel's monkey typists. Only too often will we have to decry in analysts the work of monkey typists.

Throughout these four stages of Freud's thought that I've mentioned – indicated by the unpublished manuscript whose commentary we are now bringing to completion, The Interpretation of Dreams, the constitution of the theory of narcissism, and finally Beyond the Pleasure Principle – the difficulties and the impasses are reproduced each time in a modified form. We are going to follow out this kind of negative dialectic, which implies the persistence of the same antinomies under transformed guises, so that we bring out the autonomy, the true order, of what it is Freud is tackling, which he endeavours to formalise.

You cannot but know, after a year and a half of seminar here, that this order is the symbolic order, with structures proper to it, with its own dynamism, with the mode specific to the manner in which it intervenes so as to impose its coherence, its economy, which is autonomous to the human being and his experience. It is through that that I indicate to you the originality of the Freudian discovery. Let us say by way of illustration for those who don't understand anything, that the symbolic order is what is most elevated in man and what isn't in man, but elsewhere. To the extent that he makes progress in his synthesis, Freud is always forced to reinstate, to restitute this external, excentric, point. We are now going to try to rediscover the stages of this progress in the text.

The other day I described to you the ψ system, as crudely representing the reflex-arc, based on the notion of quantity and of discharge, with a minimum of content. Freud, trained in neurological, anatomo-physiological and clinical disciplines, is not satisfied with the model on offer from positivist physiology at the time, namely, a reflex architecture – higher reflexes, reflexes of reflexes, etc., up to the reflex of unity located at the level of the higher functions. And one would still have had to add to it something which our friend Leclaire would, on one of his good days, call the subject. I hope that one day he will get rid of that as well, for the subject must never be represented anywhere.

Freud has to produce something different. What he produces isn't an architecture, but a buffer.

Freud is here already ahead of neuron theory, he anticipates Foster and Sherrington by two years. The genius in him emerges here, right down to the smallest detail, apropos of some of the properties of conduction – he guessed more or less what we know today. Of course, there have been experimental advances, which have confirmed the functioning of the synapses as contact barriers, and that is the way in which he already puts it. The important point is that in the process leading to the act of discharge, he interposes a buffer-system, an equilibrating system, a system which filters, damps down the system ψ. Moreover, to what does he compare it? In this schema, you can see within a spinal arc, something which looks like a ball – it's a ganglion. Well, in his view, psyche is a ganglion, the brain is a differentiated ganglion, of the sympathetic kind, like the chain of nerves in insects.

My dialogue with Valabrega last time was a little wayward – he said some things which weren't wrong about the system ω. Freud can't get by without the intervention of this system of consciousness as a reference to this reality out of which, try as one might, one will never manage to pull a rabbit without having put it there in the first place. With Freud at least, no one tries to make you believe that piling up enough things is sufficient to make what's on top that much more beautiful than it was when it was at the bottom.

Freud's experience forces him to remodel the structure of the human subject by decentring it in relation to the ego, and by shifting consciousness to a no doubt essential, but problematic, position. I would say that the elusive, irreducible nature of consciousness with respect to the functioning of living things is something which, in Freud's work, is as important to grasp as what he tells us about the unconscious.

The difficulties which this system of consciousness raises reappear at each level of Freud's theorising. Freud doesn't succeed in finding a coherent model of it, and this isn't due to the existence of the unconscious. While he can give a coherent, balanced account of the majority of the other parts of the psychic apparatus, when it's a question of consciousness, he always encounters mutually contradictory conditions.

I'll give you an example. In one of his papers, called 'A metapsychological supplement to the theory of dreams',[1] published in French in the collection Métapsychologie, he explains almost everything which happens in dementia praecox, in paranoia, in dreams, in terms of investments and disinvestments – notions whose importance in his theory we will have to ascertain. We are led to believe that a theoretical construction can always be made to work, made to hang together somehow. Not so. The apparatus of consciousness has quite special properties, and the very coherence of his system, the necessity of his deduction, brings Freud up short. We fail to understand how, he says, this apparatus, in contrast to the others, can function even when it is not invested. When it comes to the conscious system, the paradoxes gather.

Why this failure? It isn't because Freud doesn't know how to go about it – he had all the time in the world. If he didn't succeed, there must be a reason.

Here, for the first time, we see the appearance of the paradox of the system of consciousness – it both has to be there, and not be there. If it is included in the energy system as constituted at the ψ level, it won't be any more than a part of it, and won't be able to play its role as reference to reality. Still, some energy has to go through it. But it can't be directly linked to the external world's massive input, as is presumed in the first, so-called discharge, system, that is, of elementary stimulus-response reflex. On the contrary, it must be completely separated off from it, and it must receive only slight investments of energy, which allow it to come into operation, such that the movement always goes from ϕ to ψ and it is only from ψ that ω receives minimal energy, thanks to which it is capable of beginning to vibrate.

On the other hand, beginning with what happens in ω, the system ψ needs information, as Valabrega said the other day, which I found somewhat hasty, but not false in itself. It can only find this information at the level of the discharge of the perceptual system.

The reality test thus takes place in the psyche. Take the example of a properly perceptual motor discharge. Movements in the eye occur as a result of the visual accommodation, of fixation on the object. In comparison with the hallucination of desire, in the process of being formed in the psyche, that is what theoretically should force the issue – Should I believe my eyes? Is this really what I'm looking at? Now, the motor discharge, the properly motoric aspect of the operation of the organs of perception, is precisely that part which is totally unconscious. We are conscious of seeing, and nothing seems to us more homologous to the transparency of consciousness than the fact that we see what we see – seeing imposes its own transparency on itself. But on the other hand, we are not in the least bit aware, except in a very marginal, limitrophe, way, of what we are doing, efficaciously, actively, in a motoric sense, in this synchronisation, in the palpation at a distance which the eyes undertake when they try to see.

So a series of paradoxes begin to be sketched out in relation to the system ω. I wanted to emphasise it because it hints at something which we will find over and over again at every level.

Next, there's the model you'll find in chapter VII of the Traumdeutung, 'The dream process'.[2]

Here, there's a support. Here, something will form a ladder between the perceptual system and the motor system. Here, we find the various layers which constitute the level of the unconscious. Then, there's the preconscious, consciousness, whose paradoxical repositioning you can already see – here it is now, on both sides.

The first model tried to give a true representation of an apparatus, which one then tried to get working. It was an apparatus which was somewhere, with organs of perception, cortex and sub-cortex, functioning like a kind of autonomous ganglion, regulating the pulsation between the drives [pulsions] internal to the organism, and the manifestations of research outside. It was a question of the instinctual [instinctuelle] economy of the living being in quest of what it needs.

Now it is no longer an apparatus. The schema refers to something far more immaterial. Freud underlines this fact – the things he will talk about must not be given spatial location. In the text, he tells us that there is something it must be like. Remember what I told you last year during the lectures on transference, about the optical images which are nowhere. They are seen at a given place when one is somewhere else to see them. That's what this is about.

Freud's schema has changed meaning. He puts the temporal dimension as such on the blackboard – that too is emphasised in the text. This schema, whose general arrangement you can see remains the same, proves then that Freud is already introducing new dimensions into his categories, and in particular a certain logical dimension.

[2] 'Psychology of the dream-processes' in the English translation: 'Zur Psychologie der Traumvorgänge' in the German text.

Even though that could have been embodied in a mechanical model, we have moved on from a mechanical to a logical model.

Before turning to the third model, I would like to remind you that I promised you I'd say something about cybernetics. Why are we so astonished by these machines? It may have something to do with the difficulties Freud encountered. Because cybernetics also stems from a reaction of astonishment at rediscovering that this human language works almost by itself, seemingly to outwit us.

One thinks everything is resolved by saying that it's the little chap who put it there. Which is what we're reminded of by Lévi-Strauss, who is always so wise when faced with new things, and always seems bent on turning them back into old things. I usually like what M. Ruyer writes, but not his book on cybernetics.

Language is certainly there, completely vibrant, in these machines. And it's no small thing that we recognise it by a little song that gives us the greatest pleasure, as I am going to tell you. I discovered it the other day at the Société de Philosophie.

Mme Favez-Boutonier had just given a very good paper on psychoanalysis. She had said things she hoped would be understood by the philosophical audience present there. To be sure, she was too modest in her claims, yet, nonetheless it was way over the top of what a lot of people had managed to understand up until then. Thereupon, M. Minkowski got up, and said what I've heard him say for the last thirty years, regardless of the nature of the talk on psychoanalysis he has to comment on. Between what Mme Favez-Boutonier had just contributed and what he heard thirty years ago on the same topic, from the mouth of Dalbiez, there was a world of difference. And yet, he said exactly the same thing. I don't want to take issue with him personally – that is what usually happens in a scientific society. Why has the paradoxical expression thinking-machine been created? I who say that men think only very rarely, I'm not going to speak of thinking machines – but all the same, what happens in a thinking machine is on average on an infinitely higher level than what happens in a scientific society. If you give a thinking machine different elements, it, at least, answers something different.

From the point of view of language, these little machines purr something new for us, perhaps an echo, an approximation let us say. One can't resolve the issue simply by saying that it is the builder who put it there. The language came from outside, that's understood, but it isn't enough to say that it's the little chap who put it there. If anyone has something to say on the matter, it's the psychoanalyst, who is constantly reminded that the matter isn't closed by believing that the little genius of a chap did it all.

The big question for the human sciences now is – what is language? One wonders – where does it come from? What happened during the geological epochs? how did they begin to wail? did they begin by making noises while making love, as some would have it? – whereas it is above all a matter of knowing how it actually works now. Everything is always there. Our relation to language must be grasped at what is, for us, the most concrete, everyday, level, that of our analytic experience.

That is what's important in the schema which gives complexity to the system by introducing into it the imaginary as such. We rediscover the little optical schema I showed you last year in the third stage, in the theory of narcissism. It places the perception-consciousness system where it belongs, namely at the heart of the reception of the ego in the other, for all imaginary references of the human being are centred on the image of the fellow being.

Finally, the last schema will enable us to interpret Beyond the Pleasure Principle, and to understand to what necessity this work answers. Freud wrote it at the time when analytic technique was taking a turn, at a time when one might have thought that resistance and unconscious signification corresponded to one another as right side out to inside out, such that what works according to the pleasure principle in the so-called primary system appears as reality in the other, and vice versa. That is quite straightforwardly the classical study of the ego, a little enriched by the notion that a lot of things can be comprehended in its syntheses. Freud maintains that this isn't it, that not all of the system of significations is to be found in the little chap, that his structure isn't a synthesis of these significations, rather the contrary.

I am giving you this last model so as to put you on the track of what it is Freud wants to contribute with Beyond the Pleasure Principle. I'll take something which has to do with our modern machines' modes of transmission, an electronic tube. Anyone who's played around with a radio is acquainted with a triode valve – when the cathode heats up, the little electrons bombard the anode. If there is something in the way, the electric current does or doesn't pass, depending on whether it is positive or negative. One can modulate the passage of the current at will, or more simply make it an all or nothing system.

Well, that's what resistance, the imaginary function of the ego, as such, is – it is up to it whether the passage or non-passage of whatever there is to transmit as such in the action of analysis occurs. To start with, this schema shows that, if there were no interposition, no resistance from the ego, no frictional effect, no lighting up, no heating effect – call it what you will – the effects of communication at the level of the unconscious would not be noticeable. But above all it shows that there is not the slightest sense of the relation of the ego to the discourse of the unconscious – this concrete discourse in which the ego bathes and plays its function of obstacle, of interposition, of filter – being one of negative to positive. The unconscious has its own dynamic, its own flow, its own paths. It can be explored according to its own rhythm, its own modulation, its own message, quite independently of whatever interrupts it. In Beyond the Pleasure Principle, Freud wanted to situate this imaginary function of the ego.

Today I've only given a general outline of the line of development we will have to pursue in detail. I'll now ask Valabrega to broach the second of these four stages.

M. Valabrega gives an account of the principal characteristics of dreams.

M. VALABREGA: Freud also tells us that the vivacity of the hallucination, its intensity, is proportional to the quantity of investment of the idea in question. It is quantity which conditions the hallucination. It is the opposite of perception. In perception, which comes from the system ϕ*, attention makes the perception more or less distinct.*

It comes from the system ω.

M. VALABREGA: No, from the system ϕ.

A distinction has to be made. The quantitative contributions of the external world come from the system ϕ. The balance of the text shows that everything which is perception, and not excitation, occurs as such in the system ω.

M. VALABREGA: But it comes from ϕ.

Because it comes from the external world. It only comes from ϕ by way of ω.

M. VALABREGA: Sure. In any case, it's only a parenthesis.

In 1897, Freud still hasn't got very far with his own analysis. For Anzieu's benefit, I've made a note of some remarks on the limitations of self-analysis. Letter 75 – I can only analyse myself with the help of knowledge obtained objectively (as a stranger). Genuine self-analysis is impossible; otherwise there would be no illness. Since I still find puzzles in my patients, they are bound to hold me up in my self-analysis as well.[3] That is how he defines the limits of his own analysis – he can only understand what he has come across in his cases. At the very time when he is with great brilliance discovering a new path – and it is exceptionally precise testimony, given its early date – he himself points out that his self-analysis isn't an intuitive process, a divinatory mapping out within his own self, that it has nothing to do with introspection.

M. ANZIEU: Before he had the Irma dream, Freud knew that dreams had a meaning. And it was because his patients had brought him dreams whose meaning lay in their being the fulfilment of desire that he wanted to apply it to himself. That's what his criterion of verification is.

Exactly.

[3] Anf. 249; SE I 271 (translation modified to accord the German, French and English texts).

M. VALABREGA: It isn't the meaning of the dream which is at issue, but the theory of the identity of the dream and the neurotic symptom.

In the Traumdeutung Freud insists on the family resemblance between the dream and the neurotic symptom, but also on the difference between them. The dream process is exemplary as regards understanding the neurotic symptom, but he argues that there is an absolutely fundamental economic difference between the symptom and the dream. All they have in common is a grammar. That's a metaphor, don't take it literally. They are as different as an epic poem is from a work on thermodynamics. The dream makes it possible to grasp the symbolic function at play, and it is, on that account, capital for understanding the symptom. But a symptom is always part of the overall economic state of the subject, whereas the dream is a state localised in time, under extremely specific conditions. The dream is only a part of the activity of the subject, while the symptom is spread out over several domains. The processes are more analogous than identical.

M. Valabrega gives an account of the analysis of the dream of Irma's injection.

At this time Freud's conversation with Fliess is the speech which polarises, organises his entire existence. This guiding thread runs throughout his entire existence as the fundamental conversation. When all is said and done, Freud's self-analysis takes place within this dialogue. That is what makes Freud Freud, and it is why we still talk about it today. Everything else, the scientific discourse, the everyday discourse, the trimethylamine formula, the things we know, the things we don't know, all that farrago is at the level of the ego. It can just as easily constitute an obstacle as signal the passage of what is in the process of being constituted, that is, this vast discourse addressed to Fliess which the entirety of Freud's work will then become.

Freud's conversation with Fliess, the fundamental speech, which is at this time unconscious, is the essential dynamic element. Why is it unconscious at this time? Because it infinitely surpasses what both of them, as individuals, can at this time consciously apprehend of it. After all, they are just a couple of pipsqueak scientists like any others, exchanging rather weird ideas.

The discovery of the unconscious, such as it appears at the moment of its historical emergence, with its own dimension, is that the full significance of meaning far surpasses the signs manipulated by the individual. Man is always cultivating a great many more signs than he thinks. That's what the Freudian discovery is about – a new attitude to man. That's what man after Freud is.

Censorship is not resistance

THE MESSAGE AS AN INSISTENCE OF AN INTERRUPTED DISCOURSE
THE KING OF ENGLAND IS A FOOL
FREUD AND FECHNER

The Interpretation of Dreams does not offer just the theory of dreams. Freud's second working up of the schema of the psychic apparatus is also to be found in it. With the first, he concluded his neurological work. The second corresponds to his advance into the specific field of the neuroses, into what will become the domain peculiar to analysis.

So it is concerned with the dream, but also, in the background, the neurotic symptom, whose structuration proves to be the same – it puts into play the structure of language in general, more precisely the relation of man to language. My commentary will show you this, thereby bringing you testimony as to the fact that the terms used by us here to understand Freud's work anew are included in it.

We want to apply to the development of Freud's thought the same mode of interpretation as Freud employs with respect to what happens in the psychic organ. Something moves, shifts, in relation to these ϕ, ψ, ω systems whose characteristics and also impasses, so well perceived by Freud, Valabrega and I have underlined. I urge you to reread the Irma dream. Already last year, I made you read it and explained to you certain of its stages, to illustrate the transference. Read it again in connection with what we are in the process of doing, namely trying to understand what the compulsion to repeat [automatisme de répétition] means, trying to give a meaning to this expression, and to this end, trying to grasp to what duplicity of relations between the symbolic and the imaginary we are led.

The schema from last time, that of the triode valve, already puts Irma's dream in a different light for you. In his manuscript, Freud reduces its themes to four elements, two conscious, two unconscious. We have already pointed out how these two unconscious elements should be understood – one is the revelation of the creative speech of the dialogue with Fliess, the other is the transversal element, illuminated by the passage of this current. What is on display in an almost unconscious way in the dream, is the question of Freud's relations with a series of feminine sexual images, which are all caught up with some element of tension in his marital relations. What is even more striking is the essentially narcissistic character of all these feminine images. These are fascinating images and all of them have a certain narcissistic relation to Freud. Irma's pain, when the physician percusses her, is in the shoulder, and Freud mentions that he suffers from rheumatism in the shoulder.

All this is always said in a way which amazes us, and which enables us to see beyond what Freud himself was capable of grasping at the time. The point is that Freud is an exceptional, absolutely brilliant observer. In what he has given us, we always have more of what we call, for the sake of rapidity, material, to orientate us, than what he himself had conceptualised of it, which makes him an exceptional case in the history of scientific literature.

M. Valabrega starts the commentary on 'The psychology of the dream processes', chapter VII of The Interpretation of Dreams.

There are two small sentences which, from the point of view we're following out here, deserve to be noted. Just when Freud once again puts into question all the constructions built up in the preceding chapters, in relation to the dream-work, which constitutes the bulk of The Interpretation of Dreams, he all of a sudden says that all objections can be answered apropos of dreams, including that the dream may perhaps be only the dream of a dream.[1]

In short, we have treated as Holy Writ what previous writers have regarded as an arbitrary improvisation, hurriedly patched together in the embarrassment of the moment.[2]

Let us look at this metaphor in passing, because in Freud metaphors are precious - he indeed treated the dream as Holy Writ. Holy Writ is interpreted according to very special laws, and everyone knows that sometimes these interpretations surprise. A great importance must also be accorded to the word text.[3] We are here getting much closer to what Valabrega is trying to show us – just when he starts talking about the dream process, Freud comes to the question of forgetting.

Well, the distortion, even the forgetting, of the text of the dream is of such minor importance, Freud tells us, that were there to remain only one element, an element one had doubts about, a tiny tit-bit, the shadow of a shadow, we could continue to accord it a meaning. It's a message.

Its distortion is not due to chance, it isn't linked to a kind of deadening, of erasure, of a drowning of the message in background noise. The message isn't forgotten any old how. Let us restore to the famous censorship we all too often forget, all of its freshness, all of its novelty – censorship is intentional.

[1] See GW II/III 516–18; Stud II 491–3; SE V 512–14.

[3] The German phrase rendered as 'Holy Writ' is 'einen heiligen Text', 'un texte sacré' in French.

What's distinctive about Freud's argument is that it shifts the burden of proof – In the elements which you raise against me as objections, the forgetting and distortion of dreams, I still see a meaning, and even an additional meaning. When the phenomenon of forgetting comes into play, it becomes all the more interesting to me. I find that to be a part of the message as well. I add these negative phenomena to the reading of the meaning, I also recognise them as having the function of a message. It isn't just that Freud discovered this dimension, but he even, by taking sides, isolates it, so that that is all he wants to know about.

It is said of him that he only discusses wishful dreams [rêves de désir], and yet there are also anxiety-dreams, self-punishment dreams. One of the phases of his answer is to say that, to be sure, anxiety-dreams exist, but what produced that anxiety is nothing other than what would provoke anxiety in waking life. Not everything in dreams interests him, only the semantic element, the transmission of a meaning, an articulated word [parole], what he calls the dream-thoughts, Gedanken.

What interests Freud, and it is nowhere more in evidence than in the first part of this seventh chapter, is the message as such, and one can go further and say – it is the message as interrupted, but insistent, discourse. Here is something which keeps us in touch with the problem we've got on the table at the moment – what is the beyond of the pleasure principle? What is the compulsion to repeat [automatisme de répétition]?

In this text, the word Gedanken cannot take a psychological interpretation. Freud repeats it in three or four different passages, let us not imagine that all of our explanations are already well known in the domain of the psyche, they are phenomena of a completely different order from that of the psychological.

Here is an example which is that much more meaningful for being so extreme, that of the lady who is left with only one word from her dream – channel. Freud demonstrates to us using this instance what he means by the interpretation of dreams.

What can the memory [mémoire] of something so erased be, a memory of a memory? And, more generally, when we remember a dream, do we really remember something which we could speak of as if it were a thought, since we don't know, after all, whether it isn't the very quintessence of the illusion of memory? That doesn't bother Freud, that doesn't matter to him, what he is concerned with isn't of the order of psychological phenomena. Do we remember a dream in the same way as an event which took place and which is locatable somewhere? It is literally insoluble. Philosophers have always been concerned with this – why isn't the experience one has in sleep just as important, as authentic, as that of the previous day? If he dreams every night that he is a butterfly, is it legitimate to say that he dreams he's a butterfly? But Freud doesn't care.

This psychological realism, this quest for an essential subjectivity doesn't detain him. For him, the important thing is not that one dreams one is a butterfly, but what the dream means, what it means to someone. Who is that someone? That is the important question.

He has already had a conversation with this lady, and the dream is simply its continuation. She apparently accepts many of Freud's propositions, but her associations reveal what she wants to tell him in the dream. Push, push, lady. She finally comes out with a short, funny anti-English story. From the sublime to the ridiculous, there is only one step – Yes, the Pas-de-Calais. This is what she means – All your stories are sublime, but ever so slightly ridiculous, so that it doesn't take much to end up laughing.[4]

It's not for us to say whether that's legitimate or not, we are commenting on Freud, trying to grasp what the unconscious function of the dream is. One of the dimensions of the dream's wish is to pass a certain word. Making that clear is always enough for Freud to ratify the fact that his theory has been confirmed. He doesn't have to go back to childhood memories, nor to think of regression. What, for Freud, necessitates the theory of regression? That is what the next step will show us. What we may conclude for the moment, is that Freud is only satisfied, is only sure of his way, he only claims to have shown what he set out to, when he can show us that the dream's pre-eminent wish is to pass a message.

M. VALABREGA: In consequence, the forgetting of the dream is the obstacle.

It isn't the obstacle, it's part of the text. Doubt, for instance, in his way of looking at it, is almost an emphasis[5] – there is no equivalent word in French, one would have to say soulignage.[6] Doubt as a psychological phenomenon doesn't interest him, and with respect to dreams, is it even a psychological phenomenon?

The phenomenon of doubt must be interpreted, Freud says, as a part of the message. If the subject doubts, tell yourself it is to do with resistance, but let us not talk about resistance for the moment. Doubt is part of the message. When the subject tells you he had doubts, you must take that to indicate he is drawing your attention to the fact that it is a particularly significant dream-element. Doubt has a privileged connotation in this famous bit of Holy Writ. Alright?

M. VALABREGA: Yes, . . . Nonetheless, Freud emphasises the word resistance when he says – Any obstacle to interpretation stems from psychic resistance, Widerstand.

[4] GW II/III 522 n1; Stud II 496 n1; SE V 517 n2.
[5] English in the original. [6] 'underlining'.

Not quite. Did you read the short note as well?[7] If the father of the patient dies in the course of the analysis, he says, we are not about to claim that he made him die just to interrupt his analysis, that's a resistance. We classify everything which stands in the way of interpretation as a resistance – it is a matter of definition. We are going to interpret that as well according to whether that facilitates or not the progress of the interpretative task, that is the passage of the message. You must admit that this generalisation of the theme of resistance allows one to think that he doesn't include it in a psychological process. Resistance only acquires value in relation to work. It isn't at all considered from the point of view of the subject's psychic properties.

Resistance does exist, of course. We know of the existence of imaginary or psychological frictions, which constitute obstacles to what Freud calls the flow of unconscious thoughts. The short note is consistent with what I am telling you, that resistance is not thought of as being internal to the subject, on a psychological level, but uniquely in relation to the work of interpretation.

M. VALABREGA: Widerstand is also censorship.

No, that's the point, it isn't censorship.

M. VALABREGA: But it is, monsieur.

No, it isn't censorship. Censorship isn't located on the same level as resistance. It is part of the interrupted character of the discourse.

I feel that this is an important disagreement, that there is some sort of lack of understanding on your part, and that I'll have to give you some kind of illustration.

In the strict sense, the subject's resistance is linked to the ego's register, it is an effect of the ego. In this chapter, it is an x designating everything, whether psychological or not, whether coming from reality or by accident, which halts analytic work. Censorship has nothing to do with resistance, neither in the first sense, nor – though nonetheless a great deal more – in the second.

This brings with it the question of what we call the super-ego. I'm telling you about the interrupted discourse. Well, one of the most striking forms of interrupted discourse is the law in so far as it is not understood. By definition, no one is taken to be ignorant of the law, but it is never understood, for no one can grasp it in its entirety. The primitive who is caught up in the laws of kinship, of alliance, of the exchange of women, never has, even if he is very learned, a complete vision of what it is in this totality of the law that has a hold over him. Censorship is always related to whatever, in discourse, is linked to the law in so far as it is not understood.

This may seem a bit far fetched to you, but I will try to illustrate it.

There is a small pornographic work, written by someone with an eminent literary name, currently a member of the Académie Goncourt, Raymond Queneau. In this book, one of the most delightful one could hope to read, a young typist, who gets caught up in the Irish revolution and some very scabrous misadventures, makes, while locked inside the toilets, a discovery in every respect like that of the father Karamazov.

[7] GW II/III 516 n1; Stud II 495 n1; SE V 517 n1; note added 1925.

As you know, his son Ivan leads the latter into those audacious avenues taken by the thought of the cultivated man, and in particular, he says, if God doesn't exist . . . – If God doesn't exist, the father says, then everything is permitted. Quite evidently, a naive notion, for we analysts know full well that if God doesn't exist, then nothing at all is permitted any longer. Neurotics prove that to us every day.

The typist, locked in the toilets, makes what is a still more impressive discovery for someone who's a subject of His Majesty. Something happens to disturb the maintenance of order in Dublin, which leads her into doubt, a doubt which leads to the following formulation – If the King of England is an idiot, then everything is permitted. And from then on her entire adventure – she is aided by the course of events – goes to show how she no longer denies herself anything. The title of the book has to be – One is always too good to women.

Indeed, for the subjects of His Britannic Majesty – that's the hypothesis, don't get the idea that I'm slandering our English allies – it is very important that one shouldn't say that the King of England is an idiot. This can be expressed, for instance, in the following law – any man who says that the King of England is an idiot will have his head cut off.[8] Listen carefully. What will follow from that?

This may seem funny to you, but I want it to seem tragic. And I want to show you that any similar law, any primordial law, which includes the specification of the death penalty as such, by the same token includes, through its partial character, the fundamental possibility of being not understood. Man is always in the position of never completely understanding the law, because no man can master the law of discourse in its entirety.

If it is forbidden to say that the King of England is an idiot, under pain of having one's head cut off, one will not say it, and in consequence of this sole fact, one will be led into not saying a great many other things – that is to say, everything which reveals the glaring reality that the King of England is an idiot.

Everything goes to show that the King of England is an idiot. We have had some examples. And one King of England who wasn't an idiot was immediately called upon to abdicate. He differed from the others in that he kept falling off his horse and aspiring to marry the woman he loved – this obviously indicated he wasn't an idiot, and he was immediately asked to take his intimate affairs elsewhere. What does that mean? Is it sufficient not to be an idiot to find one's salvation? That is a mistake – that isn't enough either. I'm not trying to say that the King was right to agree to abdicate because he wasn't an idiot. But this is an aside.

It follows then that everything in the discourse which is of a piece with this reality, that the King of England is an idiot, is put in suspense. The subject is caught up in the necessity of having to eliminate, to extract from the discourse everything pertaining to what the law forbids one to say. Now, this interdiction as such is not at all understood. At the level of reality, no one can understand why one would have one's head cut off for saying this truth, no one grasps where the very fact of the interdiction is located. From then on, one can no longer suppose that someone who says what musn't be said and has the idea that everything is permitted will be able purely and simply to annul the law as such.

I hope I'm giving you a feeling of this final, unexplained, inexplicable mainspring upon which the existence of the law hangs. The tough thing we encounter in the analytic experience is that there is one, there is a law. And that indeed is what can never be completely brought to completion in the discourse of the law – it is this final term which explains that there is one.

What happens according to this hypothesis? The subject of the King of England has many reasons for wanting to express things which have a most direct relation with the fact that the King of England is an idiot. Let us say that it passes into his dreams. What does this subject dream of? – it has to do with something difficult to express, not only because the King of England is an idiot, but with everything connected to it, with everything which makes it such that he cannot be anything but an idiot, with the entire structure of the regime, and beyond, with the universal connivance in the idiocy of the Kingdom of England. Well then, the subject dreams that he has his head cut off.

No need to ask yourself questions about I-know-not-what primary masochism, about self-punishment, about the desire for chastisement. On this occasion, the fact that he has his head cut off means that the King of England is an idiot. That is censorship. It is the law in so far as it is not understood.

At the level of the dream, it is only a little child's problem – why does one dream that one has one's head cut off? Why does that tickle you so? But ponder the fact that not one of the subjects in this kingdom where idiocy reigns has a very solid head on his shoulders. That is expressed by a symptom.

What I'm telling you has the appearance of being a small apologia, but I knew a subject whose writer's cramp was tied, as his analysis revealed, to the fact that in the Islamic law, within which he had been raised, a thief has his hand cut off. He never could stomach that. Why? Because his father had been accused of being a thief. He spent his childhood in a kind of deep suspension in relation to Koranic law. The whole of his relation with his original milieu, everything solid, the judiciary, order, the basic coordinates of the world were barred, because there was one thing he refused to understand – why someone who was a thief should have his hand cut off. Furthermore, for this reason, and precisely because he didn't understand it, it was he who had his hand cut off.

That is censorship in so far as there can never be any relation with the law in its entirety, since the law is never completely made one's own.

Censorship and super-ego are to be located in the same register as that of the law. It is the concrete discourse, not only in so far as it dominates man and makes all kinds of fulgurations appear, it doesn't matter what, everything which happens, everything which constitutes discourse, but in so far as it gives man his own world, which we, more or less accurately, call cultural. It is in this dimension that censorship is located, and you can see in what way it differs from resistance. Censorship is neither on the level of the subject, nor on that of the individual, but on the level of discourse, in so far as, as such, it constitutes, all by itself, a full universe, and at the same time there is something irreducibly discordant about it, in every one of its parts. It takes very little, very little at all, being locked up in the toilets, or having a father falsely accused of Lord knows what crime, for the law all of a sudden to appear to you in a lacerating form. That is what censorship is, and Freud never confuses Widerstand with censorship.

M. VALABREGA: At the end of the paragraph, he establishes that the forgetting of the dream is intentional. That is where I find the psychoanalytic theory of forgetting. Freud replaces the explanation of the formation of the dream by the discharge of tension, as he still employed it in the text of the Project, by the idea that sleep slackens censorship, and that it moreover permits one to skirt around resistance. There still may be a confusion between the two concepts, but . . .

But here, that's true, because he's introducing the psychology of sleep. Up until then, Freud never concerned himself with sleep, but here he is obliged to point out its original contribution. There is an essential relation between the ego and sleep. In sleep, the ego doesn't have the same attitude as in the waking state. Once the theory of the libido has been developed, Freud will then assume that there is a withdrawal of libido and its involution once again into the ego. It is in as much as its resistances can be skirted around, traversed or filtered – I am talking about the resistance of the ego, of the resistance tied to the ego, which is only a small part of the resistance – that the conditions in which the phenomenon which we assume to be permanent occurs, namely the continuation of the discourse, are found to be modified. What do these two chapters mean – if it isn't that the discourse of the dream coheres with the discourse of the previous day? Freud always refers the one to the other – what does the subject say in his dream, given what he said the previous day? The entire dialectic of this chapter rests on this relation. All the relations, all the differences, all the processes not seen up until then, ignored, which make the proper object of the Traumdeutung, are established at this level.

M. VALABREGA: In consequence, he ties resistance and disguise together in a dynamic way. He writes, for instance, that under the pressure of the censorship – he also uses the expression the resistance of the censorship.[9]

Which proves that they aren't the same thing. Otherwise he wouldn't have to say resistance of censorship. The censorship is on the same level as the transference. There is a resistance of censorship, just as there is a resistance of transference. Here it's a matter of censorship and transference in so far as they oppose the work of analysis. When two words are equivalent, like the word colour and the word colour, you don't say a colour of colour.

Interventions in the course of M. Valabrega's exposition.

Freud had a real grasp of the notion advanced by Fechner in his psychophysics. Fechner's psychophysics doesn't at all stem from the elementary psychologising dimension where his vulgarisation is to be found. The rigour of his position leads him to suppose that, since there is a parallelism between consciousness and the quantifiable domain in physics, at least virtually, in the abstract, the possibility of there being phenomena of consciousness must be extended way beyond animate beings. Which goes to show that ideas, even when they are first introduced as valid hypotheses, take their authors away, much further away from the run of the mill. If Freud refers to it, it isn't simply as a nice phrase, a happy analogy. Freud never does things like that. Freud isn't Jung. He doesn't spend his time finding all the echoes. When Freud puts something in his text, it is always extremely important. And when he mentions to Fliess, in a letter, what a revelation it had been for him when he read the passage in which Fechner says that one can only conceive of dreams as being located in another psychic locality, one must give this note its full weight.

This is precisely what I am telling you – the psychic locality in question is not psychic, it is quite simply the symbolic dimension, which is of another order – in Angelus Silesius there's a play on the words Ort and Wort, we will come back to it. To say that the dream is placed in another psychic locality is to say that it isn't simply circumscribed as the parenthesis of sleep. It is placed and defines itself in another locality, governed by different local laws, the place of the symbolic exchange, which is not to be confused, although it is embodied in it, with the spatio-temporal dimension in which we can locate all human behaviour. The structural laws of the dream, like those of language, are to be found elsewhere, in another locality, whether we call it psychic or not.

M. VALABREGA: Let us move on to the schema on pages 537–8, whose essential characteristic is that its directionality is like that of a reflex apparatus. Freud explains that this directionality stems from the requirement that one explain psychic processes on the model of reflex processes.

Wait a moment. As you are reminding us, Freud justifies the introduction of this directionality by retroactively clinging on to his reflex apparatus. After all, he says, it is a property of the reflex apparatus that things only go in one direction. But what is remarkable, is that he emphasises this fact only at this one moment. Up until then, he was concerned, when dealing with these three apparatuses, ϕ, ψ, ω, with equilibrium phenomena, which had to be considered as reversible – equilibrium, one always comes back to it, going either forwards or backwards. Now, all of a sudden – you have to know how to spot the passage – Freud introduces the notion that things happen in a determinate and irreversible succession. The word irreversible isn't there, but it is sufficiently hinted at for my taste and I hope also for yours, by the expression zeitlichen Folge,[10] temporal sequence, and Richtung. That's not all. At the very moment when he introduces temporal succession, he finds himself, for reasons of internal conceptual consistency, having to tell us about the exact opposite, namely, that paradoxical thing which will be called regression, and which will have such a dominant influence on the development of psychoanalytic thought.

In passing I'll note that this was the issue in yesterday evening's discussion of Schweich's lecture – for those of us who are going into fields that are still little understood, like that of psychosis, how should we understand the notion of regression? What meaning are we to give to the fact that a subject has regressed to the oral stage?

Freud gets involved in a series of antinomies, of which the following one isn't the least significant – the more the desire is linked to its biological root, to biological force, the more it has a tendency to manifest itself in a hallucinatory guise. You must admit that that is a paradox. We find, for instance, further on in the text, this formulation, that dreams reveal to us a kind of primitive state of humanity.[11] That means that primitive man, in so far as his means of subsistence were less than ours, would have been sustained by dreaming. We have had, besides, to swallow a great many other things about primitives – we were told that their thought was prelogical. These things mustn't be taken on trust.

In short, the explanation of dreams by regression leads Freud into fundamental contradictions at all levels, and for every form he gives this regression, he encounters an objection. He has to find some kind of primitive perceptual plan, so he talks of a topographical regression, from whence the allegedly hallucinatory form which desire assumes under certain conditions. But the neuronal circuit can only go in one direction, the propagation of nervous excitation is never reversed. So topographical regression raises many a problem. Temporal and formal regression produce equally severe antinomies.

This reading shows us the direction in which Freud's thought had later on to develop. The theory of the ego, for instance, articulated in 1915 on the basis of narcissistic libido, resolves the problems raised in this schema by the various forms of regression.

This will be the subject of our next seminar, in two weeks. You see the restricted conditions under which we can legitimately employ the terms resistance, censorship and regression.

The difficulties of regression

WHO IS THE SUBJECT?
PARADOXES OF THE FREUDIAN SCHEMATA
PERCEPTION AND HALLUCINATION FUNCTION OF THE EGO

Today we are going to pick up the thread of our commentary on the seventh part of The Interpretation of Dreams, with the aim of integrating it within the general line we are pursuing – understanding what the progress of Freud's thought means, given due respect for what can be called the primary foundations of the human being such as he discovers himself in the analytic relation, and this in order to explicate the final stage of Freud's thought, which finds expression in Beyond the Pleasure Principle.

Last time we got to the first paragraph in 'The psychology of the dream-processes', which concerns the forgetting of dreams. That led me, following a difference of opinion which made itself manifest apropos of a certain correction I made to Valabrega's remarks, to construct a little apologue which gave precision to the difference that exists between censorship and resistance, censorship and the resistance of censorship. The resistance is everything which is opposed, in a general sense, to the work of analysis. Censorship is a special qualification of this resistance.

What's important for us is to know where the subject of the analytic relation is to be found. One must be on one's guard against the naive attitude – the subject, why, that's him of course – as if the patient were something univocal, as if the analyst himself amounted to nothing other than a given sum of individual characteristics. Who is the subject? That is the question we are dealing with here in all its aspects, in the antinomies which it reveals. We pursue it to all the points at which it is reflected, refracted, signalled. This is how we hope to give a feeling for the point of its precise location, which cannot be tackled head on, since to tackle it is to tackle the very roots of language.

In this perspective, look at one of these things one doesn't usually stop at, a little note included in the masonry of the Freudian edifice.

A second factor – that of knowing why the preconscious has rejected and stifled the wish [désir] which belongs to the unconscious – which is much more important and far-reaching, but which is equally overlooked by laymen is the following. No doubt a wish-fulfilment must bring pleasure; but the question then arises 'For whom?' You see that this question, for whom? is not just ours. It isn't my student Leclaire who invented it – For the person who has the wish, of course. But, as we know, a dreamer's relation to his wishes is a quite peculiar one. He repudiates them and censors them – he has no liking for them, in short. So that their fulfilment will give him no pleasure, but just the opposite; and experience shows that this opposite appears in the form of anxiety, a fact which has still to be explained. Thus a dreamer in his relation to his dream-wishes can only be compared to an amalgamation of two separate people who are linked by some important common element.[1]

Now here's a small text I propose to you as liminal to your reflection, for it expresses clearly the idea of a decentring of the subject. It is a propadeutic formulation, not a solution. It would be turning the problem into a thing to say there's another personality. Moreover, we didn't have to wait for Freud to tell us that – a gentleman named Janet, a worker not without merit even though eclipsed by the Freudian discovery, had thought that he had in fact observed that in certain cases a phenomenon of double identity came about in the subject, and he stopped there, because he was a psychologist. For him it was a psychological curiosity, an observational fact – which comes down to the same thing – historiolae, Spinoza used to say, little stories.

Freud, for his part, doesn't set things out in the form of a little story, he raises the essential aspect of the problem – what is the meaning? When he says thoughts, that is what he is specifying, and nothing else.

We must be precise – what is the meaning of the behaviour of our neighbour, when we are placed with him in this very special relation inaugurated by Freud in his approach to neuroses? Must we look for the answer in some exceptional, abnormal, pathological features of the other's behaviour? That isn't what Freud does. He seeks the answer by asking the question just where the subject himself can ask it of himself – he analyses his own dreams. And it is precisely because he talks about himself, that he makes it apparent that someone other than himself talks in his dreams. That is really what he imparts to us in this note. Someone else it would seem, a second character has a relation with the being of the subject. That's the question raised in Freud's work, from its beginning to its end.

Think of the little Project, from the time of his beginnings. We saw that, at each moment, while keeping to an atomistic language, Freud deviates from it, because he raises the problem of the relations of the subject and the object, and he does so in remarkably original terms. Wherein lies the originality of this sketch of the human psychic apparatus? In that it is in fact about the subject.

What distinguishes Freud here from all the authors who have written on the same subject, and even from the great Fechner to whom he constantly refers, is the idea that the object of the human quest is never an object of rediscovery in the sense of reminiscence. The subject doesn't rediscover the preformed tracks of his natural relation to the external world. The human object always constitutes itself through the intermediary of a first loss. Nothing fruitful takes place in man save through the intermediary of a loss of an object.

I think that this feature, which we have noted in passing, didn't escape you, but you may have thought it was only a point of detail – the subject has to reconstitute the object, he tries to find its totality again starting from I know not what unity lost at the origin. This theoretical symbolic construction – which, to the extent that they are applicable to clinical experience, the initial discoveries concerning the nervous system suggest to Freud – already makes it possible to foresee what must, after all, be called the metaphysical import of his work. This is what proves that we are indeed on the right lines, in continually asking afresh Freud's question – what is the subject?

What the subject does makes sense, his behaviour speaks just as his symptoms do, just as all the marginal functions of his psychic activity do. The psychology of the period, as you know, holds the terms consciousness and psyche to be equivalent, and Freud shows at every turn that this is precisely what creates the problem. That is what is made present in this small sketch of the psychic apparatus, which we have more or less finished with. One musn't confuse, he says, just when he is undertaking the psychological discussion of the dream-processes, the primary process and the unconscious. In the primary process, all kinds of things appear in consciousness. What one wants to know is why it is these which do so. Of course, we are conscious of the idea, the dream-thought, since we would otherwise know nothing about it. Through an exigency of the theory, a certain quantity of interest must have been turned towards what is unconscious. And yet, what motivates and determines this quantity, is in an elsewhere of which we aren't conscious. We have to reconstruct that object as well.

This is what we have already seen made apparent apropos of the dream of Irma's injection, and apropos of the initial small schema Freud gives of it in the Entwurf. He shows us that, when one studies the structure and the determination of associations, what appears in the dream as most heavily charged, in terms of quantity, is the point towards which the most things to be signified converge. What results is the point of convergence of maximum psychic interest. But that doesn't cast any light on the motives themselves.

What appears in Irma's dream is doubly determined – there is, on the one hand, the speech of the dialogue being conducted with Fliess, and on the other, the sexual foundation. The sexual foundation is double. He is interested in this speech, since it is the notion that it exists which thus comes to determine the dream – it is the dream of someone who is trying to find out what dreams are. But also, Freud finds himself in a complex relation not only with his patient, but with the entire, mutually contrasting, feminine series, which is sketched out behind her. What there is in the unconscious can only be reconstructed, that is the meaning to which Freud is leading us. It is what we are going to tackle today, with the second part of chapter VII on regression.

The coalescing of at least two series of motivations is necessary to the production of any symptomatic form. One is sexual, the other is, according to the name we give it here, symbolic – it is the factor of speech, as it is assumed by the subject. But the same question is raised again – by whom? by which subject?

M. VALABREGA: Freud introduces his conception of the psychic apparatus for the first time in relation to the study of regression. So we will have to return to The Interpretation of Dreams to find the first explanation of regression, which will later take on a considerable importance in the theory. Freud begins by summarising the three most important features which the analysis of dreams has furnished him with. Firstly, dreams put thought in the present tense through the fulfilment of a wish [désir]. It is an actualisation, and desire, or the thought of the desire, is most often objectified, enacted, lived. Secondly, a feature almost independent of the preceding one and no less important, the transformation of the dream-thoughts into visual images and into discourse – Bilder und in Rede.[2]

Rede means discourse. The unconscious is the discourse of the other, I didn't make it up. Bilder means imaginary.

M. VALABREGA: A third notion, due to Fechner, the psychic locality of the dream being different from the locality of the representation of waking life. There follows the construction of the psychic apparatus. This apparatus is constituted of various systems, which one doesn't have to, Freud tells us, give a spatial order, but rather an order of temporal succession. As a consequence, one mustn't believe in the spatiality of the schema. It is a temporal topography. This is the first schema of the apparatus. It possesses a direction – the psychical process always goes from the perceptual extremity, Pcpt., to M., the motor. Immediately after, there's a first differentiation. The perceptual excitations received by the subject must leave a trace there, a memory. Now, the Pcpt. system, perception, has no memory whatsoever. One must therefore distinguish between a Mnem'. system and the Pcpt. system. When there have been simultaneous perceptions, there will be a simultaneous connection of the traces –

that's the phenomenon of association. But there exist other connections than the associative one. So it therefore becomes necessary to allow for several Mnem. systems – Mnem, Mnem', Mnem'', etc. It would be pointless. Freud says, to try to determine the number, or even to wish to do so. Consider the following diagram:[3]

The text is really rather pithy – The first of these Mnem. systems will naturally contain the record of association in respect to simultaneity in time; while the same perceptual material will be arranged in the later systems in respect to other kinds of coincidence, so that one of these later systems, for instance, will record relations of similarity, and so on with the others.[4] We enter here into the dialectic of the same and the other, of the one and the many. You can put the whole of Parmenides into this. And Freud adds – It would of course be a waste of time to try to put the psychical significance of a system of this kind into words. Freud realises the foolishness of any attempt at trying to recreate all the categories of language by schematising the various ways in which the elements of reality, atomistically conceived, are organised. The spatial schema of the conceptual connections would only be the doublet of the exigencies of the play of thought, in the most general sense. One can see that Freud is giving up, and that his schema is no longer of any use, except for showing us that where there is a language relation, there has to be the substrate of a determinate neuronal apparatus. Freud realises that it is enough to point out the necessity for there being a series of systems, without wanting to specify each of them in turn. The ease with which he abandons this task, to which more naive people are known to devote themselves, is in itself an education.

Let us take the following sentence – Its character would lie in the intimate details of its relations to the different elements of the raw material of memory, that is – if we may hint at a theory of a more radical kind – in the degrees of conductive resistance which it offered to the passage of excitation from those elements.[5] 'Dégradations de la résistance' isn't an accurate translation. Here, something pulls us up short. At this level, what does the notion of resistance signify? Where can it be located in this schema?

[3] GW II/III 543; Stud II 515; SE V 538.
[4] GW II/III 544; Stud II 515; SE V 539.

M. VALABREGA: As one can see from the passage that M. Lacan just commented on, this is a critique of associationism. For Freud, association is one connection amongst others, and that is why there are several systems.

That's right. If one must assume all these levels, it's because he shifts implicitly from associationism to what is irreducible to it, the category of resemblance being the first dialectical category.

M. VALABREGA: The memories Mnem., Mnem.', etc., are by their nature unconscious. They can become unconscious. But one must still take note that they have no sensible quality comparable to perceptions. They remain distinct from them. Until now, we haven't taken into account, in the schema, the dream and its psychology. The formation of the dream can only be explained by two basic agencies [instances][6] – the criticising agency and the criticised agency. The criticising agency forbids access to consciousness, and as a result of this fact finds itself in the closest relation with this consciousness. It is in placing these two agencies, criticising and criticised, in his schema, that Freud arrives at the next schema. The preconscious should be considered as the last of the systems, being located at the motor end. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that one would understand the diagram better if, instead of making it in the form of a parallelepiped, one made it circular, so as to be able to join M. to Pcpt., preconscious phenomena becoming conscious.

Here you are emphasising the problem which, I think, for a long time any reader of good faith has asked himself. Freud recognises here that the system perception-consciousness, Wahrnehmung-Bewusstsein, which we find again in the final topography, and at certain points in Freud's account, as the nucleus of the ego, supposes a unity. I say it in passing, we won't be satisfied with this commonly accepted final resting-point of Freud's thought.

Valabrega's remark is worthwhile on its own terms, independently of the attempt at a solution which he proposes. Freud presents something as having a topographical unity which is split at both ends. Let's leave the question open for the moment. To explain just the functioning of his schema, Freud reminds us that the disturbing process, which passes from the unconscious to the preconscious, should normally end up at consciousness – even the denomination of these systems implies this orientation towards consciousness. What is in the unconscious is separated from the conscious, but can pass into it via the preliminary stage of the preconscious. Now the necessity of his schema obliges

[6] 'Agency' is the English translation of Instanz (see SE V 537 n1); 'instance' is the French translation. The German and French terms have legal connotations, although the French sense of a 'court' is relatively recent. In Robert, 'instance' is given a separate meaning corresponding to that introduced by Freud in 1923, in The Ego and the Id.

Freud to locate this system of consciousness just before the possibility of the act, before the motor outlet, hence in M. But all the premises which determined the fabrication of his neurological schema obliged him to admit that perception takes place well before any kind of unconscious, at the level of contact with the external world, with the Umwelt, that is to say at the other end of the schema. Hence, the way in which the diagram is constructed has the singular consequence of representing as disassociated, at the two terminal points of the directed circulation of psychic movement, two sides of one and the same function, namely perception and consciousness. This difficulty can in no way be attributed to some sort of illusion stemming from spatialisation, it is internal to the very construction of the schema.

The perceptual system is a kind of sensitive layer, sensitive in the sense of photo-sensitive. In another text,[7] Freud describes a well-known little apparatus, a slate board with special properties of adhesivity upon which a transparent paper rests. The pencil is a simple point which, each time it traces signs on the transparent paper, causes a momentary and local adherence of the paper to the slate underneath. Consequently, the tracing appears on the surface, dark on clear or clear on dark, and remains inscribed there as long as you don't detach the sheet from what lies underneath, which triggers the disappearance of the tracing, the paper returning to a virgin state each time the sticky sheet is raised. Freud requires his first perceptual layer to be something of this kind. One must assume that the perceptual neurone, being sensitive matter, is always capable of intercepting a perception. But here, while the surface becomes virgin, some trace of what was perceived at a given moment always remains on the slate.

Such is the logical schema, and there's nothing to tell us it isn't based on the actual functioning of the psychic apparatus, which makes it necessary that the perceptual system be given at the start.

We thus end up with this peculiar local dissociation of perception and memory. From the point of view of the nervous apparatus, one must distinguish between the level of mnemic accumulation and the level of perceptual acquisition, which is perfectly correct, from the point of view of the imagining of a machine. But we then find ourselves faced with this second difficulty to which Valabrega and I are drawing your attention.

Everything in experience indicates that the system of consciousness must be located at the most extreme opposite point from this succession of layers we have to allow in order to conceive of the effective functioning of the psychic apparatus. Yet again, we suspect that there's something here which doesn't quite work, that there's the same difficulty which, in the first diagram, expressed itself as follows, that the system ϕ, the complement to the stimulus-response circuit, and the system ψ were on two different planes. As for the system ω, functioning according to other energy principles, it represented the perceptual system and ensured that something could come into consciousness. In this way the subject received information concerning quality, which could not be provided by the system ψ, the regulator of investments within the nervous apparatus. So the first schema gave us a representation of perception and consciousness at only one extremity of the apparatus, united together, just as they are in experience. The second schema compounds the difficulties of the first by dissociating the location of the perceptual system and that of the system of consciousness.

[7] 'A note upon the "Mystic Writing-Pad"' (1925a) GW XIV 3–8; Stud III 365–9; SE XIX 227–32.

M. VALABREGA: – One ought to be able to establish some sort of connection, I don't know how.

You offered one solution.

M. VALABREGA: No, it isn't a solution. In a very brief note in which he assimilates Pcpt. and Cs., Freud talks about the linear succession of the schema.[8] If he had wanted to construct a circular schema, he would have done so. One has to wait for another topography to see the matter clearly. But let's abandon this problem in order to get on to the unconscious, the system located more to the back, which cannot accede to consciousness except by passing through the preconscious. Consciousness is a system which succeeds the preconscious. Here again we come upon this paradox, that the system of consciousness is open both on the side of perception, through which the excitation arrives, and to the motor end, whose most adjacent system is the preconscious. In the case of dreams, the internal excitation tends to pass via the intermediary station of the preconscious in order to become conscious, but it cannot, because the censorship forbids it this path during the previous day. How are we to explain the hallucination, the hallucinatory dream? According to Freud, the only way to get out of this is to admit that the excitation, instead of being transmitted as normal, towards the motor end, follows a retrograde path. That's regression.

I can see that for today, the attention you're willing to give to quite straightforward things is somewhat wavering. We are confronted by this singular contradiction – I don't know if it should be called dialectical – that the less you understand the better you listen. For I often say very difficult things to you, and I see you hanging on every word, and I learn later that some of you didn't understand. On the other hand, when you're told things that are very simple, that are almost too well known, you are less attentive. I say that in passing – like any concrete observation it has its merits. I deliver it up to your reflection.

So I'll have to go back over things.

When the notion of regression first comes up, it is strictly tied to a particularity of the schema, the paradox of which I showed you just now.

If we could succeed in fomenting a more coherent schema than the one we're now looking at, in which the perception-consciousness system would not be in this paradoxical position in relation to the apparatus and its one-way functioning, there'd be no need for the notion of regression. It is solely because his schema is made that way that, in order to explain the hallucinatory quality of the dream-experience, Freud has to admit not so much a regression as a regredient direction of the circulation of quantity, expressed by the process of excitation-discharge. This direction is called regredient in contrast with the progredient direction of the normal, waking, functioning of the psychic apparatus.

We might well suspect that all this is precarious, since it depends upon the construction of a schema which already in itself appears as paradoxical. Mark this in passing, perhaps it will permit you to shed some light on the manner in which the term regression is employed later on, not without its revealing ambiguities.

It first appears as topographical regression – in some cases, what happens in the nervous apparatus has to move in the opposite direction, that is to say not towards discharge, but towards the mobilisation of the system of memories which constitutes the unconscious system. What has to be explained are aspects of the dream – which, moreover, can only be called sensorial metaphorically speaking – its figuration, especially visual, its hallucinatory character.

So the initial introduction of the term regression in the Freudian system is essentially tied to one of the most inexplicable peculiarities of his first schema. We will see if we can't explain things better, in such a way as to make the notion of regression unnecessary at this level.

M. HYPPOLITE: Can't one put forward the hypothesis that the idea of regression is for Freud primary in relation to the schema? That he has regression at the back of his mind?

The point of our way of proceeding is that it reminds us that the schema we are now studying has a continuity with another one – also constructed on the basis of Freud's specific experience, that of the neuroses, which from the start animated his theoretical endeavour – in which there is no trace of the notion of regression. There, no need for regression to explain the dream, its hallucinatory character, desire sustains it.

The schema of the Traumdeutung only has this shape because that of the Entwurf had the one I've drawn several times on the board. And it is to the extent that the schema has this shape that Freud talks of a retreat on the topographical level, of swimming up against the nervous current.

There are things which work in the regredient sense in relation to the schema. To account for it, given the way in which his diagram is put together, Freud is forced to enter into supplementary constructions. He had, for instance, to concede that what takes place in dreams is a suspension of the progredient flow, because if the progredient current always passed through at the same speed, the reverse movement could not come about. The notion of regression gives rise to enough difficulties for one to see that Freud is only forced to admit it because he has to explain how things can occur which, in relation to the schema, effectively move in the regredient direction.

His starting point is not at all that of regression. He is obliged to introduce it because he conceives the function of perception in the psychic economy as something primary, not composite, but elementary. For him, the organism is essentially impressionable, the impression is elementary, and it is by virtue of that that it comes into play in what takes place at the level of symptoms.

That is where the whole problem lies – can what happens at the level of the phenomena of consciousness be in any way purely and simply assimilated to the elementary phenomena of perception? What may be said in Freud's favour, is that at this naive level – let us not forget that this was constructed fifty years ago – he doesn't evade the difficulty of the existence as such of consciousness.

Freud's constructions have lost a great deal of their interest for us with the passage of time, that is to say with the diffusion of behaviourist thinking. I want to draw your attention in passing to the fact that, by comparison with Freud's attempt, behaviourist thought is a pure and simple sleight of hand. Of course, the behaviourists say, consciousness raises some problems. Let us resolve the question by describing phenomena without ever taking into account its actual existence. Where it is obviously effective, it is only a stage, let us not mention it. Freud, for his part, doesn't dream of eliminating the difficulty there is in getting consciousness included as a special agency in the entire process and, in the end, he succeeds in dealing with it without turning it into a thing.[9]

Let us return to Freud's first schema. He starts with a nervous system made up of interconnecting neurones, of a ψ apparatus which is, in the central nervous system, the totality of the association-fibres. How is the circulation which represents the sum of its experiences initiated? How is the passage across the synaptic barrier accomplished? How does the facilitation change? Freud is thus only interested in the neuronal quantity circulating in the fibres. The facilitation depends on the energy level of the system. There is a homeostatic regulation, with variations which depend on the fact that several thresholds, several homeostatic rules, are possible, depending on whether the system is in the waking state, sleeping state, etc. Well then, what happens in this system? What happens is what Freud calls hallucination.

[9] Lacan employs the neologisms 'entifier', 'chosifier'; although we have not chosen to do so in this passage, we have sometimes employed the neologism 'entification' for these words.

The nervous system receives excitations, which come to it from the organism, from the pressure of needs. Certain experiences then occur. As the ordinary notion of learning [apprentissage] would have it, the first experiences determine the others. Each time that the same impulse [pulsion] reoccurs, the circuits associated with the first experiences, which have been recorded, are aroused. The internal signals, the neurons, which were excited on the first occasion of the organism's activity under the pressure of need, are excited again. In this strictly hallucinatory conception of the putting into play of needs, from which emerges the idea of the primary process, it is normal for the psychic organism, given that it had been in some way satisfied in the original confused experiences linked to its original need, to hallucinate its second satisfaction.

This implies, it should be noted, an identification between the psychical phenomena which occurs in a neuron, and its epiphenomenal verso, that is, what the subject perceives. It pertains to the order of psychophysical parallelism. One must call a spade a spade. If Freud calls that hallucination, it is because he places authentic perception elsewhere. This hallucination is simply, according to the then ruling definition in science, a false perception, just as one could, at the same epoch, define perception as a true hallucination.

The return of a need leads to the hallucination of its satisfaction, the entire construction of the first schema rests on that. Except, how is it that the living organism nonetheless succeeds in not falling into terrible traps, biologically speaking? We must necessarily suppose a mechanism of regulation, of adaptation to the real, which enables the organism to refer the hallucination, which spontaneously follows from the primary functioning of the system ψ, to what is happening at the level of the perceptual apparatus. Something must therefore be constituted in the course of the experiences, something which diminishes the quantitative investment to the level of sensitivity of the incidence of need. This something, Freud locates it in the ψ apparatus, and calls it an ego.

How is the regulation achieved? Freud explains it by the process of derivation. What is quantitative is always susceptible to being diffused. At first there is a traced path, the path opened up, facilitated, by the original experience, which corresponds to a given neuronal quantity. The ego intervenes to make this quantity pass along several paths at once, rather than one. As a result, the level of what has passed along the path of facilitation will be sufficiently lowered to be successfully compared on examination with what is happening in parallel at the perceptual level.

You can see the hypotheses all this presupposes – so many are needed, and a great many of them are not susceptible of confirmation. That is the somewhat disappointing feature of these constructions. But we are not here to judge of their merit in and of themselves – they acquire value from the developments to which they led Freud.

Within this schema, the ego is the regulatory apparatus for all the comparative testings of the hallucinations of the system ψ with what is taken to be adapted to reality at the level of the system ω. It reduces the level of excitation of neurons which have already been facilitated to an extremely low energy level, so that the distinctions can be drawn via the system ω, where the charges are very weak. I should draw your attention to the fact that the ego doesn't belong at the level of the perceptual apparatus. It is in the system ψ itself, it is at the heart of the psychic apparatus. The primary and secondary processes occur in the same place. In fact, the ego and the ψ apparatus are the same thing – the ego is the nucleus,[10] that is how Freud expresses it, the kernel of this apparatus.

That is what goes against the hypothesis you proposed just now. The bipartition of the system of the ego into perception and consciousness, located so paradoxically in his schema in the Traumdeutung, isn't imposed on Freud by a preformed conception – it was more straightforward in the first schema. And why does it appear necessary for it to be the way it is in the second schema? Because the second schema doesn't at all cover the same ground as the first. It is a temporal schema, which tries to represent the order in which things take place. And it is remarkable that Freud encounters this difficulty just when he introduces the temporal dimension.

I leave this question open. Do bring what you have to say to a conclusion, Valabrega.

M. VALABREGA: Regression remains for Freud an inexplicable phenomenon from the topographical point of view. That is what we might conclude with.

If you wish. Had we only done this today, had we only shown you that Freud, in his text, remains just as much in difficulties with regression as a fish with a fig, we would still not have wasted our time. There wasn't the least need to introduce it in order to explain the fundamentally hallucinatory character of the primary process, since he had already distinguished the primary and secondary processes in the first schema. He introduces regression from the moment when he emphasises the temporal factors. As a result, he is also forced to admit it into the topographical, that is to say spatial plane, where its appearance is none too steady. It remains paradoxical, and to a certain extent antinomic and inexplicable. That is what had to be emphasised here.

We will see next how the notion of regression must be handled when Freud uses it in the genetic register in relation to the development of the organism.

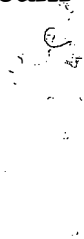
The dream of Irma's injection



So we are still pondering the meaning of the diverse conceptions of the psychic apparatus which Freud entertained. He pursued this task throughout the entire course of his work – for him it corresponded to a demand for internal coherence. He was the first and for a long time the only one to try to find his way in all this, and he pursued his effort throughout the modifications, of theory and of technique, suggested by those who followed him, that is, the analytic community.

It is a fact that the difficult question of regression, with which we were confronted last time, was first engendered by the very requirements of the model. One has to read the letters to Fliess in order to know how difficult the begetting of this work was. And for him arriving at rigorous schemata was a requirement which touched him to the heart. Now, to produce a hypothesis about quantity has reverberations for the notion of quality. And I don't think that the two of them are perfectly compatible. Freud preferred one to the other on account of certain conveniences when it came to formulation, but the difficulties of the second schema are due to the relative simplications of the first, that is, this disassociation between perception and consciousness which obliges him to introduce the hypothesis of a regression in order to account for the figurative, that is imaginary, character of what takes place in the dream.

Obviously, if he already could have used the term imaginary, then it would have removed a large number of the contradictions. But this figurative character is here conceived of as part of the perceptive and the visual is taken by Freud to be equivalent to the perceptual. It is clear that the schema, as constructed in the Traumdeutung, necessarily leads to proposing, right at the topographical level, a hypothesis like the following – because the state of dreaming doesn't allow processes to result as normal in motor discharge, there's a backward flow of the process of intentional influx, and its imagistic character makes its appearance. Things can go the other way round – that's what the term regression means, at the point we've got to.

This here is the first formulation with any solidity of this notion which will, in what follows, be accepted, in a similar fashion, on the formal level no less than on the genetic one. The idea of the regression of the individual to the initial stages of his development dominates, as you know, much of our conceptions of the neuroses as well as those of treatment. The entering into play of this notion, which now seems so familiar, is however not a matter of course, as you have realised.

In order to make it easier for you to shift from this schema of the psychic apparatus to that implied by the later development of Freud's thought, namely the one centring on the theory of narcissism, I am going to propose to you a little test.

The initial dream, the dream of dreams, the inaugurally deciphered dream, is for Freud that of Irma's injection. He gives it as exhaustive an analysis as possible, returning to it very often in the Traumdeutung itself, each time he needs a fulcrum, and in particular, at length, when he introduces the notion of condensation.

Well, we are going to take another look at this dream, from our present point of view. We will be within our rights, on condition of our not wanting to make Freud, who is still at the first stage of this thinking, say what is in the last stage, on condition of our not attempting to make these stages agree with one another, according to our own whim.

Under Hartmann's pen you come upon the rather candid admission that, after all, Freud's conceptions aren't quite in agreement amongst themselves, and that they need to be synchronised. The effects of this sychronisation of Freud's thought are precisely what makes the return to the text necessary. In truth, to me it has the tiresome echo of bringing him into line. Not for us the synchronisation of the various stages of Freud's thought, nor even getting them to agree. It is a matter of seeing to what unique and constant difficulty the development of this thought – made of the contradictions of its various stages – responded. Through the succession of antinomies that this thought always presents us with, within each of these stages, and between them, it is a matter of confronting what is properly the object of our experience.

Amongst those people whose function it is to teach analysis and to train analysts, I'm not the only one to have had the idea of taking up the dream of Irma's injection again. That is especially the case with a man called Erikson, who describes himself as an advocate of the culturalist school – for the good it will do him! This so-called culturalism consists in emphasising in analysis those things which, in each case, depend on the cultural context in which the subject is immersed. This aspect has certainly not been ignored up until now – I am not aware of Freud, nor those who might specifically qualify themselves as Freudians, ever neglecting it. The question is to know whether this element should be given pre-eminent importance in the constitution of the subject. Let us leave to one side for a moment the theoretical discussion which this may raise, and let us see what it leads to.

Apropos of the dream of Irma's injection, it leads to some remarks which I will try to point out to you, as I will have to encounter them in the re-analysis which I will try to conduct today. You will be surprised to see that this culturalism converges quite singularly with a psychologism which consists in understanding the entire analytic text as a function of the various stages in the development of the ego. You see that it isn't simply the desire to chaff his synchronisation which led me to mention Hartmann.

The attempt is made, then, to locate the dream of Irma's injection as a stage in the development of Freud's ego, an ego which has a right to a certain respect, for it is that of a great creator, at a highpoint of his creative capacity. In truth, one cannot say it is a false ideal. Of course there must be a psychology of the creator. But is it the lesson we have to draw from the Freudian experience, and more especially, if we examine it under the microscope, is it the lesson we must draw from what takes place in the dream of Irma's injection?

If this point of view is true, we will have to abandon the notion I tell you to be the essence of the Freudian discovery, the decentring of the subject in relation to the ego, and to return to the notion that everything centres on the standard development of the ego. That is an alternative without mediation –if that is true, everything I say is false.

Except, if what I say is false, it becomes extremely difficult to read the slightest of Freud's texts and understand anything in it. We shall put it to the test with the dream of Irma's injection.

Why does Freud give such importance to this dream? At first glance, this may be surprising. What, in fact, does Freud extract from the analysis of this dream? This truth, which he posits as primary, that the dream is always the fulfilment of a desire, of a wish [souhait].

I will read you the contents of the dream, hoping that this will be enough to bring to mind the analysis which follows it.

A large hall – many guests, whom we receive. – Among them Irma, whom I immediately take aside, as if to answer her letter, and to reproach her that she doesn't accept the 'solution' yet. I say to her: 'If you still have pains, it is really only your fault.' – She answers: 'If you knew what pains I have now in my throat, stomach and abdomen, it's tightening me up.' – I am startled and look at her. She looks pallid and puffy; I think, after all I am overlooking something organic. I take her to the window and look into her throat. With that she shows some resistance, like women who wear a denture. I think to myself, she doesn't need to do that. – Her mouth then opens properly, and I find on the right a large white spot, and elsewhere I see some remarkable curled structures which evidently are patterned on the nasal turbinal bones, extensive white-grey scabs. – I quickly call Dr M., who repeats and confirms the examination . . . Dr M. looks entirely different from usual; he is very pallid, limps, is beardless on the chin . . . My friend Otto now also stands next to her, and my friend Leopold percusses her over the bodice and says: 'She has a dullness below on the left,' points also to an infiltrated portion of the skin on the left shoulder (which I, in spite of the dress, just as he, feel) . . . M. says: 'Without a doubt, it's an infection, but it doesn't matter; dysentery will follow and the poison will be eliminated . . .' We also directly know where the infection comes from. Recently my friend Otto, when she was not feeling well, gave her an injection of a preparation of propyl, propylene . . . proprionic acid . . . trimethylamine (whose formula I see in heavy type before me) . . . one doesn't give such injections so lightly . . . Probably, too, the syringe wasn't clean.[1]

Irma is a patient friend of Freud's family. So, with respect to her, he is thus in that delicate situation, always to be avoided, in which the analyst is attending on someone in the circle of his acquaintances. We are much more aware than Freud was, at this pre-historic stage of analysis, of the difficulties, in such a case, of a counter-transference.

That is indeed what happens. Freud has great difficulties with Irma. As he points it out to us in the associations to the dream, he still thinks, at this point in time, that, once the unconscious meaning of the fundamental conflict of the neurosis has been discovered, one only has to put it to the subject, who either accepts or doesn't accept it. If he doesn't accept it, it's his fault, he is a nasty, naughty boy, a bad patient. If he's good, he accepts, and everything is fine and dandy. I'm not pushing anything – there are good and bad patients.

Freud recounts this idea to us with a humour bordering on the rather improvised irony I am indulging in on this subject. He says that he can thank heaven that this was his conception at that time, for it allowed him to make a living.

So, he is in a lot of trouble with Irma, who has certainly improved, but retains certain symptoms, in particular a tendency to vomit. He has just interrupted the treatment, and his friend Otto is bringing him news of his former patient.

In the past, I've underlined that Otto is someone very close to Freud. But he isn't an intimate friend, in the sense of being privy to the ideas of someone who is already a master. He is a good chap, Otto, he does a bit of looking after the entire family, when there are colds about, when things aren't going too well, and his role in the household is that of the friendly, benevolent bachelor, the bringer of gifts. This elicits a certain amused irony in Freud.

Mahony points out that the translation of dreams in SE renders them into the imperfect tense, whereas Freud's text gives them in the present; see GW II/III 112; Stud II 127; SE IV 107. Moreover, Freud makes theoretical remarks concerning the significance of the fact that the tense of all dreams is the present – GW II/III 539–40; Stud II 544–5; SE V 534–5.

The Otto in question, for whom he has genuine, though measured, respect, brings him news of the said Irma, and tells him that, in short, she's alright, but not as well as all that. His tone makes Freud think that dear friend Otto somewhat disapproves of him, or more exactly that the latter must have had a share in his circle's gloating, even in the opposition he faced in relation to this cure imprudently undertaken on terrain where he is not as much the master of the manoeuvres as he would like.

Indeed, Freud has the feeling that he has in fact put the right solution to Irma – Lösung. This word has the same ambiguity in German as in French – that is as much the solution that one injects as the solution of a conflict. With that, the dream of Irma's injection is already acquiring its symbolic meaning.

At the start, Freud is pretty displeased with his friend. That is because he is even more displeased with himself. He gets to the point of doubting the validity of the solution he's proposed, perhaps even the very principle of his treatment of neuroses.

In this year 1895, he is still at the experimental stage in which he makes his major discoveries, amongst which the analysis of this dream will always seem to him so important that in 1900, in a letter to Fliess, just after the publication of the book in which he relates it, he will entertain himself – though his ways of having fun are never quite inconsequential – by imagining that one day perhaps there will be inscribed, on the threshold of the house in the country at Bellevue where this dream took place – In this house on July 24th, 1895, the secret of dreams was revealed to Dr Sigmund Freud.[2]

So, as well as being displeased, Freud at this time is full of confidence. Note it is before the crisis of 1897, a trace of which we find in the letter to Fliess, when he was to think for a moment that the entire trauma theory based on seduction, which was central to the genesis of his conception, had to be rejected, and the whole of his edifice was crumbling away. In 1895 he is in a creative period, as susceptible to certainty as to doubt – which is a feature of the entire development of the discovery.

The disapproval he senses in Otto's voice is the little shock which sets his dream into motion.

Let me point out that as early as 1882, Freud had remarked, in a letter to his fiancée, that it wasn't so much the major preoccupations of the day which made an appearance in dreams, as themes which had been embarked upon and were then interrupted – as when you're cut off.[3] The cutting off of speech struck Freud very early on, and we come upon it again and again in his analyses in The Psychopathology of Everyday Life. I have already discussed with you the forgetting of the name of the painter of the Orvieto fresco. What was at issue then was also something which hadn't completely come out during the day.

[2] Letter dated 12 June 1900, Origins, p. 322. [3] Letter dated 30 June 1882.

That, however, is far from being the case here. Freud started work in the evening after dinner, and had written an entire résumé of the Irma case, as a way of putting things straight, and of justifying, if needs be, the general conduct of the treatment.

Then comes the night. With this dream.

I'll go straight to the conclusion. Freud considers it a great success being able to explain this dream in all its detail, by the desire to be relieved of his responsibility for the failure of Irma's treatment. He does so in the dream – as the artisan of the dream – in so many ways that, as he remarks with his customary humour, it bears a great resemblance to the story of the person who, upon being reproached with returning a kettle with a hole in it, answers firstly, that he returned it intact and that secondly, the kettle already had a hole in it when he borrowed it and that thirdly, he hadn't borrowed it. Each of these explanations on its own would be perfectly valid, but taken together can in no way satisfy us.

That's how this dream is conceived, Freud tells us. And, of course, we find there the thread of everything which appears in the dream. But the question in my view is rather more like this – how is it that Freud, who later on will develop the function of unconscious desire, is here content, for the first step in his demonstration, to present a dream which is entirely explained by the satisfaction of a desire which one cannot but call preconscious, and even entirely conscious? Didn't Freud spend the previous evening trying to put down in black and white a justification as much of what works as what doesn't?

To establish this formula, that in every case the dream is the satisfaction of a desire, Freud doesn't seem, on first impression, to have required anything more than the most general notion of desire, nor to have been much preoccupied with knowing what this desire is, nor from whence it comes – from the unconscious or the preconscious.

Freud then raises the question in the note which I read out to you last time – what is it, this unconscious desire? What is it, this thing which is pushed away and horrifies the subject? What does it mean to speak of an unconscious desire? For whom does this desire exist?

This is the level where we'll find clarification of the immense satisfaction which the solution Freud gives of the dream brings him. To gain for ourselves a full sense of the fact that this dream plays a decisive role in Freud's account, we must take into account the importance which Freud grants it, all the more significant for seeming paradoxical to us. At first sight, one might say that the decisive step hasn't been taken, since in the end it is only a preconscious desire which emerges. But if he maintains that this dream is the dream of dreams, the initial, typical dream, it is because he has the feeling of having taken it, this step, and the account which follows shows only too well that he has indeed taken it. If he has the feeling that he has taken it, it's because he has.

I am not redoing the analysis of Freud's dream after Freud himself. That would be absurd. Just as it is out of the question to analyse dead authors, so it is out of the question to analyse his own dream better than Freud. Freud has his reasons for breaking off the associations. He tells us – At this point, I can't tell you any more than this, I don't want to tell stories of bed and chamber pot – or else – Here I no longer feel inclined to continue to associate. It is not a matter of carrying out an exegesis where Freud interrupts himself but for us to take the whole of the dream and its interpretation. That's where we are in a different position from that of Freud.

There are two operations – having the dream, and interpreting it. Interpreting is an operation in which we intervene. But don't forget that in the majority of cases, we also intervene in the first. In an analysis, we intervene not only in that we interpret the dream of the subject – if indeed we do interpret it – but, on account of our already being, as analyst, in the life of the subject, we are already in his dream.

Remember, in this society's inaugural lecture, what I talked to you about apropos of the symbolic, the imaginary and the real. I was using these categories in the form of small and capital letters.

iS – imagining the symbol, putting the symbolic discourse into a figurative form, namely the dream.
sI – symbolising the image, making a dream-interpretation.

Except, for that there has to be a reversion, the symbol has to be symbolised. In between, there's room for understanding what happens in this double transformation. That is what we are going to try to do – take this dream and the interpretation which Freud gives of it as a whole, and see what it signifies in the symbolic and the imaginary order.

We are lucky that this famous dream, which, as will be only too obvious to you, we'll be treating with the greatest respect, isn't, because it is a dream, in time. It is very easy to observe, and it constitutes precisely the originality of dreams – the dream is not in time.

There is something absolutely striking – none of the authors in question draws attention to this fact, in its purity. Erikson comes close to it, but unfortunately, his culturalism isn't a very useful tool for him. This culturalism obliges him to raise the so-called problem of the study of the manifest content of the dream. The dream's manifest content, he tells us, deserves to be placed once again the foreground. On this point, there follows a very confused discussion, based on this opposition between the superficial and the profound, which I beg you to rid yourselves of. As Gide says in The Counterfeiters, there is nothing more profound than the superficial, because there isn't anything profound. But that's besides the point.

You must start from the text, start by treating it, as Freud does and as he recommends, as Holy Writ. The author, the scribe, is only a pen-pusher, and he comes second. The commentaries on the Scriptures were irremediably lost the day when people wanted to get at the psychology of Jeremiah, of Isaiah, of even Jesus Christ. Similarly, when it comes to our patients, please give more attention to the text than to the psychology of the author – the entire orientation of my teaching is that.

Take this text. M. Erikson attaches great importance to the fact that at the beginning, Freud says – we are receiving. Thus, he would seem to have a dual personality – he entertains with his wife. It is a small, awaited, birthday party, at which Irma, the friend of the family, is expected. I'm quite happy, in fact, that the we are receiving introduces Freud in his identity as head of the family, but that doesn't seem to me to imply a very great duplicity in social function, because Frau Doktor makes no appearance at all, not for one minute.

As soon as Freud enters into dialogue, the visual field shrinks. He takes Irma aside and starts reproaching her, inveighing against her – It is really all your fault, if you would listen to me it would get better. Inversely, Irma tells him – You don't know how much it hurts here and here, and there, in the throat, belly, stomach. And then she says that it zusammenschnüren, that it chokes her.[4] This zusammenschnüren seems vividly expressive to me.

MME X: In the old days, three or four people were needed to pull on the laces of a corset to tighten it.

Freud is then quite impressed, and begins to show disquiet. He draws her towards the window and makes her open her mouth.

So all this takes place against a background of discussion and of resistance – resistance not only to what Freud suggests, but also to the examination.

In fact the resistance we have here is the feminine type of resistance. Authors skate over this by talking about so-called Victorian feminine psychology. Because it is well known that women no longer resist us – it doesn't excite us any more, women who resist, and when you come upon feminine resistance, these poor Victorian women are always there to take all the blame. It's quite funny. A consequence of the culturalism which here doesn't succeed in opening Erikson's eyes.

Nonetheless, Freud's associations revolve around this resistance. They emphasise the fact that Irma is far from being the only one implicated although only she appears in the dream. Amongst the people who are etwas Sträuben, [4] SE gives 'chokes'; Mahony gives 'tightening up'; the French term is 'étouffe'.

there are two in particular who, despite being symmetrical, are nonetheless somewhat problematic – Freud's own wife, who we know from other sources is pregnant at the time, and another woman patient.

We know the immense importance of the role which his wife played in Freud's life. He had not only a familial attachment to her, but also a conjugal, highly idealised one. It does seem, nonetheless, given certain nuances, that on certain levels, she brought him a certain disappointment. As for the patient, she is so to speak the ideal patient, because she isn't Freud's patient, she is quite pretty, and certainly cleverer than Irma, whose capacity for understanding tends to be denigrated. She also has the added attraction of not asking for Freud's help, which allows him to hope that she might one day ask him for it. But to tell the truth he doesn't entertain high hopes of it. In short, the thematic register in which woman appears here and within which the relation to Irma is located extends from the purest professional interest to all the forms of imaginary mirage.

In the dream itself, Freud shows himself as he is, and his ego is completely at home on the level of his vigilant ego. As psychotherapist, he openly discusses Irma's symptoms, which no doubt are a little, but only slightly, modified compared with what they are in reality. Irma herself is hardly distorted. What she has to show, she would show just the same if one were to look at it closely in the waking state. If Freud analysed his behaviour, his responses, his emotions, his transference at every moment in the dialogue with Irma, he would see just as easily that behind Irma is his wife, her intimate friend, and just as easily the seductive young woman who is just a few steps away and who would make a far better patient than Irma.

This is at the first level, where the dialogue remains subjected to the conditions of the real relation, in so far as it is itself totally stuck within the imaginary conditions which limit it, and which for the moment present Freud with difficulties.

That goes very far. Having got the patient to open her mouth – that is precisely what's at stake in reality, that she doesn't open her mouth – what he sees in there, these turbinate bones covered with a whitish membrane, is a horrendous sight. This mouth has all the equivalences in terms of significations, all the condensations you want. Everything blends in and becomes associated in this image, from the mouth to the female sexual organ, by way of the nose – just before or just after this, Freud has his turbinate bones operated on, by Fliess or by someone else. There's a horrendous discovery here, that of the flesh one never sees, the foundation of things, the other side of the head, of the face, the secretory glands par excellence, the flesh from which everything exudes, at the very heart of the mystery, the flesh in as much as it is suffering, is formless, in as much as its form in itself is something which provokes anxiety. Spectre of anxiety, identification of anxiety, the final revelation of you are this – You are this, which is so far from you, this which is the ultimate formlessness. Freud comes upon a revelation of the type, Mene, Tekel, Peres at the height of his need to see, to know, which was until then expressed in the dialogue of the ego with the object.

Here, Erikson makes an observation which, I must admit, is excellent – normally a dream which leads to that should cause one to awaken. Why doesn't Freud wake up? Because he's a tough customer.

I've got nothing against that – he is a tough customer. So, Erikson adds, as his ego is disagreeably stuck in front of this spectacle, this ego regresses – the rest of the account is there to tell us that. Erikson then sets up an entire theory of the different stages of the ego, with which I will acquaint you. These psychological diversions are certainly extremely instructive, but to me they seem in truth to go against the very spirit of Freudian theory. For, in the end, if the ego is this succession of émergences, of shapes, if this double face of good and evil, of realisations and of modes of derealisations constitute its type, one fails to see what can be made of the fact Freud states in a thousand, two thousand different places in his writings, namely that the ego is the sum of the identifications of the subject, with all that that implies as to its radical contingency. If you allow me to give an image of it, the ego is like the superimposition of various coats borrowed from what I would call the bric-à-brac of its props department.

Can you really, you analysts, in all honesty, bring me testimonies of these splendid typical developments of the ego of subjects? These are tall stories. We are told how this great tree, man, has such a sumptuous development, how throughout his existence he overcomes successive trials, thanks to which he achieves a miraculous equilibrium. A human life is something entirely different! I have already written that in the past, in my lecture on psychogenesis.

Is it really a question of the regression of the ego at the moment when Freud avoids waking up? What we see is that, from this point on, it's no longer a question of Freud. He calls professor M. to his aid because he can't make head or tail of it. This won't get him a better one, a better head or tail.[5]

Doctor M., the circle's dominant figure, as he calls him – I haven't identified who it is – is an entirely respectable character in the everyday life of practice. He has certainly never done Freud a great deal of harm, but he doesn't always agree with him, and Freud isn't the sort of man to accept that easily.

There's also Otto and his chum Leopold, who goes one better than his chum Otto. This gives him considerable merit in Freud's eyes, and he compares the two of them to Inspector Bräsig and his friend Karl. Inspector Bräsig is a sly one, but he's always wrong, because he fails to take a close look at things. His chum Karl, always at his side, notices them, and all the inspector has to do is follow him.

With this trio of clowns, we see a rambling dialogue built up around little Irma, closer in fact to a game of interrupted conversations, and even to the well-known dialogue of the deaf.

All this is extremely rich and I am just summarising. Then the associations which show us the real meaning of the dream appear. Freud realises that he ends up entirely without blame, according to the logic of the kettle with a hole in it. The three of them are so ridiculous that anyone would seem like a god besides such absurd automata. All these characters are significant, in that each of them is the site of an identification whereby the ego is formed.

Dr M. corresponds to a function which was of capital importance to Freud, that of his half-brother, Philippe, who, as I've told you in another context, was the essential character for the understanding of Freud's Oedipus complex. If Freud's induction into the Oedipus complex was decisive for the history of humanity, it is obviously because he had a father who already had two sons from a first marriage, Emmanuel and Philippe, of similar age, with about three years difference, but who were already old enough for each of them to have been the father of the little Freud, Sigmund, who was born to a mother exactly the same age as this Emmanuel. This Emmanuel was for Freud the object of horror par excellence. It was even believed that all the horrors were concentrated on him – erroneously, for Philippe had his share in them. It was him who shopped Freud's dear old nanny, who has been accorded a disproportionate importance, by culturalists wanting to annex Freud to Catholicism with her as intermediary.

It nonetheless remains the case that the members of the intermediate generation played a considerable role. It is a superior form allowing the concentration of aggressive attacks against the father without touching the symbolic father too much, who, as for him, is to be found in a heaven which, without being that of sainthood, is nonetheless extremely important for all that. The symbolic father remains intact thanks to this division of functions.

Dr M. represents the ideal character constituted by the paternal pseudo-image, the imaginary father. Otto corresponds to the character who played a perennial role in Freud's life, the intimate, close friend who is both friend and enemy, who from one hour to the next changes from being a friend to being an enemy. And Leopold plays the role of the character who is always useful to counter the character of the friend-enemy, of the beloved enemy.

Here, then, is an entirely different triad from the preceding one, but which is just as much in the dream. Freud's interpretation allows us to understand its meaning. But what is its role in the dream? It plays with speech, with decisive and adjudicating speech, with the law, with what torments Freud under the form – Am I right or wrong? Where is the truth? What is the outcome of the problem? Where am I placed?

The first time around, accompanying Irma's ego we've found three feminine characters. Freud remarks that there is such a profusion of intercalations at this point that in the end things are knotted together and one ends up confronted with some unknown mystery.

When we analyse this text, we must take into account the text in its entirety, including the notes. This is when Freud indicates that point in the associations where the dream is connected up to the unknown, which he calls its navel.

We've arrived at whatever it is that lies behind the mystic trio. I say mystic because we now know its meaning. The three women, the three sisters, the three caskets, Freud has since shown us its meaning. The last term is death, as simple as that.[6]

That in fact is what it is all about. We can even see it coming to the surface in the middle of the hubbub of speech in the second part. The story of the diptheric membrane is directly tied to the threat, of real significance, to the life of one of Freud's daughters two years previously. Freud had taken it to be a punishment for a therapeutic blunder he'd committed when he'd given one of his patients an excessive dose of a drug, sulphonal, unaware that its habitual usage might have harmful side-effects. He thought he was thereby paying the price for his professional mistake.

In the second part, the three characters together play a ridiculous game of passing the buck with regard to these fundamental questions for Freud – What is the meaning of the neurosis? What is the meaning of the cure? How well-founded is my therapy for neurosis? And behind all this, there is the Freud who dreams whilst being a Freud who seeks the key to the dream. That is why the key to the dream is the same thing as the key to neurosis and the key to the cure.

Just as there's a highpoint in the first stage, when the apocalyptic revelation of what was there takes place, so there's also a peak in the second part. At first, directly [immédiatement], unmittelbar, just as in a delirious conviction when all of a sudden you know that it is him who's got something against you, they know that Otto's the culprit. He'd given an injection. The search is on – . . . propyl . . . propylene . . . With this is associated the very funny story of the pineapple juice[7] which Otto had given the family the day before. When opened, it smelt of cheap spirits. It was suggested – Let's give it to the servants. But Freud, more humane,[8] so he says, gently remarks: – No, it might poison them as well.[9]

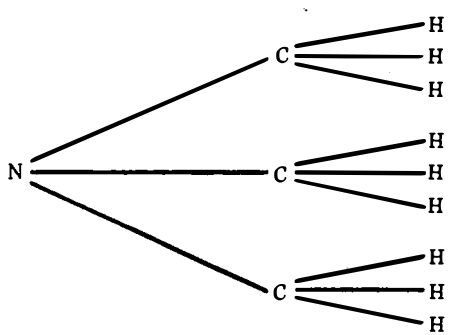
What emerges, printed in heavy type, beyond the hubbub of speech, like the Mene, Tekel, Upharsin of the Bible, is the formula for trimethylamine. I will write this formula out for you.

This explains everything, trimethylamine. The dream does not only owe its meaning to Freud's research on the meaning of dreams. If he can continue to ask himself the question, it is because he asks himself if all this communicates with Fliess, in whose elucubrations trimethylamine plays a role in connection with the decomposition products of sexual substances. Indeed – I've made inquiries – trimethylamine is a decomposition product of sperm, and it gives it its ammoniacal smell when it's left to decompose in the air. The dream, which culminated a first time, when the ego was there, with the horrific image I mentioned, culminates a second time at the end with a formula, with its Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin aspect, on the wall, beyond what we cannot but identify as speech, universal rumour.

Like my oracle, the formula gives no reply whatsoever to anything. But the very manner in which it is spelt out, its enigmatic, hermetic nature, is in fact the answer to the question of the meaning of the dream. One can model it closely on the Islamic formula – There is no other God but God. There is no other word, no other solution to your problem, than the word.

We can rely on the structure of this word, which here makes its appearance in an eminently symbolic form, since it is given in sacred signs.



These threes which we keep encountering, again and again, that's where, in the dream, the unconscious is – what is outside all of the subjects. The structure of the dream shows us clearly enough that the unconscious is not the ego of the dreamer, that it isn't Freud in the guise of Freud pursuing his conversation with Irma. It is a Freud who has come through this moment of great anxiety when his ego was identified with the whole in its most unconstituted form. Quite literally, he escaped, he called upon, as he himself wrote, the congress of all those who know. He fainted, was reabsorbed, was abolished behind them. And finally another voice is heard. One can play around with the alpha and omega of the thing. But even if we had N instead of AZ it would be the same nonsense – we could give the name Nemo to this subject outside the subject who designates the whole structure of the dream.[10]

So this dream teaches us the following – what is at stake in the function of the dream is beyond the ego, what in the subject is of the subject and not of the subject, that is the unconscious.

What does it matter to us at this point if Otto gave an injection with a dirty syringe? You can have a lot of fun with this syringe with all its everyday usages, which in German have all sorts of resonances which in French are given by the verb gicler [to spirt]. We are sufficiently familiar, on account of all kinds of small clues, with the importance of urethral erotism in Freud's life. One day when I am in a good mood, I'll show you that, until he was quite old, there was something in Freud in this area which clearly echoes the memory of his urinating in his parents' bedroom – to which Erikson attaches such importance. He tells us that there must have been a small chamber pot and that he can't have peed on the floor. Freud doesn't specify if he did it in the maternal chamber pot or on the carpet or the floorboards. But that is of secondary importance.

The important thing, and this dream shows us it, is that analytic symptoms are produced in the flow of a word which tries to get through. It always encounters the double resistance of what we will call just for today, because it is late, the ego of the subject and its image. So long as these two interpositions offer a sufficient resistance, they clarify each other, if I may put it like that, within this flow, they are phosphorescent, they flash.

That's what happens in the first phases of the dream, throughout which Freud is on the plane of resistance, playing with his patient. At a certain point in time, because it must have gone pretty far, it stops. He isn't completely wrong, Erikson, it really is because Freud was prey to such a passion for knowing that he carries on regardless.

What gives this dream its veritable unconscious value, whatever its [10] The last two sentences rely on the symbol for nitrogen in French chemical nomenclature being 'AZ' from 'azote' (from the Greek, 'a-', 'without' and 'zôê', 'life'); hence the reference to alpha and omega. 'Nemo' is Greek for 'no one'.

primordial and infantile echoes, is the quest for the word, the direct confrontation with the secret reality of the dream, the quest for signification as such. In the midst of all his colleagues, of this consensus of the republic of those who know – for if no one is right, every one is right, a law which is simultaneously paradoxical and reassuring – in the midst of this chaos, in this original moment when his doctrine is born into the world, the meaning of the dream is revealed to Freud – that there is no other word of the dream than the very nature of the symbolic.

The nature of the symbolic, I myself also want to introduce you into it by telling you, to serve you as a marker – symbols only ever have the value of symbols.

A traversal is accomplished. After the first part, the most loaded, imaginary part, something comes into the dream at the end which we could call the crowd. But it is a structured crowd, like the Freudian crowd. That is why I would prefer to introduce another term, which I will leave to your reflection with all the double meanings it contains – the inmixing [immixtion] of subjects.

The subject enters and mixes in with things – that may be the first meaning. The other one is this – an unconscious phenomenon which takes place on the symbolic level, as such decentred in relation to the ego, always takes place between two subjects. As soon as true speech emerges, mediating, it turns them into two very different subjects from what they were prior to speech. This means that they only start being constituted as subjects of speech once speech exists, and there is no before.

The dream of Irma's injection (conclusion)

THE IMAGINARY, THE REAL AND THE SYMBOLIC

What did you get out of M. Griaule's lecture yesterday evening?[1] In what way does it relate to our customary objects? Who has had time to distil its moral? What are your impressions?

Marcel Griaule made a rapid allusion to the Islamisation of an important segment of the populations of the Sudan, to the fact that the latter continue to function with a symbolic register while belonging to a style of religious credo clearly dissonant with this system. Their demand on this level is manifested in a very precise manner, for instance when they ask to be taught Arabic, because Arabic is the language of the Koran. That's a tradition which goes a long way back, is very much alive, and appears to have all manner of means for keeping itself afloat. Unfortunately, he left us hanging in mid-air.

You mustn't get the impression that Sudanese civilisation doesn't deserve its name. We have sufficient evidence of its creations and of its metaphysics to put into question the single scale by which we think we can gauge the quality of civilisations.

Who has read Lévi-Strauss's most recent article? That is what he is alluding to – certain errors in our ways of looking at things stem from the fact that we use a single scale to gauge the quality, the exceptional character, of a civilisation. The conditions in which these people live may at first sight seem rather harsh, rather precarious from the point of view of comfort and of civilisation, but they seem nonetheless to receive very powerful support in the symbolic function, isolated as such.

It has taken a long time for us to be capable of entering into communication with them. There's an analogy here with our position vis-à-vis the subject.

Let us come back to the dream of Irma's injection.

I would like to know whether what I told you was clearly understood. What was I trying to say? Who wants to speak?

Well, I think I highlighted the dramatic character of Freud's discovery of the meaning of dreams between 1895 and 1900, that is during the years when he is assembling his Traumdeutung. When I speak of the dramatic character, I would like, in support, to show you a passage from a letter to Fliess which follows the famous letter 137 in which, half-jokingly, half-seriously, but really terribly seriously, he suggests that this dream will be commemorated by a plaque – In this house on July 24th, 1895, the Secret of Dreams was revealed to Dr Sigmund Freud.

In letter 138, one reads – The big problems are still unsettled. It is an intellectual hell, layer upon layer of it, with everything fitfully gleaming and pulsating; and the outline of Lucifer-Amor coming into sight at the darkest centre.[2] It is an image of waves, of oscillations, as if the entire world were animated by a disquieting imaginary pulsation, and at the same time an image of fire, in which appears the silhouette of Lucifer, who seems to embody the anxiety-ridden dimension of Freud's experience. That is how he lived his forties, at the decisive moment when the discovery of the function of the unconscious was made.

The experience of the fundamental discovery was, for Freud, living through the putting into question of the very foundations of the world. We don't need any further indications concerning his self-analysis, in as much as he alludes to it rather than reveals anything about it in the letters to Fliess. He lives in an atmosphere of anxiety with the feeling that he's making a dangerous discovery.

The very meaning of the dream of Irma's injection is related to the depth of this experience. This dream is part of it, it is one of its stages. The dream Freud had is, as a dream, integrated in the progress of his discovery. That is how it acquires its double meaning. At the second level, this dream is not only an object which Freud deciphers, it is Freud's speech. That is what gives it its exemplary value – otherwise, it might perhaps be less demonstrative than other dreams. The value Freud accords it, as the dream whose deciphering was inaugural, would remain quite enigmatic if we didn't know how to read how it was that it specifically answered the question which confronted him, which, in short, went far beyond what Freud himself is at this point in time capable of analysing for us in what he writes.

What he weighs up, the balance-sheet he draws up of the significance of the dream, is far surpassed by the de facto historical value he grants it by placing it in this position in his Traumdeutung. That is essential to the understanding of this dream. And that is what enables us – I wanted your reply to bring confirmation of this, and I don't know how to interpret your silence – to give a convincing enough demonstration, I think, for me not to have to return to it again.

I will, nonetheless, return to it, but at another level.

I want to emphasise, in fact, how I didn't just limit myself to considering the dream itself in going over the interpretation Freud gives of it, but how I considered the whole constituted by the dream and his interpretation and how I did this by taking into account the specific function of the dream's interpretation in Freud's dialogue with us.

That is the essential point – we cannot separate off from the interpretation the fact that Freud makes of this dream our first step towards the key to the dream. It is us Freud is addressing when making this interpretation.

Careful examination of this dream can throw light on the very thorny question of regression, which is what we had got to in the penultimate seminar.

We are using it in a more and more routine manner, while not being oblivious to the fact that we are superimposing extremely different functions at every turn. Not everything, in regression, necessarily belongs to the same register, as this original chapter already indicates in relation to the topographical distinction, which is certainly sustained by temporal regression and formal regressions. On the level of topographical regression, the hallucinatory nature of the dream led Freud, in accordance with his schema, to articulate it with a regredient process, to the extent that it would bring back certain psychic requirements to their most primitive mode of expression, which would be situated at the level of perception. The dream's mode of expression would thus find itself subjected in part to the requirements of passing via figurative elements which would come closer and closer to the level of perception. But should a process which usually passes along the progredient line lead to these mnemic limitations, which are those of images? These images are further and further away from the qualitative level on which perception occurs, more and more denuded, they take on a more and more associative character, they belong more and more in the symbolic knot of resemblance, of identity and of difference, so beyond what properly speaking belongs to the associationist level.

Does our analysis of what is strictly figurative in the dream of Irma impose such an interpretation on us? Do we have to consider that what happens at the associative levels Mnem., Mnem.', Mnem.'', etc... brings us back more closely to the primitive point of entry of perception? Is this something which obliges us to adopt this schema, with all that that entails – as Valabrega pointed out – in the way of paradox? When we speak of unconscious processes coming into consciousness, we are indeed obliged to place consciousness at the exit, whereas perception, with which it is in fact closely bound up, is to be found at the entrance.

The phenomenology of the dream of Irma's injection led us to distinguish two parts. The first leads to the apparition of the terrifying anxiety-provoking image, to this real Medusa's head, to the revelation of this something which properly speaking is unnameable, the back of this throat, the complex, unlocatable form, which also makes it into the primitive object par excellence, the abyss of the feminine organ from which all life emerges, this gulf of the mouth, in which everything is swallowed up, and no less the image of death in which everything comes to its end, since in relation to the illness of his daughter, which could have been fatal, there's the death of the patient whom he had lost at a time adjacent to that of the illness of his daughter, which he considered to be some mysterious sort of divine retribution for his professional negligence – this Mathilde for that Mathilde, he writes. Hence there's an anxiety-provoking apparition of an image which summarises what we can call the revelation of that which is least penetrable in the real, of the real lacking any possible mediation, of the ultimate real, of the essential object which isn't an object any longer, but this something faced with which all words cease and all categories fail, the object of anxiety par excellence.

In the first phase, then, we see Freud in his chase after Irma, reproaching her for not understanding what he wants to get her to understand. He was carrying on his relationships in exactly the same style as he did in real life, in the style of the passionate quest, too passionate we would say, and it is indeed one of the meanings of the dream to say that formally, since at the end that is what it comes down to – the syringe was dirty, the passion of the analyst, the ambition to succeed, were here too pressing, the counter-transference was itself the obstacle.

When the dream reaches its first peak, what happens? Can we speak of a process of regression in order to explain the fundamental destructuration which then occurs in the experience of the dreamer? The relations of the subject change completely. He becomes something totally different, there's no Freud any longer, there is no longer anyone who can say I. This is the moment I've called the entry of the fool, since that is more or less the role played by the subjects on whom Freud calls. It's in the text – appelliere.[3] The Latin root of the word indicates the juridical meaning it has on this occasion – Freud appeals to the consensus of his fellow-beings, of his equals, of his colleagues, of his superiors. A decisive point.

So can we here speak, without further ado, of regression, even of the regression of the ego? It is in any event a very different notion from that of instinctual regression. The notion of the regression of the ego was introduced by Freud in the lectures grouped together under the title Introductory Lectures on Psycho-analysis.[4] It raises the question as to whether we can introduce without any further ado the notion of typical stages of the ego, with a development, phases, a normative progress.

[3] The phrase in the original is 'ich appelliere von ihm weg an einen anderen, Besserwissenden' – GW II/III 124; Stud II 138; SE IV 119.

[4] Known in French as Introduction à la Psychanalyse, the title Lacan quotes.

The question will not be resolved today, but you are familiar with a work which should be considered as essential to this subject, that of Anna Freud on The Ego and the Mechanisms of Defence. It has to be recognised that, in the present state of affairs, we can in no way introduce the notion of a typical, stylised development of the ego. This would require a defence mechanism whose very nature would indicate to us whether a symptom is attached to it, at what stage it figures in the psychic development of an ego. Regarding this, there is nothing which can be tabulated – as has been done, and perhaps overdone, for the development of instinctual relations. We are quite incapable, at this moment, of putting the different defence mechanisms which Anna Freud enumerates for us into a genetic schema with any resemblance, however slight, to that which can be drawn up for the development of instinctual relations.

This is what many authors try to provide. Erikson doesn't fail to do so. And yet, do we have to have recourse to that in order to understand this turning point in the dream, the shift from one phase to another? We're not dealing with an antecedent state of the ego, but, literally, with a spectral decompositon of the function of the ego. We can see the series of egos appear. Because the ego is made up of the series of identifications which represented an essential landmark for the subject, at each historical moment in his life, in a manner dependent on circumstances – you will find that in Das Ich und das Es, which follows Beyond the Pleasure Principle, the pivotal point we are in the process of rejoining after having taken this grand detour via the early stages of Freud's thinking.

This spectral decomposition is evidently an imaginary decomposition. It is on this that I would now like to focus your attention.

Following the Traumdeutung, Freud's thought reaches that stage which, correlatively with the Papers on Technique which we studied last year, is marked by the development of the theory of narcissism in the article Zur Einführung des Narzissmus, which we haven't been able to avoid referring to.

If Freud's theory, in which narcissism structures all of man's relations with the external world, has a meaning, if we have to draw its logical consequences, it does so in a manner which clearly is in harmony with everything which the so-called Gestaltist line of enquiry has given us in the course of the last few years concerning the development of the apprehension of the world by the living organism.

The structuring of the animal world is dominated by a certain number of fundamental images which give this world its lines of force majeure. It all happens so differently in man's world, whose structuration is seemingly highly neutralised, exceptionally loose in relation to his needs. Well then, the Freudian notion of narcissism gives us a category which enables us to understand to what extent there is nonetheless a relation between the structuration of the animal world and that of the human world.

What did I try to get across with the mirror stage? That whatever in man is loosened up, fragmented, anarchic, establishes its relation to his perceptions on a plane with a completely original tension. The image of his body is the principle of every unity he perceives in objects. Now, he only perceives the unity of this specific image from the outside, and in an anticipated manner. Because of this double relation which he has with himself, all the objects of his world are always structured around the wandering shadow of his own ego. They will all have a fundamentally anthropomorphic character, even egomorphic we could say. Man's ideal unity, which is never attained as such and escapes him at every moment, is evoked at every moment in this perception. The object is never for him definitively the final object, except in exceptional experiences. But it thus appears in the guise of an object from which man is irremediably separated, and which shows him the very figure of his dehiscence within the world – object which by essence destroys him, anxiety, which he cannot recapture, in which he will never truly be able to find reconciliation, his adhesion to the world, his perfect complementarity on the level of desire. It is in the nature of desire to be radically torn. The very image of man brings in here a mediation which is always imaginary, always problematic, and which is therefore never completely fulfilled. It is maintained by a succession of momentary experiences, and this experience either alienates man from himself, or else ends in a destruction, a negation of the object.

If the object perceived from without has its own identity, the latter places the man who sees it in a state of tension, because he perceives himself as desire, and as unsatisfied desire. Inversely, when he grasps his unity, on the contrary it is the world which for him becomes decomposed, loses its meaning, and takes on an alienated and discordant aspect. It is this imaginary oscillation which gives to all human perception the dramatic subjacency experienced by a subject, in so far as his interest is truly aroused.

So we do not have to look to regression for the reason why it is imaginary apparitions [surgissements] which are characteristic of the dream. To the extent that a dream may get to the point of entering the order of anxiety, and that a drawing nigh of the ultimate real is experienced, we find ourselves present at this imaginary decomposition which is only the revelation of the normal component parts of perception. For perception is a total relation to a given picture, in which man always recognises himself somewhere, and sometimes even sees himself in several places. If the picture of the relation to the world is not made unreal by the subject, it is because it contains elements representing the diversified images of his ego, and these are so many points of anchorage, of stabilisation, of inertia. That is exactly how I teach you to interpret dreams in supervisions – the main thing is to recognise where the ego of the subject is.

That's what we find already in the Traumdeutung, where Freud recognises on so many occasions that it is he, Freud, who is represented by this or that person. For instance, when he analyses the dream of the castle, of the Spanish-American war, in the chapter which we have begun to study, Freud says – I'm not in the dream where one might think. The character who just died, this commandant who is with me, it is he who is I.[5] At the moment when something of the real, something at its most unfathomable, is attained, the second part of the dream of Irma's injection highlights these fundamental components of the perceptual world constituting the narcissistic relation. The object is always more or less structured as the image of the body of the subject. The reflection of the subject, its mirror image, is always found somewhere in every perceptual picture, and that is what gives it a quality, a special inertia. This image is masked, sometimes even entirely so. But in the dream, because of an alleviation of the imaginary relations, it is easily revealed at every moment, all the more so to the extent that the point of anxiety where the subject encounters the experience of his being torn apart, of his isolation in relation to the world has been attained. There is something originally, inaugurally, profoundly wounded in the human relation to the world.

That is what comes out of the theory of narcissism Freud gave us, in so far as this framework introduces an indefinable, a no exit, marking all relations, and especially the libidinal relations of the subject. Verliebtheit is fundamentally narcissistic. On the libidinal level, the object is only ever apprehended through the grid of the narcissistic relation.

That happens when we see the subject substituted for by the polycephalic subject – this crowd I was speaking about last time, a crowd in the Freudian sense, the one discussed in Massenpsychologie und Ich-Analyse, made up of the imaginary plurality of the subject, of the fanning out, the blossoming of the different identifications of the ego. At first this seems to us like an abolition, a destruction of the subject as such. The subject transformed into this polycephalic image seems to be somewhat acephalic. If there is an image which could represent for us the Freudian notion of the unconscious, it is indeed that of the acephalic subject, of a subject who no longer has an ego, who doesn't belong to the ego. And yet he is the subject who speaks, for that's who gives all the characters in the dream their nonsensical lines – which precisely derive their meaning from their nonsensical character.

In fact, just when the discourse of the multiple ego makes itself heard in a great cacophony, the objection which interests Freud is his own guilt, on this occasion towards Irma. The object is destroyed, if I can put it like this, and his guilt, which is what is in question, is destroyed with it. As in the story of the kettle with a hole in it, there is no crime here, since firstly, the victim was – which the dream says in a thousand different ways – already dead, that is to say was already ill with an organic ailment which is precisely what Freud could not cure, secondly, the murderer, Freud, was innocent of any intention to harm, and thirdly, the crime in question was curative, for the illness, which was dysentery – there is a play on words between dysentery and diphtheria – is precisely what will relieve the patient – all the pain, the bad moods, will leave with it.

In Freud's associations, this chimes in with a ludicrous incident he'd heard of in the days preceding his dream. A doctor, with a cutting and oracular tongue, at the same time profoundly absent-minded – doctors have throughout history retained this air of being characters in a comedy when they carry out their function of consultant – a doctor gives his opinion on a case in which it has been pointed out to him that the subject has albumen in his urine. To which he retorts – No matter, the albumen will be eliminated.

That, in fact, is what the dream leads up to. The coming into operation of the symbolic function in its most radical, absolute, usage ends up abolishing the action of the individual so completely that by the same token it eliminates his tragic relation to the world. The paradoxical and absurd equivalent of Everything real is rational.

The strictly philosophical contemplation of the world can indeed place us in a sort of ataraxia in which any individual is justified by the motives which make him act, and which are conceived as totally determining him. Any action, being the cunning of reason, is equally valid. The extreme use of the radically symbolic character of all truth thus makes it lose the sharp edge of its relation to the truth. At the heart of the flow of events, of the functioning of reason, the subject from the first move finds himself to be no more than a pawn, forced inside this system, and excluded from any truly dramatic, and consequently tragic, participation in the realisation of truth.

This is something extreme, which takes place at the outer edge of the dream. Freud recognises the secret animation of this dream in this procedure dedicated to excusing, the aim pursued by what he calls the structuring desire. This leads us to address the question as to the joint between the imaginary and the symbolic.

I have already allowed you to perceive the mediating function of the symbolic when, in trying to find a mechanistic representation of the interhuman relation, I drew upon the most recent experiments in cybernetics. I supposed that a certain number of these artificial subjects were captivated by the image of their fellow-being. So that this system doesn't amount to being a more and more paralysing, vast concentric hallucination, so that it works, the intervention of a regulatory third party was necessary, which would put this distance, the distance of a certain prescribed order, between them.

Well, approaching from a different angle, we come upon the same thing again – every imaginary relation comes about via a kind of you or me between the subject and the object. That is to say – If it's you, I'm not. If it's me, it's you who isn't. That's where the symbolic element comes into play. On the imaginary level, the objects only ever appear to man within relations which fade. He recognises his unity in them, but uniquely from without. And in as much he recognises his unity in an object, he feels himself to be in disarray in relation to the latter.

This disarray, this fragmentedness, this fundamental discordance, this essential lack of adaptation, this anarchy, which opens up every possibility of displacement, that is of error, is characteristic of the instinctual life of man – the very experience of analysis shows us that. What is more, if the object is only ever graspable as a mirage, the mirage of a unity which can never be grasped again on the imaginary level, every object relation can only be infected with a fundamental uncertainty by it. That is in fact what so many different experiences show one, and calling them psychopathological conveys nothing since they lie on a continuum with many experiences which themselves are regarded as normal.

That is where the symbolic relation comes in. The power of naming objects structures the perception itself. The percipi of man can only be sustained within a zone of nomination. It is through nomination that man makes objects subsist with a certain consistence. If objects had only a narcissistic relationship with the subject, they would only ever be perceived in an momentary fashion. The word, the word which names, is the identical. The word doesn't answer to the spatial distinctiveness of the object, which is always ready to be dissolved in an identification with the subject, but to its temporal dimension. The object, at one instant constituted as a semblance[6] of the human subject, a double of himself, nonetheless has a certain permanence of appearance over time, which however does not endure indefinitely, since all objects are perishable. This appearance which lasts a certain length of time is strictly only recognisable through the intermediary of the name. The name is the time of the object. Naming constitutes a pact, by which two subjects simultaneously come to an agreement to recognise the same object. If the human subject didn't name – as Genesis says it was done in earthly Paradise – the major species first, if the subjects do not come to an agreement over this recognition, no world, not even a perception, could be sustained for more than one instant. That is the joint, the emergence of the dimension of the symbolic in relation to the imaginary.

In the dream of Irma's injection, it is just when the world of the dreamer is plunged into the greatest imaginary chaos that discourse enters into play, discourse as such, independently of its meaning, since it is a senseless discourse. It then seems that the subject decomposes and disappears. In this dream there's the recognition of the fundamentally acephalic character of the subject, beyond a given point. This point is designated by the N of the trimethylamine formula. That's where the I of the subject is at that moment. And my suggestion to you that you see in that the dream's last word wasn't said without humour, nor without hesitation, since that is almost a Witz. Just when the hydra has lost its heads, a voice which is nothing more than the voice of no one causes the trimethylamine formula to emerge, as the last word on the matter, the word for everything. And this word means nothing except that it is a word.

That has almost a delirious air about it, and in fact it is. Let's say that it would be if all by himself the subject, Freud all by himself, analysing his dream, tried to find in it, proceeding as an occultist might, the secret designation of the point where as a matter of fact the solution to the mystery of the subject and the world lies. But he isn't all by himself. Once he communicates the secret of this Luciferian mystery to us, Freud is not confronted with this dream by himself. Just as the dream is addressed to the analyst in an analysis, Freud in his dream is already addressing himself to us.

He is already dreaming for the community of psychologists, of anthropologists. When he interprets this dream, it is us that he is addressing. And that is why seeing the word in the absurd final word of the dream isn't to reduce it to a delirium, since Freud, by means of this dream, makes himself heard by us, and effectively puts us on the road towards his object, which is the understanding of the dream. It isn't just for himself that he finds the Nemo or the alpha and omega of the acephalic subject, which represents his unconscious. On the contrary, by means of this dream it's him who speaks, and who realises that he is telling us – without having wanted to, without having recognised it at first, and only recognising it in his analysis of the dream, that is to say while speaking to us – something which is both him and no longer him – I am he who wants to be forgiven for having dared to begin to cure these patients, who until now no one wanted to understand and whose cure was forbidden. I am he who wants not to be guilty of it, for to transgress any limit imposed up to now on human activity is always to be guilty. I want to not be (born) that. [Je veux n'être pas cela.] Instead of me, there are all the others. Here I am only the representative of this vast, vague movement, the quest for truth, in which I efface myself. I am no longer anything. My ambition was greater than I. No doubt the syringe was dirty. And precisely to the extent that I desired it too much, that I partook in this action, that I wanted to be, myself, the creator, I am not the creator. The creator is someone greater than I. It is my unconscious, it is this voice which speaks in me, beyond me.[7]

That is the meaning of this dream.

This analysis will now enable us to go further and understand how we should conceive of the death instinct, the death instinct's relation to the symbol, to this speech which is in the subject without being the speech of the subject. A question which we will keep in mind for the time it will take for it to gain weight in our minds, and for us to make the attempt when our turn comes to give a schematisation of the function of the death instinct. We are beginning to see why it is necessary that beyond the pleasure principle, which Freud introduces as being what governs the measure of the ego and installs consciousness in its relation with a world in which it finds itself, that beyond, exists the death instinct. Beyond the homeostases of the ego, there exists a dimension, another current, another necessity, whose plane must be differentiated. This compulsion to return to something which has been excluded by the subject, or which never entered into it, the Verdrängt, the repressed, we cannot bring it back within the pleasure principle. If the ego as such rediscovers and recognises itself, it is because there is a beyond to the ego, an unconscious, a subject which speaks, unknown to the subject. We must therefore posit another principle.

Why did Freud call it the death instinct?

That's what we will try to get hold of in the encounters to come.

BEYOND THE IMAGINARY, THE SYMBOLIC, OR FROM THE LITTLE TO THE BIG OTHER

XV

Odd or even? Beyond intersubjectivity

AN ULTIMATE QUOD
THE MACHINE WHICH PLAYS
MEMORY AND REMINISCENCE
INTRODUCTION TO THE PURLOINED LETTER

I am sorry that our good friend Riguet isn't here today, for we are going to touch on questions on which he could perhaps have cast some light. We are going to brush up on the data of what in a confused fashion is called cybernetics, which is nonetheless something which concerns us in the highest degree in this little matter we've been pursuing for the last two seminars, what is the subject?, in so far as it is, technically speaking, in the Freudian sense of the word, the unconscious subject, and by way of that, essentially the subject who speaks.

Now, it seems more and more clear to us that this subject who speaks is beyond the ego.

Let us begin again at the acme of the specimen dream of Irma's injection. In so far as it continues the quest of the previous day, the dream's quest leads to the gap, to this open mouth at the back of which Freud sees this terrifying, composite image which we compared to the revelation of the Medusa's head.

This dream is not unique in this respect. Those who participated in my seminars the year before they were held here may recall the singular character of the Wolfman's dream, of which it could be said that it has, over the whole of the analysis of this case, a function analogous to the acme which we discern in the dream of Irma's injection. In fact, it enters into account after a long period of analysis, the very intellectualised – a term which isn't in the text but which corresponds well to what Freud means – character of which Freud himself notes, as a kind of analytical game, which nonetheless constitutes an authentic quest on the part of the subject, but for a very long time remains at the surface, as if inoperative. It is a stagnant analysis which promises to be interminable, when at last the dream appears, reactivated by a specific occasion in the life of the subject, and its great importance deriving from having been repeated many times over, from a given epoch in childhood on.

What is this dream? It is the apparition, through a suddenly opened window, of the sight of a large tree, on whose branches wolves are perched. In the dream and in the drawing which the subject has bequeathed to us, which Freud reproduced, they are sufficiently enigmatic for us legitimately to wonder if they are really wolves, for they have distinctive fox tails, which we have formerly paused over to discuss. As you know, this dream turns out to be extremely rich, and the associations it triggers will lead Freud and his subject to nothing less than to the discovery, purely posited, reconstructed, of the primal scene.

The primal scene is reconstructed from the cross-checking which takes place in the course of analysis, it isn't relived. Nothing emerges in the memory of the subject – we will have to ask ourselves about this term memory – which might lead to talking about the resurrection of the scene, but everything forces one to the conviction that it did indeed happen in this way. So in this respect there's a far more significant gap between this scene and what the subject sees in the dream than the normal distance between the latent content and the manifest content of a dream. And yet, in both cases, we have a fascinating vision, which for a time suspends the subject in a state of captivation in which he loses himself. To Freud, the vision of the dream seems like the reversal of the fascination of the gaze. It is in the gaze of these wolves, so anxiety-provoking in the account of it given by the dreamer, that Freud sees the equivalent of the fascinated gaze of the infant confronted with the scene which profoundly marked him in the imaginary and redirected his entire instinctual life. We find there something like a unique and decisive revelation of the subject, in which an indefinite something that is unsayable is concentrated, in which the subject is lost for a moment, blown up. As in the dream of Irma's injection, the subject decomposes, fades away, dissociates into its various egos. Similarly, after the dream of the Wolfman, we witness the real start of the analysis, which makes possible the dissociation inside the subject of a personality which is so singularly composite that it makes for the originality of the style of the case. As you know, the problems left outstanding by this analysis were to be so serious that in the aftermath it could degenerate into psychosis. As I pointed out to you, one can ask whether the latter wasn't linked to the manoeuvrings of the analysis.

In the two dreams in question, we find ourselves confronted by a sort of ultimate experience, confronted by the apprehension of an ultimate real. What is most anxiety-provoking in Freud's life, his relations with women, his relations with death, are telescoped in the central vision of his dream and could certainly be extracted from it by an associative analysis. Enigmatic image apropos of which Freud evokes the navel of the dream, this abyssal relation to that which is most unknown, which is the hallmark of an exceptional, privileged experience, in which the real is apprehended beyond all mediation, be it imaginary or symbolic. In short, one could say that such privileged experiences, and especially it would seem in a dream, are characterised by the relation which is established with an absolute other, I mean an other beyond all intersubjectivity.

This beyond of the intersubjective relation is attained most especially on the imaginary level. What's at issue is an essential alien [dissemblable], who is neither the supplement, nor the complement of the fellow being [semblable], who is the very image of dislocation, of the essential tearing apart of the subject. The subject passes beyond this glass in which he always sees, entangled, his own image. All interposition between the subject and the world ceases. One gets the feeling that a passage into a kind of a-logic occurs, and that's where the problem in fact begins, for we see that we are not in it. And yet the logos doesn't forego all its rights here, since that's where the essential meaning of the dream, its liberating meaning, begins, since that's where Freud found an escape from his latent guilt. In the same way, the subject will find the key to his problems beyond the terrifying experience of the Wolfman's dream.

It's also the question we encountered in the little scientific meeting yesterday evening – to what extent does the symbolic relation, the relation of language, retain its value beyond the subject, in as much as it may be characterised as centred in an ego – by an ego, for an alter-ego?

Human knowledge, and by the same token the sphere of relations of consciousness, consists in a certain relation to this structure that we call the ego, around which the imaginary relation is centred. The latter has taught us that the ego is never just the subject, that it is essentially a relation to the other, that it finds its point of departure and its fulcrum in the other. All the objects are considered from the standpoint of the ego.

But all the objects are in fact desired from the standpoint of a primitively discordant subject, a subject fundamentally fragmented by this ego. The subject cannot desire without itself dissolving, and without seeing, because of this very fact, the object escaping it, in a series of infinite displacements – I am here alluding to what I call, in a short-hand way, the fundamental disorder of the instinctual life of man. And the tension between the subject – which cannot desire without being fundamentally separated from the object – and the ego, where the gaze towards the object starts, is the starting point for the dialectic of consciousness.

I have tried to fashion before you the myth of a consciousness without ego, which could be defined as the reflection of the mountain in a lake. The ego appears, for its part, in the world of objects, as an object, though a privileged one to be sure. Consciousness in man is by essence a polar tension between an ego alienated from the subject and a perception which fundamentally escapes it, a pure percipi. The subject would be strictly identical to this perception if there weren't this ego which, if one may put it like this, makes it emerge from out of its very perception in a relationship of tension. Under certain conditions, this imaginary relation itself reaches its own limit, and the ego fades away, dissipates, becomes disorganised, dissolves. The subject is precipitated into a confrontation with something which under no circumstances can be confused with the everyday experience of perception, something which we could call an id, and which we will simply call, so as not to lead to confusion, a quod, a what-is-it? The question we're going to raise today concerns this confrontation of the subject beyond the ego with the quod which seeks to come into being in analysis.

Can an interrogation be sustained concerning this ultimate quod, which is the experience of the unconscious subject as such, concerning which we no longer know who or what it is? The evolution of analysis itself in this respect puts us in a peculiarly strange position, in so far as it takes as an irreducible given these tendencies of the subject which on the other hand it shows us to be permeable, traversed and structured like signifiers, playing, beyond the real, in the register of meaning, playing on the equivalence of the signified and the signifier in its most material aspect, plays on words, puns, witticisms – which in the end leads to the abolition of the human sciences, in that the last word of the witticism demonstrates the supreme mastery of the subject in relation to the signified itself, since it puts it to all kinds of use, since it plays with it essentially in order to annihilate it.

I'd now like to draw your attention to an exemplary experience, which will constitute a first step for us towards the elucidation of what a quis we are ignorant of ponders, in this beyond of the imaginary relation in which the other is absent and in which all intersubjectivity apparently dissolves.

You know that a great fuss is made of adding machines in cybernetics. They have even been called thinking machines, in so far as some of them certainly are capable of solving logical problems, conceived, it is true, in a quite artificial manner, so as to confuse the mind for a moment, in such a way that we don't do as well at them as they do.

Today we won't go into these arcana. You can bring a horse to water, but you can't make him drink, and so as not to instill too great an aversion in you to this exercise, I am going to try to lead you into this domain in a more entertaining manner. We have never despised the entertainments of physics and mathematical recreations – you can get a lot out of it.

Amongst these adding or thinking machines there are others which have been dreamt up, which have endearing peculiarities – these are machines which play, inscribed within the functioning and, quite singularly, within the limit of a certain strategy.

Just this fact, that a machine can have a strategy, already leads us to the heart of the problem. For in the end, what is a strategy? How can a machine partake in it? Today I will try to bring home to you the elementary truths which are swept away by that.

A machine has been constructed, so I hear, which plays the game of even and odd. I won't vouch for this, as I haven't seen it, but I can promise you that before the end of these seminars I will – our good friend Riguet told me that he would confront me with it. One must have experience of these things, one can't talk about a machine without having had a shot at it, seen what it can do, made some discoveries, even some sentimental ones. The real eye-opener is that the machine I'm talking about ends up winning. You know the game, you must still have some memories of school. You put two or three marbles in your hand, and you put out your closed fist to the opponent, saying – Odd or even? I have, two marbles say, and if he says odd, he must hand one over to me. And so on.

Let us try to consider for a moment what it means for a machine to play the game of even and odd. We couldn't work it all out by ourselves, because it would look a bit heavy-handed in the circumstances. A short text comes to our aid, from Edgar Poe, which the cyberneticists, I noticed, make something of. This text is in The Purloined Letter, an absolutely sensational short story, which could even be considered as essential for a psychoanalyst.

The characters concerned to recover the purloined letter, which I will tell you more about later, are two policemen. One is the prefect of police, that is to say, in accordance with literary conventions, an idiot. The other is a nobody, an amateur policeman with dazzling intelligence, called Dupin, who foreshadows Sherlock Holmes and those other heroes of the novels you devour in your free time. The latter comes out with the following –

I knew one about eight years of age, whose success at guessing in the game of 'even and odd' attracted universal admiration. This game is simple, and is played with marbles. One player holds in his hand a number of these toys, and demands of another whether that number is even or odd. If the guess is right, the guesser wins one; if wrong, he loses one. The boy to whom I allude won all the marbles of the school. Of course he had some principle of guessing; and this lay in mere observation and admeasurement of the astuteness of his opponents. For example, an arrant simpleton is his opponent, and, holding up his closed hand, asks, "Are they even or odd?" Our schoolboy replies, "Odd," and loses; but upon the second trial he wins, for he then says to himself, "The simpleton had them even upon the first trial, and his amount of cunning is just sufficient to make him have them odd upon the second; I will therefore guess odd;" – he guesses odd, and wins. Now, with a simpleton a degree above the first, he would have reasoned thus: "This fellow finds that in the first instance I guessed odd, and, in the second, he will propose to himself upon the first impulse, a simple variation from even to odd, as did the first simpleton; but then a second thought will suggest that this is too simple a variation, and finally he will decide upon putting it even as before. I will therefore guess even;" – he guesses even, and wins. Now this mode of reasoning in the schoolboy, whom his fellows termed "lucky," – what, in its last analysis, is it?'

'It is merely,' I said, 'an identification of the reasoner's intellect with that of his opponent.'

'It is,' said Dupin; 'and, upon inquiring of the boy by what means he effected the thorough identification in which his success consisted, I received answer as follows: "When I wish to find out how wise, or how stupid, or how good, or how wicked is any one, or what are his thoughts at the moment, I fashion the expression of my face, as accurately as possible, in accordance with the expression of his, and then wait to see what thoughts or sentiments arise in my mind or heart, as if to match or correspond with the expression." This response of the schoolboy lies at the bottom of all the spurious profundity which has been attributed to Rochefoucault, to La Bougive, to Machiavelli, and to Campanella.'

'And the identification,' I said, 'of the reasoner's intellect with that of his opponent, depends, if I understand you aright, upon the accuracy with which the opponent's intellect is admeasured.'

We are here faced with reasoning which raises a certain number of problems.

At first glance, it is a matter of simple psychological penetration, a kind of egomiming. The subject adopts a mirror position, enabling him to guess the behaviour of his adversary. Nonetheless, even this method already presupposes the dimension of intersubjectivity, in that the subject has to know that he is faced with another subject, in principle homogeneous with him. The variations to which he may be subject have far less importance than the possible scansions of the position of the other. There is no other ground for psychological reasoning.

What are these scansions? There is a first period [temps] in which I suppose the other subject to be in exactly the same position as me, thinking what I am thinking at the very moment I am thinking it. Let us suppose that it seems to me, for my part, that it would be more natural for the other to change theme, for him to switch from even to odd, for instance. In the first period [temps], I believe that this is what he will do. The important thing is that there may be a second period [temps], in which a less partial subjectivity is manifested. The subject is in fact capable of making himself other, and to end up thinking that the other, being himself an other, thinks like him, and that he has to place himself in the position of a third party, to get out of being this other who is his pure reflection. As third party, I realise that if that other doesn't play the game, he fools his opponent. And from then on I'm ahead of him, by opting for the position opposite to the one which seemed to me, in the first period [temps], to be the most natural.

But after this second period [temps], you can suppose a third, which makes it extremely difficult to pursue the same analogical reasoning. After all, someone of superior intelligence can in fact understand that the trick is, notwithstanding the fact that one seems to be very intelligent, to play like an idiot, that is to return to the first formula. What does that mean? This – if the game of even and odd is played on the level of the dual relation, of the equivalence of one and the other, of the alter ego and the ego, you will very quickly realise that you haven't reached any kind of second order, since as soon as you think of the third, an oscillation returns you to the first. This doesn't preclude something in the technique of the game from partaking as a matter of fact in the mythical identification with the opponent. But that's a fundamental bifurcation.

It may be that something like a divination, which, however, is problematic, is put into effect, a divination by the subject who has a certain sympathetic rapport with the opponent. It's not out of the question that there may have been such a young child who won more frequently than his turn should allow – which is the only definition one can give in this instance of the word win. But the heart of the matter lies in a completely different register from that of imaginary intersubjectivity.

That the subject should think the other to be similar [semblable] to himself, and that he reasons as he thinks the other must reason – in the first period [temps] like this, in the second period like that – is a fundamental point of departure failing which nothing can be thought, yet is nonetheless totally inadequate in helping us penetrate in any degree to where the key to success might be found. I don't consider the interpsychological experience to be excluded in this case, but it insinuates itself within the fragile framework of the imaginary relation to the other, and it hangs on that very uncertainty. Within this framework, the experience is one which fades away. It cannot be made logical. Take another look at the dialectic of the game of black and white discs placed on the backs of the three characters who have to work out what their own sign is on the basis of what they see on the two others. You will be in a position to discover something of the same order.

We will take the other path, the one which can be made logical, the one which can be upheld in discourse. Obviously it imposes itself as soon as your partner is the machine.

It is clear that you don't have to ask yourself whether the machine is stupid or intelligent, whether it will play in accordance with its first or its second go. Inversely, the machine has no means of placing itself in a reflexive position in relation to its human partner.

What is it to play with a machine? The physiognomy of the machine, however prepossessing it may be, can be of no help whatsoever in this instance. No means of getting out of it by way of identification. One is thus from the start forced to take the path of language [langage], of the possible combinatory of the machine. One knows one can expect from the machine a series of relations, operating with an excessive rapidity thanks to those amazing relays, the electronic phases, and, according to the latest news, these transistors the papers can't stop talking about, with a commercial aim in mind no doubt, but one which doesn't put in question the quality of these objects.

But before we ask ourselves what the machine is going to do, let us ask ourselves what it means to win and lose at the game of even and odd.

On the basis of one single go, it has no meaning whatsoever. Whether your answer coincides with what's in your partner's hand is no more surprising than the converse. For one go, it makes no sense, except purely conventionally, to win or to lose. Odd, even, it has no importance whatsoever. Do remember that the best translation of the odd number is the number two, which rejoices in being odd, and with reason, for if it didn't have a reason for rejoicing in being odd, it wouldn't be even either. So, all you have to do is invert this game into the game who loses wins [qui perd gagne], for it to be quite evident that these things are equivalent.

What is more surprising is losing or winning twice in a row. For if on one go you have a 50% chance each way, you have only a 25% chance of repeating it the second time.

− −
\+ −

And on the third go, there is only a 12.5% chance of continuing to win or lose.

Moreover, this is purely theoretical, for from then on, I'd like you to see that we are no longer at all in the domain of the real, but in that of the symbolic signification which we've defined by these plus-minuses and these minus-pluses. From the point of view of the real, on each occasion there are as many chances of winning as of losing. The very notion of probability and chance presupposes the introduction of a symbol into the real. It's a symbol you're addressing, and your chances bear only on the symbol. In the real, at each go, you have as many chances of winning or of losing as on the preceding go. There is no reason why, by a pure fluke, you might not win ten times in a row. This only begins to have meaning when you write a sign, and as long as you're not there to write it, there is nothing that can be called a win. The pact of the game is essential to the reality of the experience sought after.

Now let us see what is going to happen with the machine.

What's interesting is that you end up going through the same motions as you would with a partner. By pushing a button, you ask it a question about a quod which you have there in your hand, and all this is about knowing what it is. That already tells you that this quod may perhaps not be reality but a symbol. You are asking the machine a question about a symbol, a machine whose structure must in fact bear some family resemblance to the symbolic order, and that is precisely why it is a machine for playing, a strategic machine. But let us not go into details.

The machine is constructed in such a way that it gives a response. You had plus in your hand. It gives the answer minus. It lost. The fact that it lost consists solely in the dissimilarity [dissemblance] of plus and minus.

You are obliged to inform the machine that it has lost by inscribing a minus. I really don't know whether that is how the machine works, but it's all the same to me – there's no other way it can work, and if it does work some other way, it is equivalent to that.

How on earth can this machine, which in principle should beat me, be put together? Will it play at random? That makes no sense at all. It may well be that for its first three answers it always says the same thing, but that isn't the point. It is in the succession of its answers that we find the beginnings of the phenomenon.

Let us suppose that at the start the machine is really stupid – it really doesn't matter in the least whether it is stupid or intelligent, since being stupid is the height of intelligence. Let us say that, to begin with, it always answers the same thing. It so happens that I, who am intelligent, say plus. As it still answers me minus, it puts me on the right track. I say to myself – the machine must be a bit slow – I could just as well tell myself the contrary – and in actual fact let us suppose that it loses again.

This is where the fact that we have had several gos must necessarily come into the construction of my machine. Here another section of the machine starts coming into play, recording the fact that it has lost three times – I'm not sure of that, but I can assume it. Besides, as I am very intelligent, but nonetheless not as intelligent as all that, I can suppose that the machine quite stupidly changes and that it's me that is a bit slow on this occasion. This time the machine wins.

3 + −
4 + +

Having lost three gos, the machine, then, begins to react. What am I to do? I say to myself – perhaps it will persevere, so I'll change my tune. Let us assume that I win.

5 − +

I'm not forced to reason like this, but I want to show you its limits. I can tell myself that, now that it has won, the machine will wait until after the third go to change. So I think that it will play plus one more time and I play minus. But suppose that the second section comes into play when there has been minus three times. So now my machine plays minus, and wins yet again.

I want to draw your attention to the fact that the machine has won twice using rather similar means. This isn't to show you that this is the way in which the machine will win. But depending on the complexity of the elaborated mechanism, and the successive sections which can furnish a certain amount of information as to the pluses or minuses, transformations, which in their turn may be coordinated amongst themselves, will end up yielding a temporal modulation analogous to what takes place in the confrontation of two players. All one needs to posit is a machine complex enough to have a sufficient number of superimposed sections bringing together a large enough count of previous goes – instead of grouping three of them, it could group eight or ten – and its range will be beyond my understanding. Nevertheless it cannot go beyond its reproduction on paper, that is to say I myself can also examine it, on condition that I go over the entire combinatory myself before I risk my hand at it. So there I am entering into some sort of rivalry with it.

I want to draw your attention to the fact that, under these conditions, there's no reason why the machine should win rather than me, except for my exhaustion. To reconstruct the number of sections in this machine, the sets sampled by it at every moment whereby it determines its play, I would be faced with problems of such mathematical complexity that I would have to have recourse to – note the irony – an adding machine.

But then, I'm not playing at even and odd, I am playing at predicting the play of the machine. Now, I will start playing, to find out what will happen.

One could suppose the machine to be capable of drawing up a psychological profile of its adversary. But earlier on I drew your attention to the fact that the latter only functions within the framework of intersubjectivity. The whole question is summed up as the problem of knowing whether the other is cunning enough to know that, I too, am an other for him, if he is capable of going beyond this second period [temps]. If I suppose him to be identical to myself, by the same token I suppose him capable of thinking with respect to me what I am in the process of thinking concerning him, and to think that I am going to think that he will do the opposite of what he thinks I am in the process of thinking. A simple oscillation which always comes back. From this fact alone, everything pertaining to the order of the psychological profile is completely eliminated.

What happens if, on the other hand, I play at random? You know the chapter in The Psychopathology of Everyday Life which deals with the production of a random number.[1] That's an experiment which certainly does escape the well known metaphor of the rabbit which one is always advised to remember was previously put in the hat. Freud – with the assistance of his subject, but it is clearly because the subject is speaking to Freud that it works – Freud is the first to notice that a number drawn from the hat will quickly bring out things which will lead the subject to that moment when he slept with his little sister, even to the year he failed his baccalaureat because that morning he had masturbated. If we acknowledge such experiences, we will be obliged to postulate that chance doesn't exist. While the subject doesn't think about it, the symbols continue to mount one another, to copulate, to proliferate, to fertilise each other, to jump on each other, to tear each other apart. And when you take one out, you can project on to it the speech of this unconscious subject we've been talking about.

In other words, even if the word of my life had to be sought in something as long as an entire recital of the Aeneid, it isn't unthinkable that a machine would in time succeed in reconstituting it. Now, any machine can be reduced to a series of relays which are simply pluses and minuses. Everything, in the symbolic order, can be represented with the aid of such a series.

One mustn't confuse the history, in which the unconscious subject inscribes himself, with his memory – a word I wouldn't be the first one to tell you is used in a confusing way. On the contrary, at the point we have reached, it is important to draw a very sharp distinction between memory and remembering [remémoration], which pertains to the order of history.

Memory has been spoken of as a means of characterising the living organism as such. One then says that a living substance, following a given experience, undergoes a transformation such that it will no longer react to the same experience in the same way as before. This is all rather ambiguous – to react differently, what does that mean? within what limits? No longer reacting at all, isn't that an effect of memory? Is the experience of death, definitively recorded, a memory? In any case, there is no reason to identify this memory, a definable property of living substance, with remembering, the grouping and the succession of symbolically defined events, the pure symbol engendering in its turn a succession.

What goes on in the machine at this level, to confine ourselves just to that, is analogous to the remembering we deal with in analysis. Indeed, memory is here the result of integrations. The first section added on to the basic memory is made up of a section which groups results by threes. This result, memorised, is available to be brought in at any moment. But the next moment, it may well no longer be at all the same. It is possible that it has changed content, changed sign, changed structure. If an error occurs in the course of the experience, what happens? It's not what happens afterwards which is modified, but everything which went before. We have a retroactive effect – nachträglich, as Freud calls it – specific to the structure of symbolic memory, in other words to the function of remembering.

I think that this little apologue, with its problematic character, has introduced you to the following, that for there to be a subject who asks a question, all that is needed is a quod upon which the interrogation bears. Do we even have to concern ourselves with what this subject is and with respect to which other it is to be located? That is totally useless. The most important thing is the symbolic quod. For the subject it is like an image in the mirror, but of a different order – it isn't for nothing that Odysseus pierces the eye of the Cyclop.

In so far as he speaks, the subject can perfectly well find his answer, his return, his secret, his mystery, in the constructed symbol which modern machines represent for us, namely something far more acephalic still than what we encountered in the dream of Irma's injection.

It raises the question of the relation of signification to the living man.

Earlier on we referred to The Purloined Letter. Everything in this tale revolves around the problems of signification, of meaning, of received opinion, and precisely because received opinion is held in common, the truth is at stake in it.

You know the theme of the story. The prefect of police is charged with the recovery of a letter which was stolen by someone of considerable distinction, who is perfectly amoral. The character in question lifted this letter from the table in the Queen's boudoir. The letter came from another person of distinction whose relations with her she had reason to hide. She doesn't succeed in hiding the letter as quickly as she wanted to but the gesture she makes is enough for the libertine minister, culprit and hero, to see the importance of the piece of paper. She acts as if nothing had happened, and places the letter in plain view. As for the King, who is also there, by definition he is destined not to notice anything, on condition that one doesn't attract his attention. This is what allows the minister, with a manoeuvre consisting in producing a vaguely analogous letter, which he places on the table, to get his hands on it under the nose and in full view – and that's the snag[2] – of those present, this letter which will for him be a source of considerable power over the royal persons, without anyone being able to say anything about it. The Queen realises full well what is happening, but she is bound by the exact conditions of the three-sided game.

The point is to find the letter. All kinds of speculations, including an echo regarding the game of even and odd, lead one to understand that the play of intersubjectivity is so essential that all that's needed is for someone to have the technique, the knowledge and the rigour, for someone to be fascinated by the real, as very intelligent people are, which makes them strict imbeciles. The house of the minister is searched inch by inch, numbering each cubic foot. Everything is looked at through the microscope, long needles passed through cushions, all the scientific methods are employed. And the letter isn't found. However, the letter has to be in the house, for the minister must have constant access to it so as to be able to shove it under the King's nose. He doesn't carry it on himself, since they had him pickpocketed.

The play here is on the very seductive idea that the more the policemen act like policemen the less they'll find. It will never occur to them that the letter is right under their noses, hung on a ribbon above the fireplace. The thief was content just to give it a wellworn look, to camouflage it by turning it inside out and putting another seal on it. The extremely sly character, who has his reasons for bearing a grudge against the minister, doesn't pass up the opportunity of taking the letter and substituting another for it, which will be the downfall of his enemy.

[2] 'puisque la barbe est là' – an untranslatable pun on the preceding phrase which also employs the word 'barbe' ('s'emparer au nez et à la barbe').

But that isn't the point. What is it that makes this rather improbable tale so convincing? After all, it is surprising that the police didn't find the letter in the course of their ransack. To explain that, Poe places intersubjectivity in the forefront – the clever guy goes to the limit of what is unthinkable for the other, and as such will escape. But if you read the tale for its fundamental value, you will realise that there's another key, which makes the whole thing hang together, and which brings with it conviction, whereas, if presented somewhat differently, the story wouldn't interest us for one moment.

It seems to me, that you analysts, you should recognise this key immediately – it is simply the identity of the symbolic formula of the situation, in the two principal steps in its development. The Queen thought the letter was safe because there it was, bang in front of everybody. And the minister also leaves it out in the open, thinking that therefore it can't be taken. It isn't because he is a strategician, but because he is a poet, that he wins, until the intervention of the super-poet, Dupin.

Nothing in the way of intersubjectivity is decisive here, because once the measures of the real are made tight, once a perimeter, a volume, is defined once and for all, there is nothing to lead one to suspect that when all is said and done even a letter might escape. If nonetheless the fact that they can't find it is convincing, it is because the domain of significations continues to exist, even in the mind of people assumed to be as stupid as policemen. If the police do not find it, it isn't only because it is in too accessible a place, but as a consequence of this signification, namely that a letter of great value, upon which the might of the State now bears, with the rewards which may accrue in such a case, has to be hidden with exceeding care. Quite naturally, the slave assumes that the master is a master, and that when he has something precious within his reach, he grabs it. In the same way, one thinks that when one has reached a certain point of comprehension in psychoanalysis, one can grab it and say – Here it is, we've got it. On the contrary, signification as such is never where one thinks it must be.

The merit of the apologue is of this order. It is on the basis of the analysis of the symbolic value of the different moments in the drama that its coherence, and even its psychological motivation, can be discovered.

It isn't a game for the subtlest, it isn't a psychological game, it is a dialectical game.

The next session: THE SEMINAR PLAYS

Today, the holidays are getting nearer, it's a lovely day, so let's do something short and sweet.

Last time we discussed dual intersubjectivity and its mirages. It isn't all mirage, but if we look at our neighbour and think that he's thinking what we're thinking, it's a gross error. That has to be our starting point.

I've shown you the limits of what can be founded on the basis of this dual intersubjectivity, by turning to this famous game of even and odd which, so as not to invent it, I took from Poe – and there is no reason for not thinking that he inherited it from the mouth of the child who used to win at this game.

Playing isn't that difficult. The most natural movement is simply to change from even to odd. The intelligent guy will do the opposite. But on the third occasion [temps], the most intelligent course is to act like an idiot, or the alleged idiot. That is to say, everything loses its signification. I have thus shown you that in order to play this game in a reasonable fashion, you must try to undo any grip your adversary may have.

The next step – and this is the Freudian hypothesis – consists in positing that there is nothing random in whatever we undertake with the intention of doing so at random.

I have drawn up on the board what nowadays passes for a machine. When a subject comes up with something at random, it will isolate the formula by which this comes about, a formula which can always be isolated, and in some way it reflects the compulsion to repeat, in as much as it is beyond the pleasure principle, beyond relations, rational motivations, beyond feelings, beyond anything to which we can accede. In the beginnings of psychoanalysis, this beyond is the unconscious, in so far as we cannot reach it, it's the transference in so far as that is really what modulates feelings of love and of hatred, which aren't the transference – the transference is what makes it possible for us to interpret this language composed out of everything the subject can present us with, a language which, outside of psychoanalysis is, in principle, incomplete and misunderstood. That is what the beyond of the pleasure principle is. It is the beyond of signification. The two are indistinguishable.

O. MANNONI: Your attempt at eliminating intersubjectivity nonetheless seems to me to leave it untouched.

I will have you notice that I do not eliminate it. I take a case in which it may be subtracted. Of course, it can't be eliminated.

O. MANNONI: Perhaps it isn't subtracted, because in the law of repetition which we obey without knowing it, two things must be considered. One is that it may not be detectable in the thing that's repeated. One could make an indefinite arithmetical study of the numbers and not find the law of repetition, if, for example, we take the rhythms into account. If we repeat words, it may be because a certain number rhyme with the unconscious thought. At that moment, no mathematician could find the reason behind the succession of numbers – that will lie outside the domain of the machine.

I like what you're saying.

O. MANNONI: And on the other hand, if the law is discovered, by this very fact, an equality is produced in the following manner – by one of the players discovering it, while the other doesn't. For a law that's discovered is no longer a law.

But of course, my dear friend, the last time, to simplify, I made the subject play with a machine.

O. MANNONI: That introduces the struggle between the two subjects.

But of course. But let us begin with the element. The simple possibility of making the subject play with a machine is already sufficiently instructive. That isn't to say that the machine can find the reason for my visions. I said that my personal formula might be as long as a recital of the Aeneid, but there's nothing to say that such a recital would give us all the significations. If we are already to find rhymes, we could be certain that we're in the presence of symbolic efficacity. I employ this term of Claude Lévi-Strauss's[1] here in relation to a machine. Are we to believe that symbolic efficacity is due to man? Our entire discourse here puts it into question. This question would in any case only be decided one way or another if we had an idea of how language is born – something which we must renounce any knowledge of for a long time.

In the face of this symbolic efficacity, what we need to do today is to highlight a certain symbolic inertia, characteristic of the subject, of the unconscious subject.

To this end I am going to propose to you that we play the game of even and odd in an ordered fashion, and we are going to record the results. I'll work them up during the holidays, and we will see whether we can draw any conclusions from them.

That will depend on the following – is there a difference between a list of deliberately selected numbers and a sequence of numbers chosen at random? It is up to the mathematician, to M. Riguet who's present here, to explain to us what a sequence of numbers chosen at random is. You can't imagine how difficult it is. It has taken generations of mathematicians parrying right and left, to succeed truly in saying what numbers chosen at random are.

Riguet, you will be the note-taker in this first game. David, you are going to play even and odd with Mannoni.

[1] See C. Lévi-Strauss, 'Symbolic efficacity' in Structural Anthropology (1958), trans. C. Jacobson and B. Grundfest Schoepf, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1968.

O. MANNONI: I, for one, cheat at this particular game.

I couldn't care less.

(Play between M. David and M. Mannoni.)

O. MANNONI: It's very simple, every time I said it at random, I won. When I no longer had a rule, I often lost. The rule varied. At one point, I took the order from verses of Mallarmé, then a telephone number, a car registration number, then what's written on the blackboard, using vowels and consonants.

How many goes did you have with the first rule?

O. MANNONI: That is when I really won.

That was only to keep your interest up. Now we want to have something from each of you, something written in whatever style you like – you can do it as fast as you can, and I think that the faster it is, the better it will be – while thinking that you are playing even and odd with the machine. But I ask you not to go about it the way Mannoni did. Do it at random. Show us your symbolic inertia.

(The participants play, and hand their sheets in to J. Lacan.)

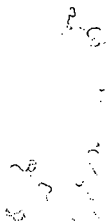
The Purloined Letter



The captivating paper you heard yesterday presented you with what we would call the play of the image and the symbol.[1] That not everything in this relation can be expressed in genetic terms is in fact what emerges from Mme Dolto's work, and that is precisely why she is at one with our teaching.

There are thousands of ways of becoming interested as therapists in the aetiology of schizophrenia. To be sure, there is doubtless a medical dimension here, that of diagnosis, of prognosis, but by adapting her vantage point, she throws vivid and profound light on the characteristic phenomenon of this stage of individual development, and no praise is too high for the genius and honesty of her experience. We can't make our categories work everywhere, but nonetheless they enable us to operate a wholesale reshaping of nosography, such as Perrier has started on.

O. MANNONI: What bothers me is that you assimilate drawing, the graphic, to the imaginary. Now, it seems to me that a drawing is already an obscure elaboration of the imaginary.

I talked about the imaginary, I didn't say that it was a drawing, which is already a symbol.

O. MANNONI: But not quite, which is what intrigues me.

Of course, it will intrigue you so long as we haven't taken a drawing as the object, nor begun to raise the question as to what it is together. But it isn't our object this year.

My comments last time were aimed at giving you a clear sense of the relation of the subject to the symbolic function. We will take further steps in that direction today.

[1] On 26 April 1955, Françoise Dolto gave a paper to a Scientific Session of the Société Française de Psychanalyse, entitled 'A clinical case of the recovery of language'.

The symbol's emergence into the real begins with a wager. The very notion of cause, when viewed as being capable of bringing with it a mediation between the chain of symbols and the real, is established on the basis of an original wager – will it be this or not? It's not for nothing that the notion of probability takes up a place at the very heart of the development of the physical sciences, as the most recent discussions in epistemology show us; nor is it for nothing that probability theory is reviving a set of problems which, throughout the history of thought, for centuries, have alternately been highlighted and occulted.

The wager lies at the heart of any radical question bearing on symbolic thought. Everything comes back to to be or not to be,[2] to the choice between what will or won't come out, to the primordial couple of plus or minus. But presence as absence connotes possible absence or presence. As soon as the subject himself comes to be, he owes it to a certain non-being on which he raises his being. And if he isn't, if he isn't something, he obviously bears witness to some kind of absence, but he will always remain purveyor of this absence, I mean that he will bear the burden of its proof for lack of being capable of proving the presence.

That's what's important about this chain of pluses and minuses, aligned here on a bit of paper, drawn from diverse experimental set-ups. The examination of the results we've gathered has concrete value, in showing certain deviations in the curve of gains and losses.

As we saw last time, playing amounts to pursuing in a subject an alleged regularity which escapes observation, but which must be translated into the results by something of a deviation in the probability curve. That is in fact what the facts tend to show, indicating that just by the simple fact of dialogue, even the most blind, no pure game of chance exists, instead there is already the articulation of one word with another. This word is included in the fact that even when the subject plays by himself, his play only has any meaning if he says in advance what he thinks will come out. You can play heads or tails by yourself. But from the point of view of speech, you aren't playing by yourself – there is already the articulation of three signs, comprising a win or a loss, and this articulation prefigures the very meaning of the result. In other words, if there is no question, there is no game, if there is no structure there is no question. The question is constituted, organised, by the structure.

By itself, the play of the symbol represents and organises, independently of the peculiarities of its human support, this something which is called a subject. The human subject doesn't foment this game, he takes his place in it, and plays the role of the little pluses and minuses in it. He is himself an element in this chain which, as soon as it is unwound, organises itself in accordance with laws. Hence the subject is always on several levels, caught up in crisscrossing networks.

Anything from the real can always come out. But once the symbolic chain is constituted, as soon as you introduce a certain significant unity, in the form of unities of succession, what comes out can no longer be just anything.

Let us agree to group the pluses and the minuses which may come up into threes, and to call the sequences 1, 2, or 3, according to which type they belong.

(1)	(2)	(3)
+ + +	+ + −	+ − +
− − −	− − +	− + −
	+ − −

This transformation alone gives rise to extremely precise laws. The 1s, the 2s, and the 3s cannot succeed each other in just any order. A 1 will never be able to follow a 3, a 1 will never come after any odd-numbered sequence of 2s. But after an even number of 2s, a 1 is possible. An indefinite number of 2s is always possible between a 1 and a 3.

Starting with this, you can constitute other significant unities, representing the intervals between two of these groups.

Passing from 1 to 2 → β
Passing from 2 to 2 → γ
Passing from 1 to 1, Passing from 1 to 3 → α

Shift back from 2 to 1, Shift back from 2 to 3 → δ

You can verify that after the repetition of a great number of αs, if there'd been a β before, only a δ could follow. So this is a primitive symbolic organisation which already enables one to go beyond the metaphors I used the other day in speaking of memory internal to the symbol. In some way, the series of αs remembers that it cannot express anything but a δ, if a β, however far away it might have been, occurred before the series of αs.

You see the possibilities of demonstration and theorematisation which can be derived from the simple use of these symbolic series. From the start, and independently of any attachment to some supposedly causal bond, the symbol already plays, and produces by itself, its necessities, its structures, its organisations. That is indeed what occurs in our discipline, in so far as it consists in getting to the bottom of the significance of the symbolic order for the world of the human subject.

Within this perspective, what is immediately clear is what I have called the inmixing of subjects. I will illustrate it for you, since chance has offered it to us, with the story of The Purloined Letter, from which we took the example of the game of even and odd.

This example is introduced by the spokesman of the tale's meaning, and it is supposed to give an elementary image of the intersubjective relation, founded upon the following – as a function of the other's supposed capacities for trickery, for dissimulation, for strategy, capacities to be found in a dual reflective relation, the subject assumes the thought of this other. This depends upon the idea that there is a way of distinguishing the understanding of the idiot from that of the intelligent man.

I have stressed how fragile this point of view is, even how completely alien it is to what is at issue, for the simple reason that the intelligent thing to do, in this case, is to play the idiot. However, Poe is a prodigiously alert man, and all you have to do is read the whole of the text to see the extent to which the symbolic structure of the story far surpasses the scope of this reasoning, so attractive for a moment, but excessively weak, and whose sole function here is as a booby trap.

I would like those who have read The Purloined Letter since I mentioned it to raise their hands – not even half the room!

Even so, I think you know that it's a story about a letter stolen in sensational and exemplary circumstances, which is narrated by a hapless prefect of police, who plays the role, classic in this kind of mythology, of someone who has to find what is being sought after, but who cannot but end up losing the thread. In short, this prefect asks a certain Dupin to get him out of this tangle. Dupin, for his part, represents the character, more mythical still, who understands everything. But the story goes well beyond the register of comedy tied to the fundamental images which make up the genre of police detection.

The august figure whose outline is to be discerned in the background of the story seems to be none other than a royal personage. The scene is set in France, under the restored monarchy. So the authority is certainly not invested with the sacred aspect which can keep at a distance the hands of the bold as they make an attempt on it.

A minister, himself a man of high rank, of great social facility, who is in the confidence of the royal couple, since he is to be found discussing affairs of State in the private quarters of the King and the Queen, notices the discomforture of the latter, who is trying to dissimulate from her august partner the presence on the table of nothing less than a letter, whose superscription and meaning the minister immediately remarks. A secret correspondence is at stake. If the letter is there, thrown indifferently on the table, it is precisely so that the King won't notice it. The Queen is banking on his inattention, maybe even his blindness.

The minister, for his part, keeping his eyes skinned, realises what is going on, and plays a little game, which consists in first diverting the company, then in taking from his pocket a letter which happens to be on him, and which vaguely resembles the object – from now on we can call it the object of litigation. After having waved it around, he casually places it on the table next to the first letter. Then, profiting from the inattention of the main character, all he has to do is gently take the letter, and put it in his pocket without the Queen, who hasn't missed a single detail of this entire scene, being able to do anything but resign herself to watching the disappearance under her very eyes of this compromising document.

I'll skip the rest. At all costs, the Queen wants to recover this instrument of pressure, if not of blackmail. She calls in the police. The police, whose destiny it is to find nothing, find nothing. And it is Dupin who solves the problem, and discovers the letter, in the minister's apartment, in the most obvious place, within reach, scarcely disguised at all. To be sure, it would seem that it shouldn't have escaped the notice of the police, since it was included within the orbit of their microscopic examination.

In order to lay his hands on it, Dupin gets someone to fire a shot outside. While the minister goes to the window to see what is happening, Dupin goes to the letter, and quickly substitutes another for it, containing the following verses:

. . . un dessein si funeste,
S'il n'est digne d'Atrée, est digne de Thyeste.[3]

These lines are taken from Crébillon the elder's Atrée et Thyeste, and have a far greater significance than just being an excuse for our re-reading the whole of this rather curious tragedy.

This episode is quite odd, if one includes in it the note of cruelty with which the character who seems the most detached, impartial, the Dupin of the tale, rubs his hands and gloats over the thought of the drama which he is bound to have triggered. At this point, it isn't only Dupin speaking, but the storyteller, the mirage of the author. We will see what this mirage signifies.

The drama will come to a climax as follows – the minister, when challenged to show his strength, because from then on he'll be resisted, one day will pull out the letter. Show me – he'll be told – Here it is – he will answer. And he'll be covered in ridicule, if not caught up in tragedy.

So that is how the tale unfolds.

There are two great scenes – not in the sense in which we say primal scene – the scene of the letter purloined and the scene of the letter recovered, and then some accessory scenes. The scene in which the letter is recovered is duplicated, [3] '. . . so infamous a scheme/ If not worthy of Atreus, is worthy of Thyestes'. – Act V, Scene V.

since, having discovered where it is, Dupin doesn't take it straightaway – he has to set the trap, prepare his little cabal, and also the substitute-letter. There is also the imaginary scene at the end, in which we see the enigmatic character of the story meeting his end, this ambitious character, so singularly etched out, of whom one wonders what his ambition actually is. Is he simply a gambler? He gambles with a challenge, his aim – and that is what would make him an ambitious man – seems to be to show how far he can go. Where he goes is of no importance to him. The aim of his ambition is dissipated by the essential fact of its exercise.

Who are the characters? We could count them on our fingers. There are the real characters – the King, the Queen, the minister, Dupin, the prefect of police and the agent provocateur who shoots in the street. There are also those who do not appear on stage and make back-stage noises. These are the dramatis personae, in general one has a list of them at the beginning of a play.

Isn't there another way of doing it?

The characters in question can be defined differently. They can be defined beginning with the subject, more precisely beginning with the relation determined by the aspiration of the real subject through the necessity of the symbolic linking process.

Let us begin with the first scene. There are four characters – the King, the Queen, the minister, and the fourth, who is it?

M. GUÉNINCHAULT: The letter.

Yes, of course, the letter and not the person who sends it. Although his name is given towards the end of the novel, he has only a fictional importance, whereas the letter is indeed a character. It is so much a character that we are completely entitled to identify it with the key-schema we came upon, at the end of the dream of Irma's injection, in the formula for trimethylamine.

The letter is here synonymous with the original, radical, subject. What we find here is the symbol being displaced in its pure state, which one cannot come into contact with without being immediately caught in its play. Thus, the tale of The Purloined Letter signifies that there's nothing in destiny, or causality, which can be defined as a function of existence. One can say that, when the characters get a hold of this letter, something gets a hold of them and carries them along and this something clearly has dominion over their individual idiosyncracies. Whoever they might be, at this stage of the symbolic transformation of the letter, they will be defined solely by their position in relation to this radical subject, by their position in one of the CH_3s. This position isn't fixed. In so far as they have entered into the necessity, into the movement peculiar to the letter, they each become, in the course of successive scenes, functionally different in relation to the essential reality which it constitutes. In other words, to take this story up again in its exemplary form, for each of them the letter is his unconscious. It is his unconscious with all of its consequences, that is to say that at each point in the symbolic circuit, each of them becomes someone else.

That is what I am going to try to show you.

Every human drama, every theatrical drama in particular, is founded on the existence of established bonds, ties, pacts. Human beings already have commitments which tie them together, commitments which have determined their places, names, their essences. Then along comes another discourse, other commitments, other speech. It is quite certain that there'll be some places where they'll have to come to blows. All treaties aren't signed simultaneously. Some are contradictory. If you go to war, it is so as to know which treaty will be binding. Thank God, there are many occasions on which one doesn't go to war, and treaties continue to hold good, the slipper continues to circulate amongst people, in several directions all at once, and sometimes the object of a game of hunt-the-slipper encounters that of another game of hunt-the-slipper. Subdivision, reconversion, substitution take place. Whoever is engaged in playing hunt-the-slipper in one circle has to hide the fact that he is also playing in another.

It's not for nothing that we see royalty appearing here. They become symbolic of the fundamental character of the commitment entered into in the beginning. Respect for the pact which unites a man and a woman has a value essential to the whole of society, and this value has always been embodied to the greatest extent in the persons of the royal couple, who are playing. This couple is the symbol of the major pact, which reconciles the male element and the female element, and it traditionally plays a mediating role between everything we don't know, the cosmos, and the social order. Quite rightly, there's nothing more scandalous and reprehensible than something which threatens it.

To be sure, in the present state of interhuman relations, tradition has been pushed into the background, or at least it is veiled. You remember the saying of King Farouk, according to which there are now only five kings left in the world, the four kings in a deck of cards and the King of England.

What, after all, is a letter? How can a letter be purloined [volée]?[4] To whom does it belong? To whoever sent it or to whoever it is addressed? If you say that it belongs to whoever sent it, what makes a letter a gift? Why does one send a letter? And if you think that it belongs to the recipient, how is it that, under certain circumstances, you return your letters to the person who, for a period in your life, bombarded you with them?

When one considers one of those proverbs attributed to the wisdom of nations – the wisdom of which is thus denominated by antiphrase – one is sure to light upon a stupidity. Verba volant, scripta manent. Has it occurred to you that a letter is precisely speech which flies [vole]? If a stolen [volée] letter is possible, it is because a letter is a fly-sheet [feuille volante]. It is scripta which volant, whereas speech, alas, remains. It remains even when no one remembers it any more. Just as, after five hundred thousand signs in the series of pluses and minuses, the appearance of α, β, γ, δ will still be determined by the same laws.

Speech remains.[5] You can't help the play of symbols, and that is why you must be very careful what you say. But the letter, for its part, that goes away. It wanders all by itself. I have often insisted, so that M. Guiraud might understand, that there could be two kilos of language on the table. There is no need for there to be that much – a very small sheet of vellum is just as much a language [langage] being here. It is here, and it exists only as language, it is the fly-sheet. But it is also something else, which has a particular function, absolutely incapable of being assimilated to any other human object.

So the characters play their parts. There is a character who trembles, the Queen. Her function consists in not trembling beyond a certain limit. Were she to tremble just a touch more, if the reflection of the lake which she represents – because she is the only one who is truly fully aware of the scene – were further troubled, she would no longer be the Queen, she would be completely ridiculous, and we wouldn't be able to bear Dupin's final cruelty. But she stays mum. There's a character who doesn't see anything, the King. There is the minister. There is the letter.

This letter, this speech addressed to the Queen by someone, the duc de S., to whom is it truly addressed? As soon as it is speech, it may have several functions. It has the function of a certain pact, of a certain trust. It doesn't matter whether it is about the duke's love or about a plot against the security of the State, or even about a banality. There it is, disguised in a kind of presence-absence. There it is, but it isn't there, it only has its own value in relation to everything it threatens, to everything it violates, to everything it flouts, to everything it places in danger or in suspense.

This letter, which doesn't have the same meaning everywhere, is a truth which is not to be divulged. As soon as it gets into the pocket of the minister, it is no longer what it was before, whatever it was that it had been. It is no longer a love letter, a letter of trust, the announcement of an event, it is evidence, on this occasion a court exhibit. If we imagine that this poor King, seized by some great enthusiasm which would make of him a king of greater grace, one of those

[5] It should be borne in mind that Lacan is referring to specific occasions of speaking, as well as to the function of speech in general, which the translation of both 'les paroles' and 'une parole' by 'speech' might lead one to overlook.

kings who isn't easy-going, who isn't capable of letting something go past, and is capable of sending his worthy spouse in front of the judges, as was seen at certain moments in English history – it's always England – we realise that the identity of the recipient of a letter is as problematic as the question of knowing to whom it belongs. In any case, from the moment it falls into the hands of the minister, it has in itself become something else.

The minister then does something very peculiar. You'll say that it is in the nature of things. But why should we, us analysts, be satisfied with the crude appearances of motivations?

I wanted to take a letter of the period out of my pocket to show you how they were folded, and naturally I've forgotten it at home. At that time, letters were very pretty. They were folded more or less like this – and one put a seal or a sealing wafer on it.

The minister wants the letter to go unnoticed, by means of his cunning trick, so he folds it the other way, and crumples it. By refolding it, it is quite possible to make a small surface, blank and flat, appear, on which one can place another superscription and another seal, black instead of red. In place of the slanted writing of the noble lord, there's the feminine writing which addresses the letter to the minister himself. And it is in this guise that the letter lies in the card-rack where the lynx eye of Dupin will not miss it, because he has, as have we, meditated on what a letter is.

This transformation is not sufficiently well explained, for us analysts, by the fact that the minister wants it not to be recognised. He didn't transform it in any old way. This letter, whose nature we do not know, he has in some way addressed it to himself with its new and false appearance, it is even specified by whom – by a woman of his own standing, who has a diminutive feminine hand – and he has it sent to him with his own seal.

Now this is a curious relation to oneself. The letter undergoes a sudden feminisation, and at the same time it enters into a narcissistic relation – since it is now addressed in this sophisticated feminine hand, and bears his own seal. It's a sort of love-letter he's sent himself. This is very obscure, indefinable, I don't want to force anything, and in truth if I mention this transformation, it is because it is correlative of something else far more important, concerning the subjective behaviour of the minister himself.

Let us pause over this drama, let us see what knits it together.

What makes the fact that the letter is in the possession of the minister so painful that everything stems from the Queen's absolutely imperative need to recover it?

As the narrator, who is also a witness, one of the intelligent interlocutors, observes, this affair gains its significance solely if the Queen knows that the document is in the hands of the minister. She knows, while the King knows nothing.

Let us suppose that the minister then behaves with intolerable cheek. He knows he is powerful, he behaves as such. And the Queen – we are obliged to think that she has a voice in these affairs – intervenes on his behalf. The desires one attributes to the powerful minister are satisfied, so and so is nominated to such and such a position, he acquires some specified person as a colleague, he is permitted to form majorities in the monarchical Parliament, which is quite clearly all too constitutional. But there's nothing to indicate that the minister has ever said anything, ever asked anything of the Queen. On the contrary, he has the letter and he remains silent.

He remains silent, while he is the holder of a letter which threatens the foundation of the pact. He holds the threat of a profound, unrecognised, repressed disorder, and he remains silent. His attitude might be one which we would qualify as being highly moral. He might have made representations to the Queen. He would then, of course, be hypocritical, but he could pose as the defender of the honour of his master, as the vigilant guardian of order. And perhaps the intrigue established with the duc de S. is dangerous to the policies which he takes to be the good ones. But he does nothing of the sort.

He is presented to us as an essentially romantic character, and he is somewhat reminiscent of M. de Chateaubriand, whom we would not recall as being a very noble character, had he not been Christian. Indeed, if we read the true meaning of his Mémoires, doesn't he declare himself tied to the monarchy by his solemn pledge, only to tell us, in the most clearcut fashion, that, having said that, he thinks they are filth? In such a way that he can seem to cut the figure of this monstrum horrendum we are told about in order to justify Dupin's final outburst. As the reading of Chateaubriand demonstrates, there is a way of defending principles which turns out to be the best way of destroying them.

Why are we told that the minister is such a monster, a man devoid of principles? When you look more closely, it means that he gives no sense of something of the order of compensation or of some sort of sanction to what he has in his power. He makes nothing of the knowledge he has as to the truth about the pact. He doesn't reproach the Queen, he doesn't urge her to return to the order of things, by placing himself in the position of a confessor or director of conscience, no more than he will say tit for tat to her. He suspends the power conferred on him by the letter in indeterminacy, he gives it no symbolic meaning, all he plays on is the fact that this mirage, this reciprocal fascination is established between himself and the Queen, which is what I told you about earlier on, in speaking of the narcissistic relation. The dual relation between master and slave, founded in the last resort on the indeterminate threat of death, but on this occasion on the fears of the Queen.

These fears of the Queen, if you look at them closely, are quite out of proportion. For, as is noted in the tale, this letter may well be a terrible weapon, but all that is needed for it to be destroyed is for it to be put to use. It is a double-edged sword. We don't know what would ensue from the disclosure of the letter to the retributive justice, not only of a King, but of an entire council, of the entire organisation involved in such a scandal.

In the end, the intolerable nature of the pressure constituted by the letter is due to the fact that the minister has the same attitude as the Queen in relation to the letter – he doesn't speak of it. And he doesn't speak of it because he can no more speak of it than she can. And simply from the fact that he cannot speak of it, he finds himself in the course of the second scene in the same position as the Queen, and he won't be able to do anything other than let himself be dispossessed of it. This is not due to the ingenuity of Dupin, but to the structure of things.

The purloined letter has become a hidden letter. Why don't the policemen find it? They don't find it because they do not know what a letter is. They don't know that because they are the police. Every legitimate power always rests, as does any kind of power, on the symbol. And the police, like all powers, also rest on the symbol. In troubled times, as you have found out, you would let yourselves be arrested like sheep if some guy had said Police to you and shown you a card, otherwise you would have started beating him up as soon as he laid a hand on you. Except there's a small difference between the police and power, namely that the police have been persuaded that their efficacity rests on force – not so as to put trust in them, but on the contrary to curb their functions. And thanks to the fact that the police think that they are able to exercise their functions through force, they are as powerless as one could wish.

When one teaches them something different, as has been done for some time in some parts of the world, we know what it leads to. One obtains universal adherence to what we will simply call doctrine. One can put anyone in more or less any position in relation to the system of symbols, and one thus extracts all the confessions in the world, you can make anyone endorse any element of the symbolic chain, at the whim of the symbol's naked power when a certain personal meditation is missing.

Believing in force, and by the same token in the real, the police search for the letter. As they say – We looked everywhere. And they didn't find, because what was at stake was a letter and a letter is precisely nowhere.

That isn't a witticism. Think about it – why don't they find it? It is there. They have seen it. What did they see? A letter. They may even have opened it. But they didn't recognise it. Why? They had a description of it – It has a red seal and a certain address. Now, it has another seal and it doesn't have that address. You will tell me – What about the text? Well, that's it, they weren't given the text. For, one or the other must be true, either the text has some importance or it doesn't. If it has some importance, and even if no one besides the King could understand it, there is nonetheless some point in not yelling it from the roof tops.

You do see, then, that only in the dimension of truth can something be hidden. In the real, the very idea of a hidden place is insane – however deep into the bowels of the earth someone may go bearing something, it isn't hidden there, since if he went there, so can you. Only what belongs to the order of truth can be hidden. It is truth which is hidden, not the letter. For the policemen, the truth doesn't matter, for them there is only reality, and that is why they do not find anything.

In contrast, besides his remarks about the game of even and odd, Dupin makes linguistic, mathematical, religious observations, he constantly speculates about the symbol, even going so far as to speak of the non-sense of mathematics – for which I apologise to the mathematicians present here. Why don't you try, he says, to say one day to a mathematician that $x^2 + px$ maybe isn't exactly equal to q – and he'll immediately flatten you. But that's not true, since I often share my suspicions on this subject with Riguet, and nothing like that ever happened to me. On the contrary, our friend encourages me to pursue these speculations. In the end, it is because Dupin has thought a little about the symbol and about truth that he will see what there is to be seen.

In the scene which is described to us, Dupin finds himself treated to an odd display. The minister reveals a splendid indolence – which doesn't fool the astute man, who knows that beneath it there's an extreme vigilance, the terrible daring of the romantic character capable of anything, for whom the term sang-froid seems to have been invented, take a look at Stendhal. So there he is, lounging, bored, dreaming – In a decadent epoch nothing is sufficient to occupy the mind of a great thinker. What is to be done when everything is going to the dogs? That's the theme. While this is going on, Dupin, with green glasses on, looks everywhere and tries to make us believe that it is his genius which enables him to see the letter. But that's not true.

In the same way as the Queen had in fact indicated the letter to the minister, so it is the minister who surrenders his secret to Dupin. Isn't there some echo between the letter with a feminine superscription and this languishing Paris? Dupin literally reads what has become of the letter in the enervated attitude of this character of whom nobody knows what he wants, besides pushing as far as possible the gratuitous exercise of his activity as gambler. He defies the world just as he defied the royal couple with the abduction of the letter. What does this mean? – save that in order to be in the same position vis-à-vis the letter as the Queen was, in an essentially feminine position, the minister falls prey to the same trick as she did.

You will tell me that there aren't three characters plus the letter, as before. The letter is indeed there, there are two characters, but where is the King? Well, it is obviously the police. If the minister feels so at ease, that's because the police forms part of his security, as the King formed part of the Queen's security. An ambiguous protection – it is the protection which he owes her in the sense in which a husband owes aid and protection to his wife, it is also the protection which she owes to his blindness. But all it took was a little, a small change of equilibrium, for the letter to be lifted through the chink. And that's what happens to the minister.

It is a mistake on his part to think that, since the police who've been searching his town-house for months haven't found it, he has no cause for worry. This doesn't prove anything, no more than the presence of the King incapable of seeing the letter was an efficacious protection for the Queen. What's his mistake? It is having forgotten that if the police haven't found the letter, it isn't that the letter can't be found, but rather that the police were looking for something else. The ostrich feels secure because its head is buried in the sand – he's the perfected ostrich, who would think itself safe because another ostrich [autre autruche] – other-ich [autrui-che] – has its head buried in the sand.[6] And it leaves its behind to be plucked by a third, who takes possession of its feathers and makes a panache of them.

The minister is in what had been the Queen's position, the police are in that of the King, of this degenerate King who believes only in the real, and who sees nothing. The step-wise displacement of the characters is perfect. And simply because he interposed himself in the rest of the discourse, and came into possession of this little nothing of a letter, sufficient to wreak havoc, this most cunning of foxes, this most ambitious of climbers, this intriguer's intriguer, this dilettante's dilettante, doesn't see that his secret will be pinched from under his nose.

It doesn't take much, just something sufficiently reminiscent of the police, to draw his attention away. In fact, if the incident in the street attracts his attention, it is because he knows himself to be under surveillance from the police – How come something is going on in front of my house when there are three cops standing at each corner? Not only has he become feminised through his possession of the letter, but the letter, whose relation to the unconscious I have told you of, even makes him forget the essential. You know the story of the man found on a desert island where he's sought refuge so as to forget–To forget what? –I've forgotten. Well then, he has also forgotten that, just the fact of being under surveillance from the police doesn't at all mean that nobody will be able to get the better of you.

The next step is rather odd. How does Dupin behave? Not that there is a long interval between the prefect of police's two visits. As soon as he has the letter, Dupin doesn't breathe a word of it to anyone either. In short, having this letter – this really is the signification of the wandering truth – shuts your trap. And indeed to whom would he have been able to talk about it? He must have been quite encumbered by it.

[6] The puns here are on 'autre' (other) and 'autruche' (ostrich) and 'autrui' (others).

Thank God the prefect of police always returns to the scene of the crime, so the prefect comes round and asks him some questions. The other tells him some absolutely priceless story about free consultations. Someone is trying to sponge information about a prescription from an English doctor – What would you have directed him to take? – Why, take advice. That's how Dupin tells the prefect of police that a fee wouldn't be that unwelcome. The good man immediately pays up, and the other says to him – It's in the drawer there.

Does this mean that this Dupin, who up until then was an admirable, almost excessively lucid character, has all of a sudden become a small time wheeler and dealer? I don't hesitate to see in this action the re-purchasing of what one could call the bad mana attached to the letter. And indeed, from the moment he receives his fee, he has pulled out of the game. It isn't only because he has handed the letter over to another, but because his motives are clear to everyone – he got his money, it's no longer of any concern to him. The sacred value of remuneration of the fee kind is clearly indicated by the context of the medical story.

I don't mean to insist on it, but you might gently point out to me that we, who spend our time being the bearers of all the purloined letters of the patient, also get paid somewhat dearly. Think about this with some care – were we not to be paid, we would get involved in the drama of Atreus and Thyestes, the drama in which all the subjects who come to confide their truth in us are involved. They tell us their damned [sacré] stories, and because of that we are not at all within the domain of the sacred and of sacrifice. Everyone knows that money doesn't just buy things, but that the prices which, in our culture, are calculated at rock-bottom, have the function of neutralising something infinitely more dangerous than paying in money, namely owing somebody something.

That is what it is all about. Anyone who has this letter enters into the zone of shadow caused by the fact that it is addressed to whom? if not to whom it may concern – the King. And it will reach him in the end, but not quite the way Dupin tells it in his little imaginary story, in which the minister, following some snub from the Queen, is stupid enough to let the story out. It really does reach the King, a King who still doesn't know anything. But the character of the King has changed in the meanwhile. Having shifted one notch along, and become the Queen, it is now the minister who is the King. In the third stage, he has taken the place of the King, and he has the letter.

It is obviously no longer the letter which passed from Dupin to the prefect of police – and from there into the dark cabinet, for you can't tell us that the odyssey of the letter has come to an end – it is a new form of the letter, which Dupin gave him, far more the instrument of fate than Poe leads us to understand, a provocative form which endows the short story with its cutting and cruel edge, ripe for consumption by midinettes. When the minister opens the paper, it is these lines which will forcibly strike him.

. . . un dessein si funeste,
S'il n'est digne d'Atrée, est digne de Thyeste.

And, in this way, if he ever has to open this letter, he would be obliged to submit to the consequences of his own actions, like Thyestes to eat his own children. And that, after all, is what we have to deal with every day, each time the line of symbols reaches its terminal point – these are our actions come to search us out. All of a sudden we find ourselves having to pay in full. It is a matter, as they say, of accounting for your crimes – which moreover means, that if you know how to account for them, you won't be punished. If he really is mad enough to get out the letter, and especially not to check a bit in advance that it is indeed this letter which is there, all the minister will be capable of doing is to follow the order of the day which I ironically threw out in Zurich, in answer to Leclaire – Eat your Dasein! That is Thyestes's dish par excellence.

The minister would really have had to push the paradox of the gambler to its limit of madness for him to take out the letter. He really would have to be a man without any principles whatsoever, without even this, the last principle, the one which for the most part remains to us, which is simply the shadow of stupidity. If he falls prey to passion, he will find the Queen generous, worthy of respect and love – it's completely ridiculous, but it will save him. If he falls prey to pure and simple hatred, he will try to strike his blow in an efficient manner. It is really only if his Dasein has become completely detached from any inscription in any kind of order, including that of intimacy, that of his desk, his table, it is really only if that is the case that he will have to drink the bitter cup to the dregs.

We could write all of this with small alphas, betas, gammas. Everything which could serve to define the characters as real – qualities, temperament, heredity, nobility – has nothing to do with the story. At every moment each of them, even their sexual attitude, is defined by the fact that a letter always reaches its destination.

Some questions for the teacher

THE COMMON DISCOURSE
THE FULFILMENT OF DESIRE[1]
THE DESIRE TO SLEEP
THE WORD AND THE GUTS
THE QUESTION OF REALISM

Today, we are coming close to the top of this sometimes overly steep hill we have been climbing this year. We are approaching a summit. But there's nothing to tell us that we'll have a truly panoramic view from the top over what we've covered.

As I told you last time, I am going to try to knit together the function of speech with that of death – I wouldn't say of death as such, because that doesn't mean anything, but of death in so far as that is what life resists.

The beyond of the pleasure principle is expressed in the word Wiederholungszwang. This is incorrectly translated in French by automatisme de répétition and I think I am giving you a better rendition with the notion of insistence [insistance], repetitive insistence, significant insistence. This function is at the very root of language in so far as a world is a universe subjected to language.

Well then, what is the relation of this function to the notion upon which Freud was led to meditate, also insistently, namely the function of death? For there is a conjunction in the human world between the speech which dominates the destiny of man and death whose position in Freud's thought we are at a loss to locate – does it belong on the level of the real, of the imaginary, or of the symbolic?

But before we tie these two terms together in such a way as to make you once again grasp, and I hope even more firmly, the significance of the Freudian discovery and that of our experience in so far as it enables us to assist the subject in the revelation of himself to himself, I will pause for a moment.

I've had a thought which, however severe it may be, has nothing disillusioned about it. It occurred to me that teaching is something rather problematic, and that from the moment one is led to fill the position which I

[1] 'La réalisation de désir'. This phrase is often taken by Lacan to be the best translation of Freud's 'Wunscherfüllung', translated in SE as 'wish-fulfilment'. At other times, 'réalisation' has been translated as 'realisation'; it should also be borne in mind that puns on 'réalité' and 'réel' are to be found in this connection in this chapter; they will be pointed out as needs be.

occupy behind this little table, there are no examples which reveal one to be inadequate, at least as far as appearances go. In other words, as a rather fine American poet so well observed, you never see a professor be wanting through ignorance. One always knows enough to occupy the minutes while one holds forth in the position of he who knows. You never see anyone dumb-struck, once he's taken up the position of being he who teaches.

This leads me to think that the only genuine teaching is one which succeeds in awakening an insistence in those who are listening, this desire to know which can only emerge when they themselves have taken the measure of ignorance as such – in so far as it is, as such, fruitful – and no less so on the part of the one who teaches.

So before delivering those few words which will appear to be conclusive to those who insist on the formal externals of things, but which for the others will be one more opening – I would like each and every one of you to ask me a question which would be defined as follows, that it be mine.

In other words, let everyone tell me, in his own way, what he thinks I'm trying to get at. Let him tell me, given everything I've said this year, how the question that I have raised, in my own way, has been filled out or closed for him, or has already reached its term, or how he is already resisting it.

This is only a target, and each of you can take up whatever distance you want from this ideal point. It seems to me entirely natural that it be the point of convergence for the questions which come to mind, but nothing obliges you to take that as your aim. Any question you may have to ask me, however seemingly incomplete, parochial, even ill-defined, must nonetheless have some relation to this target.

Moreover, if you think there's something we've been evading, you can use this occasion to say so. This will be yet another way of bringing to mind the continuity as it may have appeared to you along the path on which I've taken you up to now.

I would like you to do it now. That's how it is – I won't allow the seminar hour to be spent any other way than in this very experiment.

We shall proceed by calling for volunteers. This test is truly the least I can ask of you – to speak in front of the others. If, as analysts, you aren't capable of doing that, what can you do?

Those who feel ready to express something they already have on their minds or on the tip of their tongues, do say it right away. This will give the others time to recover.

MLLE RAMNOUX: After having read Freud's chapter, I managed to get some idea for myself of a defence-function which would have to be located at the surface and not in the depths, and which would be operative on two fronts, simultaneously against traumas which come from without, and against impulses which come from within. After your lectures, I can no longer think of it like that. And I ask myself which is the better definition. I think that amounts to saying that it is about a fragment of a common discourse. Is that it? Another question. I had also managed to understand why Freud called the source of repetitive symptoms a death instinct. I managed to understand it because this repetition manifests a kind of inertia, and inertia is a return to an inorganic state, hence to the remotest past. I thus understood why Freud could assimilate that to the death instinct. But, after having thought about your last lecture, I realised that these compulsions stem from a kind of indefinite, multiform desire, without any object, a desire for nothing. I understand it very well, but now I no longer understand death.

It is undoubtedly the case that everything I teach you is intended to put into question the situation of the ego within the topography as it is usually conceived. To install the ego at the centre of the perspective, as is done in the present approach in analysis, is only one of those reversals to which any questioning of the position of man is exposed. Every time there's been a revision of the discourse on man, we have difficulty imagining what happened, because the gist of each of these revisions is always deadened, attenuated, with time, in such a way that today, as always, the word humanism is a bag in which the corpses of these successive disclosures of a revolutionary point of view on man very slowly rot, piled one on top of the other. That is what is now in the process of happening in psychoanalysis.

This reminds me of something I read in the newspaper this morning about one of these displays with which we are now periodically confronted, each time the question of responsibility is raised, on the subject of a crime somewhat lacking in motivation. One witnesses the panicky fear of the psychiatrist, his frantic appeal, his terrified clutching in the face of the thought that, by not underlining the responsibility of the person in question, he himself may once again open up the door on to a general massacre. The former has evidently done something one's not used to seeing, although each moment affords the possibility of it – quite simply by smashing up and repeatedly stabbing, by the side of the road, the person to whom one is tied by the tenderest of bonds. The psychiatrist is all of a sudden confronted with this opening up, this gap, and he is called upon to take sides. This time, something has happened, in the way improbable things do happen, revealing the possibility that it was the luck of the draw. The psychiatrist, who here would have explained to people how saying that the guy is clearly responsible isn't enough to decide the issue, cops out. Then we are treated to a surprising discourse in which the subject makes a wry face as he utters his speech, saying both that the alleged criminal manifests every possible disturbance of affectivity, lacking contact, he's abominable, but that what he did nonetheless, of course, comes under the common discourse, and that he must suffer the penalty of the law.

We witness something similar in psychoanalysis. The return to the ego as the centre and common measure is not in any way implied by Freud's discourse. Quite the opposite in fact – the further his discourse advances, the further we follow him in the third stage of his work, the more the ego is shown as a mirage, a sum of identifications. Of course the ego is to be found at the rather impoverished point of synthesis to which the subject is reduced when he presents himself, but he is also something else, he also finds himself somewhere else, he comes from somewhere else, precisely from the point beyond the pleasure principle at which we can ask – what is it that is caught in this symbolic web, in this fundamental phrase which insists beyond anything we can catch of the motivation of the subject?

Evidently there is discourse, and, as you put it, common discourse. When I talked about The Purloined Letter, I told you, in a way which might have been enigmatic, that this letter, for a time, and within the limits of the short scene, of the Schauplatz as Freud puts it, of the Punch and Judy show Poe puts on for us, was the unconscious of the different subjects who succeed each other as its possessors. The letter itself, this phrase written on a piece of paper, in so far as it wanders about, is the unconscious. It is perfectly obvious, once you've seen my demonstration of the successive colourings these subjects acquire as the reflection of the letter shifts across their faces and their social standing.

Perhaps this does not satisfy you. But don't forget that Oedipus's unconscious is in fact that fundamental discourse which accounts for the fact that Oedipus's history has for a long time, forever, been written, accounts for the fact that we know it, and for the fact that Oedipus is totally ignorant of it, despite his having been its plaything from the start. This goes back a long way – remember how the oracle frightens his parents, how he is abandoned, rejected. Everything happens as a function of the oracle and owing to the fact that he really is someone other than what he thinks his history makes him – he is the son of Jocasta and Laius, and he starts life unaware of that. The entire pulsating drama of his destiny depends, from one end to the other, from beginning to end, on this veiling of the discourse, which is the reality of which he is ignorant.

When we come to talk of death again, I will perhaps try and explain to you the end of Oedipus's tragedy, as the great dramatists have portrayed it. You should read Oedipus at Colonus for the next seminar. There you'll discover that the final word of the relation of man to this discourse of which he is ignorant, is death. Indeed one must attain poetical expression in order to discover how intense can become the identification between this veiled preterite and death as such, in its most horrible guise. An unveiling which doesn't include a moment beyond and extinguishes all speech. If the tragedy Oedipus Rex is an exemplary work, analysts should also be acquainted with this beyond of the drama realised in the tragedy of Oedipus at Colonus.

How should one locate the ego in relation to common discourse and to the beyond of the pleasure principle? That is the question which your point opens up, and I find it very suggestive. In the end, there exists a kind of mirror relation between the subject-individual and the decentred subject, the subject beyond the subject, the subject of the unconscious.

The ego is itself one of the significant elements of ordinary discourse, which is the discourse of the unconscious. As such, and in so far as it is image, it is caught in the chain of symbols. It is an element indispensable to the insertion of the symbolic reality into the reality of the subject, it is tied to the primitive gap of the subject. On account of that, in its original sense, within the psychological life of the human subject it is what appears as closest to, as most intimate with, as on the closest of terms with death.

The relation of the ego to death is an extremely close one, for the ego is a point of intersection between the common discourse, in which the subject finds himself caught, alienated, and his psychological reality.

In man, the imaginary relation has deviated, in so far as that is where the gap is produced whereby death makes itself felt. The world of the symbol, the very foundation of which is the phenomenon of repetitive insistence, is alienating for the subject, or more exactly it causes the subject to always realise himself elsewhere, and causes his truth to be always in some part veiled from him. The ego lies at the intersection of the one and the other.

In the fundamental symbolism we find an inflection towards the imagistic [imagé], towards something which resembles the world or nature, giving the impression that here we have something of the archetypal. By the way, there's no need to say arche, it is simply typical. But it is more than certain that it has nothing to do with this substantialised thing which Jungian theory offers us under the name of archetype. These archetypes themselves are always symbolised, caught in what you called the common discourse, a fragment of this discourse. I agree – it is a very beautiful definition, and it's a term which I will use, because it is very closely tied to the definition of the ego.

As to your second question, I think last time I got you to realise the difference between insistence and inertia.

To what does resistance correspond in analytic treatment? To something inert. As such, one of its properties is that it doesn't possess in itself any kind of resistance. In the sense of Widerstand, an obstacle, an obstacle to an effort, there's no point looking for resistance anywhere else than within ourselves. Whosoever applies force provokes resistance. On the level of inertia, you'll never ever find resistance. Everything connected with transference belongs in a dimension pertaining to an entirely different register – it belongs to the order of an insistence.

You have also very clearly understood what I wanted to say last time when I invoked desire, desire as revealed by Freud, on the level of the unconscious, as desire for nothing.

Yesterday evening you heard a critique of the illusion, which isn't rare in Freud's readers, that one always finds the same signified, and a signified of rather limited significance, as if the dream's desire designated by Freud in the Traumdeutung could in the end be summed up in the form of a list, and a rather short one at that, of drives.

Nothing of the sort is true. I ask you to read the Traumdeutung once and for all and in one go so as to be convinced of the contrary. Although Freud there goes over the thousand empirical forms which this desire can acquire, there isn't a single analysis which ends up with the formulation of a desire. Desire is, in the end, never unveiled there. Everything happens on the steps, in the stages, on the different rungs of the revelation of this desire. Freud also somewhere pokes fun at the illusion of those who, having read his Traumdeutung, end up thinking that the reality of the dream is the sequence of the dream's latent thoughts. Freud himself says that if that were all it was, this reality would be of no interest. It is the stages of the dream-work which are interesting, for that is where we find revealed what we are looking for in the interpretation of the dream, this x, which in the end is desire for nothing. I defy you to bring me a single passage from the Traumdeutung which concludes – this is what the subject desires.

Objection – What about children's dreams? That is the only point of misunderstanding in the Traumdeutung. I will come back to it, and show you that this point of confusion stems from Freud's inclination, which is the shakiest aspect of his work, to have repeated recourse to a genetic view of things. The objection can be refuted. Fundamentally, when Freud speaks of desire as the mainspring of symbolic formations, from the dream to the joke via all the facts taken from the psychopathology of everyday life, he is always concerned with this moment when what comes into existence via the symbol isn't yet, and hence can in no way be named.

In other words, behind what is named, there is the unnameable. It is in fact because it is unnameable, with all the resonances you can give to this name, that it is akin to the quintessential unnameable, that is to say to death.

Read the Traumdeutung again, you'll see it at every step. Everything revealed as nameable is always on the level of the dream-work. This work is a symbolisation, with all its laws, which are those of signification. That was what I was talking about yesterday evening when I mentioned the switch-word, polyvalence, condensation, and all the terms which Freud uses. Its order is always that of overdetermination, or again that of significant motivation. From the moment when desire has already come into this, when it is caught from end to end in the dialectic of alienation and no longer has any other means of expression than through the desire for recognition and the recognition of desire, how can what hadn't yet been be met again?

Why should it be death? That's what I'll leave as the limit of your question, which proves that you understood what I said.

M. VALABREGA: Apropos of what you've just said regarding the dream. Both things are nonetheless true. I think you are right in one way to stress the dream-work.

Freud does explicitly say that this is the only thing of importance in dreams.

M. VALABREGA: But even so it isn't the only one, since he also says that the desire is fulfilled in the dream. I think you are right in stressing the work, because it is in the work that one finds the signification of the dream. If that weren't the case, there would be keys to dreams, an idea which Freud has done enough to refute. Nevertheless, the fulfilment of desire mustn't be overlooked. One can find an example of it not only in the dreams of children, but in hallucinatory dreams.

That is the same question. Do you think you can stick by that?

M. VALABREGA: No, of course not, when dreams become hallucination, one can't stop there – it is the whole of the work one is led to reconsider, and one has to talk as you do. But one also has to take into consideration the desire to sleep, for which there is a renewed interest today. It is both one of the initial and one of the final motives for the dream. Freud never speaks of secondary work, the only work there is is in the dream in the present, the narrated dream. And then, to terminate, there is the desire to sleep, which is one of the final meanings of the dream. Consequently, the fulfilment of desire at one end, and desire to sleep at the other. I think that more modern interpretations, which are only alluded to in the Traumdeutung, or in other later texts, the interpretation of the desire to sleep as narcissistic desire, clearly tend in this direction. There are two realities in the dream, the fulfilment of desire, which you seem to do away with a little, and the work of signifying.

You speak of fulfilment of the desire to sleep. To start with I'll go back over the first of these terms.

What can the expression fulfilment of desire mean? It seems that you grasped the fact that the fulfilment [réalisation] includes reality [réalité], and consequently here it could only be a question of metaphorical fulfilment. As in any hallucinatory satisfaction, we can here only locate the function of desire in a very problematic form. What is desire, as soon as it is the source of hallucination, of illusion, hence of a satisfaction which is the opposite of a satisfaction? If we give the term desire a functional definition, if for us it is the tension put into play by the cycle of behavioural fulfilment, whatever that may be, if we include it within a biological cycle, the desire achieves real satisfaction. If it achieves hallucinatory satisfaction, then there is another register here. Desire is satisfied in another fashion than in an effective satisfaction. It is the source, the fundamental means of introduction of a fantasy as such. Here there's another order, which doesn't achieve any objectivity, but which by itself defines the questions raised by the register of the imaginary.

M. VALABREGA: That is why Freud makes use of the concept of distortion,[2] that is why, immediately after the first proposition, the dream is the fulfilment of a wish [désir], he uses the concept of desire as a distorted fulfilment. That doesn't make it any the less a real [réelle] fulfilment [réalisation], but fulfilled in a distorted form.

The word distortion is only a metaphor, which leaves open the question of knowing what is satisfied in a symbolic satisfaction. There are indeed desires which will never find any other satisfaction than that of being acknowledged, that is to say avowed. In birds who end up giving up their positions alongside their mates following maneouvres with an adversary, one can all of a sudden see arise a meticulous grooming of feathers, which is an ectopia of sexual display. In this case, one would speak of throwing another circuit into gear, which might lead to a cycle of resolutions yielding the image of a substitutive satisfaction. Is symbolic satisfaction of the same order? That's the big question. The notion of distortion in no way aids us to grasp it.

As for the other term you brought up just now, the desire to sleep, of course that is extremely important. Freud gave it a special place in connection with secondary revision, in the final chapter of the section on the dream-work, which concerns the intervention in the dream of the ego as such.

I think that here there are still two things which one must know how to distinguish. There is the need to maintain sleep for a certain period of time, a need which is supposed to be subjacent to the duration of sleep, directed towards and against all the external or internal stimuli which might disturb it. Does this need appear in the ego? Does it partake of the vigilance the latter exercises with the aim of protecting the state of sleep? That is in fact one of the points in the dream where the ego makes its presence felt, but is far from being the only one. If you remember the chapter you're referring to, that is where the notion of unconscious fantasy appears for the first time in Freud's thought. Everything pertaining to the register of the ego as a vigilant agency occurs on the level of secondary revision, but Freud cannot separate it from the fantasising function in which this ego is integrated.

Here we find a whole series, set out with great nuance, of gaugings of the relations so as to distinguish fantasy, dream and day-dreaming, and, in conformity with a kind of mirror relation, at a certain point, there's an exchange of roles. Day-dreaming such as it occurs on the level of the ego is the illusory imaginary satisfaction of desire, it has a very localised function, as Mlle Ramnoux said earlier on, on the surface. What is the relation between this day-dreaming of the ego and another sort, located elsewhere, in tension? This is the first time in Freud's work that the notion of unconscious fantasy appears. This is to show you the complexity of the desire to preserve sleep.

It may be at this level that the game of hide and seek of the ego is most obvious, and finding out where it is presents us with a great number of difficulties. In the end, it is solely at the level of the ego that we come upon the function of day-dreaming in the structuration of dreams. And in addition it is solely when we start with the ego that we extrapolate into thinking that somewhere day-dreaming without ego exists, that unconscious fantasies exist. Paradoxically, the notion of unconscious fantasy, of the activity of fantasy, is supported only by taking a detour via the ego.

MME C. AUDRY: My question is very similar to that of Clémence Ramnoux, because it also concerns the ego. If the ego is ever a fragment of the common discourse, it is so in analysis. Prior to analysis, it is only a pure, imaginary mirage. From then on, analysis amounts to being a demystification of what was previously imaginary. So we get to the following point – once demystification has been accomplished, we find ourselves in the presence of death. All that is left is to wait and contemplate death. My question may seem overly positivistic or utilitarian but that's how it is.

Why not? In Oedipus at Colonus, Oedipus says the following: Am I made man in the hour when I cease to be? That is the end of Oedipus's psychoanalysis – the psychoanalysis of Oedipus is only completed at Colonus, when he tears his face apart. That is the essential moment, which gives his story its meaning, and, from the point of view of Oedipus, it is acting-out,[3] and he says as much – Still, I was angry.

MME C. AUDRY: Is it between the I cease to be [Je ne suis rien] and death that whatever is capable of being a substitute for humanism must pass?

Precisely. This 'something different', over many cultures, which renders this word, humanism, so difficult to handle.

M. DURANDIN: I would like to ask a question, but it isn't very legitimate for me to do so, since I haven't attended your seminars on a regular basis.

Well, I am going to ask you for some explanations of your deverbalisation of yesterday evening.

M. DURANDIN: There is nothing very difficult in my account of deverbalisation. It has a place, in part, in the immediate givens of consciousness. Language is not only an expression of something which one already knows, it's a mode of communication. It is the instrument in accordance with which the thought of the child is formed. Given the fact that the child lives in society, his carving up of the world is achieved through the intermediary of language, hence verbal realism. One thinks that whenever there's a thing, there must be a word, and if there's no word, there's no thing, and one doesn't take the trouble to look.

Why don't you fill in what you have just said? Yesterday evening you mentioned the following type of question – did I give that out of generosity or cowardice?

M. DURANDIN: My patient often puts such questions to me. It isn't possible for me to reply, for the two things he hesitates between are shallow things, which do not correspond to reality. He needs to label whatever he thinks and feels, and, even if it were less shallow, this need to place things and to label them is nonetheless something fixed, half dead. In most cases, these are ready-made thoughts. And to the extent that one obliges a subject to make contact, that one answers him evasively, encouraging him to continue . . .

You think it's enough to take away his off-the-peg clothes for him to get a made-to-measure suit?

M. DURANDIN: It isn't enough. But he must be encouraged to see himself naked, to have some self-awareness. That doesn't alter the importance of the speech which comes afterwards. The expression 'deverbalisation' perhaps wasn't a happy one. What seemed important to me was that language is the mould in which our thought, our concepts, our use of the world is formed.

What you say seems to presuppose that there are two kinds of thought, the one you call ready made and one that wouldn't be. And that the essence of thoughts which aren't ready made is that they are not just thoughts, but deverbalised thoughts. You have taken a conspicuous example from our experience, those questions which the subject asks himself within the register of the psychology of La Rochefoucauld – when I do good, am I doing it for my own glory or for that of a beyond?

M. DURANDIN: That is indeed the register.

But why do you think that that is something we should connect with shallow or empty speech? Don't you think that the question remains a perfectly authentic one? You are positioning yourself where La Rochefoucauld placed himself in his register, and it's not for nothing that the ego became such an important issue at that time. Whatever you do, in whatever form you choose to manipulate thought, that is to say, with all due respect, always in a spoken form, the question will retain all of its force. For, in so far as the subject places himself in the register of the ego, everything is indeed dominated by the narcissistic relation. Isn't that what we mean when we say for instance that there is an ineliminable narcissistic dimension in all forms of giving? Do you think that the subject will finally find his way by abandoning the question? How?

M. DURANDIN: By reformulating it, and by becoming aware of it.

But how? What have you got in mind as to the manner in which he can reformulate the question?

M. DURANDIN: If he poses the question in terms of generosity or cowardice, it is probably because he takes the concept seriously, as if they were things.

He may take them seriously without taking them to be things.

M. DURANDIN: It isn't very easy.

What you're saying is true. There is a tendency towards thingification.

M. DURANDIN: So an exercise in language may be an exercise in the reformulation of thought. Starting with what? Starting with the experience of the fact that one then falls upon things which are a bit mysterious and ineffable. In the end that's reality. One becomes aware of reality by carving it up, by articulating it. But all the same it is something before being named.

It is unnameable.

M. DURANDIN: What happens in one's guts is unnameable, but it ends up being named.

But everything you feel, even in your guts, as you quite rightly say, gives rise to vago-sympathetic reactions only as a function of the chain of questions that you will have introduced. That is what makes you a man. All the peculiarities, the idiosyncrasies, even the rhythm of your vago-sympathetic reactions depends on the way in which questions are introduced in your historicised-historicising story, as soon as you know how to speak. It goes well beyond a strict training.

To evoke a theme often found in Freud, it is as a function of the significant character taken on by the first time you went in your pants, that you will do so again, at an age it's no longer meant to happen. This letting go was interpreted as a sign, that you lost face or that it was tied to an erotic emotion – take another look at the Wolfman. It has acquired value in the phrase, an historic value, a value as symbol, that it may or may not continue to possess. But in every case it is the value that your gut reaction acquired the first time that will be the starting point for the differentiation which will occur on the level of your guts and your digestive tract, and that the chain of causes and effects will evermore be different. If psychoanalysis doesn't teach us that, it doesn't teach us a thing.

In the end, the thought covered by the term deverbalisation is the following – the subject's every word only raises false problems. Can we even imagine this idea giving us the solution to what is to be found in the question the subject asks himself? On the contrary, isn't the point to make him understand the extent to which this dialectic of self-love, in this case, has been a part of his discourse up till then? That he is asking his question in an authentic fashion, in so far as his ego plays this role in his relations with other human beings, and it does so because of his history, which must be restored to him in its entirety?

From the position of the obsessional, for instance, everything of the order of the gift is caught in this narcissistic network from which it cannot escape. Doesn't one have to exhaust the dialectic of narcissism right to the very end for him to find the way out? Does one have to force him to beat a retreat in such a way that he never ever articulates another word, or on the contrary should the discourse be pushed to its end in such a way as to take over the whole story? The obsessional's basic story is that he is entirely alienated in a master whose death he awaits, without knowing that he is already dead, in such a way that he can't make a move. Isn't it by making him realise who he is truly the prisoner and slave of, of the dead master, that you can hope for the solution? It isn't by forcing him to abandon his discourse, but by inciting him to follow it through to the terminal stage of its dialectical rigour, that you will be able to get him to understand how he is always frustrated of everything in advance. The more he grants himself things, the more he grants them to the other, to this dead man, and he finds himself eternally deprived of any kind of enjoyment [jouissance] in the thing. If he doesn't understand this step, there is no way that you'll ever get yourself out of it.

You tell him that it's a neat cut-out. Then what? Do you think that in itself this philosophy has any cathartic value? Certainly not. Whatever your disdain for the question, you can't help seeing it being perpetually reproduced. There is no reason why the subject should end up without an ego, except in an extreme case such as that of Oedipus at the end of his life.

No one has ever studied the last moments of an obsessional. It would be worthwhile. Maybe at that moment there's a revelation. If you want to procure a somewhat more precocious revelation you certainly won't do so by abandoning speech.

M. LEFÈBVRE-PONTALIS: I sense a certain unease. A lot is said here about the symbolic and the imaginary, but not much is said about the real. And the questions just asked show that we've somewhat lost the real. What Colette Audry said was striking – it was lucky that Oedipus didn't know too soon what he knew only at the end, for he still had to fill out his life. It's all very well seeing how many things which one first took to belong to the real are part of a network, a system with several points of entry, in which I has a place. Where is reality located, if not in the movement between all these dimensions? In other words, the recognition of desire must somehow pass through a certain number of mediations, of avatars, of imaginary formations, of states of being ignorant or of misunderstanding of a symbolic order. Finally, is that what you would call reality?

Without a doubt. That is what everybody calls reality.

M. LEFÈBVRE-PONTALIS: Still, in reality there's something, which isn't like a thing, but like a category, like a norm, something more than there is in other orders. Reality isn't the totality of the symbol.

I am going to ask you a question. Are you aware how rare it is for love to come to grief on the real qualities or faults of the loved one?

M. LEFÈBVRE-PONTALIS: I'm not sure I can answer no. I'm not sure whether that might not be a retrospective illusion.

I said it was rare. And in fact, when it comes down to it, they appear to be much more like pretexts. One wants to believe that this reality has been touched on.

M. LEFÈBVRE-PONTALIS: But that has very great consequences. It amounts to saying that there is no true conception, that one only ever moves from one corrective to the next, from one mirage to the next.

In fact I do believe that to be the case in the register of intersubjectivity within which our entire experience is to be located. Do we ever reach as simple a real as those limitations of individual capacities which the various psychologies aim to attain?

It isn't in fact that easy to attain, for the domain of the measurable finds its bearings only with great difficulty when it comes to individual qualities, as soon as one locates them at a high enough level, as soon as one tries to discover a certain number of invariable factors – what we call constitutions, temperaments, whereby one tries to qualify individual differences as such. In spite of it all, I wouldn't say that spontaneous psychology is stricken with a basic impotence, since everyone, in so far as he is psychologically astute, gives marks to his contemporaries, and experience shows that he is quite capable of doing so. One does in fact get somewhere by asking a group of people about a given individual, and in asking each of them to give him a mark for this or that quality of his or this or that alleged defect of his.

I am therefore not trying to render the approach to the real through intersubjectivity fundamentally null and void. But in the end, the human drama as such is located outside the domain of such appraisals. Each person's drama, what each of us has to deal with, which produces certain effects, sometimes pathological, sometimes simply alienating, is of an entirely different order from these appraisals of the real, though they have their utility.

So I don't question the existence of the real. There are all kinds of real limitations. It is undoubtedly true that I can't lift this table with one hand, there are all kinds of things that can be measured.

M. LEFÈBVRE-PONTALIS: You only see the real under its aspect of adversity, as what resists, what is troublesome.

It doesn't trouble me that I can't lift this table, it forces me to take a detour, that's obvious, but it doesn't trouble me to take a detour – I don't think that that is the meaning of what I teach you when I distinguish the symbolic, the imaginary and the real.

The essential part of human experience, that which is properly speaking the experience of the subject, that which causes the subject to exist, is to be located on the level of the emergence of the symbolic. To use a word which has resonances in the development of scientific thought, Baconian resonances, tables of presence, it never occurs to one that these assume the emergence of an entirely different dimension from that of the real. What you connote as presence is placed at the root of its possible inexistence. I am presenting the idea I'm putting forward here in a perceivable form, since I'm replying to someone who's putting the question of realism to me, someone who is a long way from being an idealist. There is no question of saying that the real didn't exist beforehand. But nothing that is effective in the domain of the subject emerges out of it. In so far as the subject exists, in so far as he sustains his existence, in so far as he raises the question of his existence, this subject with whom you are in dialogue in analysis and whom you cure through the art of speech, his essential reality consists in the junction of reality and the appearance of tables of presence. That doesn't mean that it's him who creates them all. What I'm going blue in the face telling you is precisely that they are already made. The game is already played, the die already cast. It is already cast, with the following proviso, that we can pick it up again, and throw it anew. The game has been going on a long time. Everything I'm showing you is already part of a story concerning which one can pronounce every possible and imaginable oracle. That is why the Augurs can't look each other in the face without laughing. It isn't because they tell each other – You're having them on. If Tiresias encounters another Tiresias, he laughs. But in fact he can't encounter another, because he is blind, and not without reason. Don't you feel there's something derisory and funny about the fact that the die has already been cast?

M. LEFÈBVRE-PONTALIS: That doesn't answer my question.

We are reconsidering it. But what is striking is the extent to which a vacillation – quite apparent, because on the contrary it allows things to conserve a remarkable stability, somewhere other than where you are accustomed to find it – a certain vacillation in the usual relations of the symbol and the real can throw you into considerable disarray. To be quite candid, if I had to sum you up – I'm not talking about you personally, but about people of your generation – I'd say what strikes me is the number of things they believe in.

I have found a very odd ordinance from 1277 for you to use. In those days of faith and darkness, they were forced to curb those who, on the forms at school, in the Sorbonne and elsewhere, openly blasphemed the name of Jesus or Mary during mass. That's not done any more – it would not occur to you to blaspheme against Jesus and Mary. But I've known highly surrealist people who would rather be hung than publish a poem blaspheming the Virgin, because they thought that, after all, something just might happen to them.

The most severe punishments were decreed for those who played dice at the altar during the Holy Sacrament. Such things seem to me to indicate the existence of a working dimension which is singularly lacking in our time.

It is not for nothing that I am telling you about dice and making you play the game of even and odd. Without the shadow of a doubt, there's something rather scandalous about playing a game of dice on the altar, and all the more so during the Holy Sacrament. But I think that the fact that it is possible should restore to you the sense of a capacity which has been far more obliterated than one thinks in the circles we frequent. It is simply what is called the possibility of criticism.

Desire, life and death

THE LIBIDO
DESIRE, SEXUAL DESIRE, INSTINCT RESISTANCE OF THE ANALYST
THE BEYOND OF OEDIPUS
LIFE DREAMS ONLY OF DYING

Today we are going to make some headway with the question of the relations between the Freudian notion of the death instinct and what I have called significant insistence.

The questions you asked me last time don't seem to me to have been misguided – they all bore on very sensitive issues. The remainder of our path will take us to some answers to a number of them, and I will try not to forget to point that out to you as we go along.

We have reached a radical crossroads in the Freudian position. At this point, one can almost say anything. But this anything isn't just anything, in the sense that whatever one may say, it will always be rigorous to those who know how to listen.

Indeed the point we're getting to is none other than desire and whatever can be said about it on the basis of our experience – an anthropology? a cosmology? There's no word for it.

Even though this is the central point Freud is asking us to understand in the phenomenon of mental illness, it is something which in itself is so subversive that all one cares about is to distance oneself from it.

In order to talk about desire, one notion in particular came to the fore, the libido. Is what this notion implies adequate to the level on which your action takes place, namely that of speech?

Libido allows one to speak of desire in terms which involve a relative objectification. It is, if you wish, a unit of quantitative measurement. A quantity which you don't know how to measure, whose nature you don't know, but which you always assume to be there. This quantitative notion allows you to unify the variation in qualitative effects, and gives some coherence to the manner in which they succeed one another.

Let us be clear as to what is meant by qualitative effects. There are states, changes of state. To explain the order in which they occur and their transformations, you more or less implicitly have recourse to the notion of a threshold, and by the same token to that of a level and of invariability. You assume an undifferentiated quantitative unit susceptible of entering into relations of equivalence. If it can't be discharged, can't expand as normal, can't spread out, overflows occur from which other states ensue. Hence one would talk of transformations, regressions, fixations, sublimations of the libido, a single term which is conceived of quantitatively.

The notion of libido emerged only gradually out of the Freudian experience, and it didn't have this extended use at the beginning. But as soon as it makes its appearance, that is in the Three Essays, it already has the function of unifying the different structures of the phases of sexuality. Do note that, although this work dates from 1905, the part which concerns the libido dates from 1915, that is to say the period, more or less, when the theory of phases was becoming extremely complicated, with the introduction of narcissistic investments.

So the notion of libido is a form of unification for the domain of psychoanalytical effects. I would now like to draw your attention to the fact that its use falls within the traditional scope of any and every theory, tending to end up with a world, the terminus ad quem of classical physics, or a unitary domain, the ideal of Einsteinian physics. We aren't in a position to align our poor little domain with the universal domain of physics, but the libido partakes of the same ideal.

It's not for nothing that this unitary domain is called theoretical – it is the ideal and unique subject of a theoria, an intuition, indeed contemplation, the exhaustive knowledge of which we assume would allow us to give an account of its entire past no less than its entire future. It is clear that none of this affords any place to what would be the realisation of anything new, a Wirken, an action, properly speaking.

Nothing could be further removed from the Freudian experience.

The Freudian experience starts from an exactly contrary notion of the theoretical perspective. It starts by postulating a world of desire. It postulates it prior to any kind of experience, prior to any considerations concerning the world of appearances and the world of essences. Desire is instituted within the Freudian world in which our experience unfolds, it constitutes it, and at no point in time, not even in the most insignificant of our manoeuvres in this experience of ours, can it be erased.

The Freudian world isn't a world of things, it isn't a world of being, it is a world of desire as such.

This famous object relation, which we are gargling with these days, has a tendency to be employed as a model, a pattern[1] of the adaptation of the subject to its normal objects. However, this term, in so far as it can be of use in the experience of analysis, can only acquire a meaning from ideas concerning the evolution of the libido, the pregenital stage, the genital stage. Can one say that the structure, the maturity, the fully-fledged realisation of the object depends on the libido? At the genital stage, the libido is thought to bring a new object, another structuration, another sort of existence for the object into the world, bringing its fullness, its maturity to completion. And this has nothing to do with traditional aspects of the theory of man's relations to the world – the opposition of being to appearance.

Within the classical, theoretical perspective, between subject and object there is coaptation, co-naissance[2] – a play on words retaining all its force, for the theory of knowledge lies at the heart of any discussion of the relation of man to the world. The subject has to place himself in adequation with the thing, in a relation of being to being – the relation of a subjective being, but one that is truly real, of a being aware of being, to a being one knows to be.

The domain of the Freudian experience is established within a very different register of relations. Desire is a relation of being to lack. This lack is the lack of being properly speaking. It isn't the lack of this or that, but lack of being whereby the being exists.

This lack is beyond anything which can represent it. It is only ever represented as a reflection on a veil. The libido, but now no longer as used theoretically as a quantitative quantity, is the name of what animates the deep-seated conflict at the heart of human action.

We necessarily believe that, at the centre, things are really there, solid, established, waiting to be recognised, and that the conflict is marginal. But what does the Freudian experience teach us? If not that what happens in the domain of so-called consciousness, that is on the level of the recognition of objects, is equally misleading in relation to what the being is looking for? In so far as the libido creates the different stages of the object, the objects are never it[3] – except from the moment when that would be entirely it, thanks to a genital maturation of the libido, the experience of which in analysis retains a character which is, there is no denying it, ineffable, since as soon as one wants to spell it out, one ends up in all sorts of contradictions, including the impasse of narcissism.

Desire, a function central to all human experience, is the desire for nothing nameable. And at the same time this desire lies at the origin of every variety of animation. If being were only what it is, there wouldn't even be room to talk about it. Being comes into existence as an exact function of this lack. Being attains a sense of self in relation to being as a function of this lack, in the experience of desire. In the pursuit of this beyond, which is nothing, it harks back to the feeling of a being with self-consciousness, which is nothing but its own reflection in the world of things. For it is the companion of beings there before it, who do not in fact know themselves.

The self-conscious being, transparent to itself, which classical theory places at the centre of human experience, appears, from this perspective, as a manner of locating, in the world of objects, this being of desire who cannot perceive itself as such, except in its lack. In this lack of being, it perceived that it is lacking being, and that the being is there, in all the things which do not know themselves to be. And it imagines itself, for its part, as one more object, for it sees no other difference. It says – I'm the one who knows that I am. Unfortunately, if it does perhaps know that it is, it knows nothing at all about what it is. That is what is lacking in every being.

In short, there is a confusion between the capacity to erect a fundamental distress whereby being arises as presence from a background of absence, and what we commonly call the capacity for consciousness, for becoming aware, which is only a neutral and abstract, and even abstracted, form of the totality of the possible mirages.

Relations between human beings are really established before one gets to the domain of consciousness. It is desire which achieves the primitive structuration of the human world, desire as unconscious. In this respect, we must appraise Freud's advance.

Copernican revolution, when it comes down to it, is, as you can see, a crass metaphor. It goes without saying that Copernicus produced a revolution, but in the world of determined and determinable things. Freud's advance constitutes, I would say, a revolution in an opposite direction, because before Copernicus, the world owed its structure precisely to the fact that so much of man was already in it. And to tell the truth, we've never really decanted it completely, although we've done enough.

Freud's advance isn't to be explained by the basic and precarious experience of the fact of having to care for someone, it really is the correlate of a revolution carried through over the entire domain constituted by man's thinking concerning himself and his experience; over the entire domain of philosophy – since after all we must give it its name.

This revolution brings man back into the world as creator. But the latter risks being entirely dispossessed of his creation by the simple trick, always put on one side in classical theory, which consists in saying – God is no deceiver.

That is so essential that, when it came to it, Einstein got stuck at the same point as Descartes. The Lord, he used to say, is certainly a crafty fellow, but he isn't dishonest. It was essential to his organisation of the world that God not be a deceiver. But this, precisely, is what we don't know.

The decisive element of the Freudian experience could be summed up as follows – don't forget that consciousness isn't universal. Modern experience awoke from a long fascination with the property of consciousness, and considers man's experience within its own structure, which is the structure of desire. That is the only starting-point for explaining the fact that there are men. Not men as a herd, but men who speak, with this speech through which something is introduced into the world which weighs as heavily as the whole of the real.

There is a fundamental ambiguity in the use we make of the word 'desire'. Sometimes we objectify it – and we have to do so, if only to talk about it. On the contrary, sometimes we locate it as the primitive term in relation to any objectification.

In fact, sexual desire in our experience has nothing objectified about it. It is neither an abstraction, nor a purified x, as the notion of force in physics has become. Doubtless we make use of it, and it's very handy, for describing a certain biological cycle, or more precisely a certain number of cycles which are more or less tied up with biological systems. But what we have to deal with is a subject which is here, who truly is desiring, and the desire in question is prior to any kind of conceptualisation – every conceptualisation stems from it. The proof that analysis does indeed lead to our approaching things this way is that the largest part of what the subject takes to be a certainty after due reflection is for us only the superficial, rationalised, subsequently justified ordering of what his desire foments, which gives his world and his action its essential curvature.

If we were to operate in the world of science, if it were sufficient to change the objective conditions in order to obtain different effects, if sexual desire followed objectified cycles, we would end up abandoning analysis. How could sexual desire thus defined be influenced by the experience of speech – except by adopting magical thinking?

It isn't Freud who discovered that the libido is the determining factor in human behaviour. Aristotle was already offering a theory of hysteria based on the fact that the uterus is a small animal which lives inside the woman's body, and which moved about bloody violently when it wasn't given something to tuck into. Obviously he used this example because he didn't want to take a far more obvious one, the male sexual organ, for which you don't need any sort of theoretician to remind you of its surgings.

Except Aristotle never thought matters would be helped by having conversations with the little animal inside the woman's belly. In other words, to speak like a chansonnier who, in his obscenity, was infected from time to time with a kind of sacred fury [fureur] verging on prophecy[4] – ça ne mange pas de pain, ça ne parle pas non plus, et puis ça n'entend rien [it doesn't take up space, nor does it talk, neither does it hear]. It is not open to reason. If the experience of speech has an effect under these circumstances, it is because we are somewhere other than Aristotle.

Of course, the desire we deal with in analysis isn't totally unrelated to this desire.

Given the level at which desire is to be found in the Freudian experience, why are we nonetheless called upon to embody it in this desire?

2

You tell me, my dear Valabrega, that there's a kind of satisfaction of desire in dreams. I assume that you are thinking of children's dreams, as indeed about every kind of hallucinatory satisfaction of desire.

But what does Freud tell us? It is true, in the child there's no distortion of desire, during the day he wants cherries and he dreams of cherries. Except, Freud nonetheless emphasises that, even at this infantile stage, the desire of the dream as of the symptom is a sexual desire. He is adamant about that.

Look at the Wolfman. With Jung, the libido gets drowned in the concerns of the soul, the great dreamer, the centre of the world, the ethereal embodiment of the subject. Freud is categorically opposed to that, and moreover at an extremely delicate moment in time, when he is tempted to give in to Jungian reductionism, since at that point he realises that the perspective of the past of the subject may well only be fantasy. The door is open to pass from the notion of desire which is directed towards, which is captivated by, mirages, to the notion of the universal mirage. It isn't the same thing.

The full signification of the fact that Freud retains the term 'sexual desire' every time desire is at issue can be seen in those cases when something else clearly seems to be involved, the hallucination of needs for instance. It all seems entirely natural – why wouldn't needs be hallucinated? It's so much easier to believe on account of there being a kind of mirage at the second level, called mirage of the mirage. Since we experience the mirage, its presence is entirely natural. But once you start thinking, you ought to be astonished by the existence of mirages, and not only by what they show us.

We never stop long enough to consider the hallucination of the child's dream or the dream of the starving. We don't notice one fine detail, which is that when the child wanted cherries during the day, she doesn't dream only of cherries. To cite the young Anna Freud, since the dream is hers, with her baby talk in which certain consonants are missing, she also dreams of custard, of cake, just as the person starving to death doesn't dream of the hunk of bread and glass of water which would sate him, rather he dreams of Pantagruelian meals.

O. MANNONI: The dream about the cherries and the one about the cake aren't the same.[5]

[5] See GW II/III 135; Stud II 148; SE IV 130.

The desire at issue, even the one that is said to be distorted, is already beyond the coaptation of need. Even the simplest of desires is very problematic.

O. MANNONI: The desire isn't the same, since she recounts her dream.

I'm very much aware that you have an admirable understanding of what I'm saying. Of course, that's what it's really about, but that isn't clear to everyone, and I'm trying to bring the evidence to bear just where it can reach the greatest number of people. Let me stick to the level I'm working on.

In the end, at this existential level, we can only talk about the libido satisfactorily in a mythical way – it is the genitrix, hominum divumque voluptas.[6] That is what Freud is getting at. In former days what returns here used to be expressed in terms of the gods, and one must proceed with care before turning it into an algebraic sign. They're extremely useful, algebraic signs, but on condition that you restore their dimensions to them. That is what I am trying to do when I talk to you about machines.

When does Freud tell us about a beyond of the pleasure principle? Just when the analysts have taken the path Freud taught them, and think they know. Freud tells them that desire is sexual desire, and they believe it. That is precisely where they err – for they don't understand what that means.

Why for most of the time is desire something other than what it appears to be? Why is that what Freud calls sexual desire? The reason for it remains concealed, just as concealed as the beyond which the one who experiences the sexual desire looks for behind an experience subjected to all the lures in nature as a whole.

If there's something which shows, not only in ordinary experience, but in experiments, the efficacity of the lure in animal behaviour, that something is sexual experience. There's nothing easier than fooling an animal about the qualities which turn an object, of whatever appearance, into the thing towards which he'll advance as if towards his partner. The captivating Gestalten, the innate releasing mechanisms are inscribed in the register of parade and pairing.

When Freud maintains that sexual desire is the heart of human desire, all those who follow him believe it, believe it so strongly that they manage to persuade themselves that it is all very simple, and that all that's left to do is to turn it into a science, the science of sexual desire, a constant force. All it takes is to remove the obstacles, and it will work all by itself. All it takes is to tell the patient – you don't realise it, but the object is here. That is at first sight what an interpretation seems to be like.

Except it doesn't work. This is when – and this is the turning-point – it is said that the subject resists. Why do we say that? Because Freud also said it. But we haven't understood what resisting means any more than we have understood sexual desire. We think that we should press on. And that is when the analyst himself succumbs to the lure. I showed you what the insistence on the side of the suffering patient means. Well then, the analyst places himself at the same level, he insists in his own way, an obviously far more stupid way, since it is conscious.

In the perspective which I'm opening up for you, it's you who provoke resistance. In the sense in which you understand resistance, that is a resistance which resists, it only resists because that's where you're pushing. There is no resistance on the part of the subject. What's at stake is delivering the insistence that is to be found in the symptom. What Freud himself calls inertia in this context isn't a resistance – like any kind of inertia, it is a kind of ideal point. It's you who presuppose it, in order to understand what's happening. You aren't wrong so long as you don't forget that it is your hypothesis. It simply means that there's a process, and that in order to understand it you imagine a zero point. Resistance only starts once you try to make the subject move on from this point.

In other words, resistance is the present state of an interpretation of the subject. It is the manner in which, at the same time, the subject interprets the point he's got to. This resistance is an abstract ideal point. It is you who call it resistance. It simply means that he cannot move any faster, and you have no say in the matter. The subject is where he is at. The question is one of knowing whether or not he is making progress. It is clear that he has no inclination whatsoever to move on, but however little he speaks, however little value what he says might have, what he says is his interpretation of the moment, and the rest of what he says is the totality of his successive interpretations. Properly speaking, resistance is an abstraction which you locate inside so as to find your way around. You introduce the idea of a deadlock, which you call resistance, and of a force, which makes it move on. Up to that point, that is entirely correct. But if you invariably then resort to the idea that resistance is to be liquidated, as is written all over the place, you are ending up with pure, unqualified absurdity. Having created an abstraction, you say – we have to make this abstraction disappear, there mustn't be any inertia.

There is only one resistance, the resistance of the analyst. The analyst resists when he doesn't understand what he is dealing with. He doesn't understand what he is dealing with when he thinks that interpreting is showing the subject that what he desires is this particular sexual object. He's mistaken. What he here takes to be objective is just a pure and simple abstraction. He's the one who's in a state of inertia and of resistance.

In contrast, what's important is to teach the subject to name, to articulate, to bring this desire into existence, this desire which, quite literally, is on this side of existence, which is why it insists. If desire doesn't dare to speak its name, it's because the subject hasn't yet caused this name to come forth.

That the subject should come to recognise and to name his desire, that is the efficacious action of analysis. But it isn't a question of recognising something which would be entirely given, ready to be coapted. In naming it, the subject creates, brings forth, a new presence in the world. He introduces presence as such, and by the same token, hollows out absence as such. It is only at this level that one can conceive of the action of interpretation.

Since we're always engaged in a balancing-act between Freud's text and experience, go back to the text, to see how Beyond really does locate desire beyond any instinctual cycle definable by its conditions.

To fill in what I am in the middle of articulating for you, I told you that we had an example, which I took because I happened to come across it – the example of Oedipus finding his end, the beyond of Oedipus.

The fact that Oedipus is the patronymic hero of the Oedipus complex isn't a coincidence. Another one could have been chosen, since all the heroes of Greek mythology have some sort of connection with this myth, they embody it under different guises, reveal other aspects of it. There was certainly a reason why Freud was guided towards this one.

Throughout his life, Oedipus is always this myth. He is himself nothing other than the passage from myth to existence. Whether he existed or not is of little importance to us, since he exists in each of us, in a palely reflected form, he is ubiquitous, and he exists far more than if he really had existed.

One can say that a thing does or doesn't really exist. On the other hand, I was surprised to see, regarding the archetypal cure, one of our colleagues oppose the term psychic reality to that of true reality. I think that I have put you all in enough of a state of suggestion for this term to seem to you a contradiction in adjecto.

Whether a thing really exists or not doesn't much matter. It can perfectly easily exist in the full sense of the term, even if it doesn't really exist. By definition, there is something so improbable about all existence that one is in effect perpetually questioning oneself about its reality.

So Oedipus does exist, and he fully realised his destiny. He realised it to that final point which is nothing more than something strictly identical to a striking down, a tearing apart, a laceration of himself – he is no longer, no longer anything, at all. And it is at that moment that he says the phrase I evoked last time – Am I made man in the hour when I cease to be?

I've torn this phrase out of its context, and I must put it back there so that you avoid acquiring the illusion that, for instance, the term of man would at this moment have some sort of significance. In all strictness, it has none, precisely in as much as Oedipus achieved the full realisation of the speech of the oracles which already named his destiny even before he was born. Before his birth his parents were told those things which required that he be hurled towards his destiny, that is that no sooner was he born, he be exposed hung by a foot. It is with this initial act that he begins to realise his destiny. So everything is written from the start, and unfolds right up to its final end, including the fact that Oedipus assumes it through his own action. I, he says, have nothing to do with it. The people of Thebes, in their exaltation, gave me this woman as reward for having delivered them from the Sphinx, and this guy, I didn't know who he was, I beat him up, he was old, I can't help it, I hit him a bit hard, it has to be said I was quite a guy.

He accepts his destiny at the moment when he mutilates himself, but he had already accepted it at the moment when he accepted the crown. It is when he is king that he draws down all the maledictions on the city, and that there is an order of the gods, a law of retributions and punishments. It is quite natural for everything to come down on Oedipus since he is the central knot of speech. The question is whether he will accept it or not. He thinks that, after all, he is innocent, but he fully accepts it since he tears himself apart. And he asks to be allowed to sit at Colonus, in the sacred precinct of the Eumenides. He thus fulfils the prophecy [parole] down to the last detail.

Meanwhile, people in Thebes continue to gossip. The people of Thebes are told – Just a minute! You pushed it a bit far. It was all very well for Oedipus to mortify himself. Except, you found him disgusting and you drove him away. Now, the future of Thebes hangs precisely on this embodied speech which you couldn't recognise when it was here, with its ensuing tearing, cancelling of man. You exiled him. Thebes beware – if you don't bring him back, if not within the limits of your land, at least nearby, so that he doesn't slip away from you. If the speech which is his destiny begins to wander, it will take with it your destiny as well. Athens will reap the harvest of true existence which he embodies, and she will secure every advantage over you and will have every triumph.

They run after him. Hearing that he is about to receive some visit, all kinds of ambassadors, wise men, politicians, enthusiasts, his son, Oedipus then says – Am I made man in the hour when I cease to be?

That is where beyond the pleasure principle begins. When the oracle's prophecy [parole] is entirely fulfilled, when the life of Oedipus has completely passed over into his destiny, what remains of Oedipus? That is what Oedipus at Colonus shows us – the essential drama of destiny, the total absence of charity, of fraternity, of anything whatsoever relating to what one calls human feeling.

What does the theme of Oedipus at Colonus amount to? The chorus says – Say what you will, the greatest boon is not to be;/ But, life begun, soonest to end is best, . . . And Oedipus calls down the most extreme maledictions upon posterity and the city for which he was a burnt offering – read the maledictions addressed to his son, Polynices.

And then, there is the negation of the prophecy [parole], which takes place within the precinct, upon whose borders the whole drama takes place, the precinct in the place where it is forbidden to speak, the central point where silence is obligatory, for there live avenging goddesses, who do not forgive and who catch hold of the human being at every opportunity. You get Oedipus to come out of there each time you want to get a few words from him, for if he says them in that place, something awful will happen.

The sacred always has its raisons d'être. Why is there always somewhere where speech peters out? Perhaps so that it subsists in this precinct.

What happens at that moment? The death of Oedipus. It comes about under extremely peculiar circumstances. Someone whose gaze, from afar, has followed the two men as they go towards the centre of the sacred place, turns around, and sees only one of the two men, hiding his face with his arm in an attitude of sacred awe. You have the feeling that it isn't very pretty to look at, a kind of volatilisation of the presence of one who has said his last words. I think that Oedipus at Colonus here is alluding to some unknown thing which was revealed in the mysteries, which are here always in the background. But for us, if I wanted to picture it, I would look for it yet again in Edgar Poe.

Edgar Poe always juxtaposed the themes of life and of death, in a way not lacking in significance. As an echo of this liquifaction of Oedipus, I would choose The Facts in the Case of M. Valdemar.

It's about an experiment in the sustentation of the subject in speech, by means of what was then called magnetism, a form of theorisation of hypnosis – someone in articulo mortis is hypnotised to see what will happen. A man at the end of his life is chosen, he only has some few breaths left, and in every other way he's dying. It's been explained to him that if he wants to become one of humanity's heroes, he has only to signal to the hypnotiser. If this could be set up in the few hours preceding his last breath, one would find out. This is fine poetical imagination, which ranges much further than our timid medical imaginations, although we all try hard along that road.

In fact, the subject passes from life into death, and remains for some months in a state of sufficient aggregation to be still in fair condition – a corpse on a bed, which, from time to time, speaks, saying I am dead.

This state of affairs is maintained, with the help of all kinds of tricks and digs in the ribs, until the passes contrary to those that put him to sleep are started in order to wake him up, when several screams from the poor wretch are heard – For God's sake! – quick! – quick! – put me to sleep – or, quick! – waken me! – quick! – I SAY TO YOU THAT I AM DEAD!

He's already been saying he's dead for six months, but when he is awakened, M. Valdemar is no more than a disgusting liquefaction, something for which no language has a name, the naked apparition, pure, simple, brutal, of this figure which it is impossible to gaze at face on, which hovers in the background of all the imaginings of human destiny, which is beyond all qualification, and for which the word carrion is completely inadequate, the complete collapse of this species of swelling that is life – the bubble bursts and dissolves down into inanimate putrid liquid.

That is what happens in the case of Oedipus. As everything right from the start of the tragedy goes to show, Oedipus is nothing more than the scum of the earth, the refuse, the residue, a thing empty of any plausible appearance.

Oedipus at Colonus, whose being lies entirely within the word [parole] proferred by his destiny, makes actual the conjunction of death and life. He lives a life which is dead, which is that death which is precisely there under life. That is also where Freud's lengthy text leads us, where he tells us – Don't believe that life is an exalting goddess who has arisen to culminate in that most beautiful of forms, that there is the slightest power of achievement and progress in life. Life is a blister, a mould, characterised – as others besides Freud have written – by nothing beyond its aptitude for death.

That is what life is – a detour, a dogged detour, in itself transitory and precarious, and deprived of any significance. Why, in that of its manifestations called man, does something happen, which insists throughout this life, which is called a meaning? We call it human, but are we so sure? Is this meaning as human as all that? A meaning is an order, that is to say, a sudden emergence. A meaning is an order which suddenly emerges. A life insists on entering into it, but it expresses something which is perhaps completely beyond this life, since when we get to the root of this life, behind the drama of the passage into existence, we find nothing besides life conjoined to death. That is where the Freudian dialectic leads us.

Up to a certain point, Freudian theory may seem to explain everything, including what's related to death, within the framework of a closed libidinal economy, regulated by the pleasure principle and a return to equilibrium, involving specific relations between objects. The merging of the libido with activities which on the surface are at odds with it, aggressivity for instance, is put down to imaginary identification. Instead of beating up the other confronting him, the subject identifies himself, and turns against himself this gentle aggressivity, which is thought of as a libidinal object relation, and is founded upon what are called the instincts of the ego, that is to say the need for order and harmony. After all, one must eat – when the pantry is empty, one tucks into one's fellow being [semblable]. The libidinal adventure is here objectified in the order of living things, and one assumes that the behaviour of subjects, their inter-aggressivity, is conditioned and capable of explication by a desire which is fundamentally adequate to its object.

The significance of Beyond the Pleasure Principle is that that isn't enough. Masochism is not inverted sadism, the phenomenon of aggressivity isn't to be explained simply on the level of imaginary identification. What Freud's primary masochism teaches us is that, when life has been dispossessed of its speech, its final word can only be the final malediction expressed at the end of Oedipus at Colonus. Life doesn't want to be healed. The negative therapeutic reaction is fundamental to it. Anyway, what is healing? The realisation of the subject through a speech which comes from elsewhere, traversing it.

This life we're captive of, this essentially alienated life, ex-sisting, this life in the other, is as such joined to death, it always returns to death, and is only drawn into increasingly large and more roundabout circuits by what Freud calls the elements of the external world.

All that life is concerned with is seeking repose as much as possible while awaiting death. That is what devours the time of the suckling baby at the beginning of its existence, with hourly segments which allow him just to take a peep from time to time. You have to try bloody hard to draw him out of this for him to find the rhythm by which we get attuned to the world. If the nameless desire can appear at the level of the desire to sleep, which you mentioned the other day, Valabrega, that's because it is in an intermediary state – dozing off is the most natural of all vital states. Life is concerned solely with dying – To die, to sleep, perchance to dream, as a certain gentleman put it, just when what was at issue was exactly that – to be or not to be.[7]

This to be or not to be[7] is an entirely verbal story. A very funny comedian tried showing how Shakespeare came upon it, scratching his head – to be or not . . ., and he would start again – to be or not . . . to be. If that's funny, that's because this moment is when the entire dimension of language comes into focus. The dream and the joke emerge on the same level.

Take this sentence, which is obviously not very funny – The greatest boon is not to be.[8] It is quite striking to realise that for the greatest tragedian of Antiquity, this was to be found in a religious ceremony. Can you imagine that being said during mass! The comics took it upon themselves to make us laugh at it. It would be better not to be born – Unfortunately, replies the other, that happens to scarcely one in a hundred thousand.[9]

Why is this witty?

To begin with, because it plays on words, an indispensable technical element. It would be better not to be born. Of course! This means that here there's an unthinkable unity, about which absolutely nothing can be said before it comes into existence, from which time it may indeed insist, but one could imagine it not insisting, so that everything passes into the universal rest and silence of the stars, as Pascal puts it. That is true enough, it may be so at the moment when one says it, it would be better not to be born. What is ridiculous is [8] The French version of the Greek that Lacan uses is, literally translated: 'It would be better not to be born.' Without the reference to birth, the connection with the joke cited by Freud that follows is lost. [9] See (1905c) GW VI 60; Stud IV 57–8; SE VIII 57.

[7] English in the original.

saying it, and entering into the order of the calculus of probabilities. Wit is only wit because it is close enough to our existence to cancel it with laughter. The phenomena of the dream, of the psychopathology of everyday life, of the joke are to be found in this zone.

You must read Jokes and their Relation to the Unconscious. Freud's rigour is stupefying, but he doesn't quite give the last word, namely that everything relating to wit takes place on the vacillating level of speech. If it weren't there, nothing would exist.

Take the silliest story, the man in a bakery, who pretends he's got nothing to pay for – he held out his hand and asked for a cake, he gives the cake back and asks for a glass of liqueur, drinks it, he's asked to pay for the glass of liqueur and he replies – But I gave you the cake in exchange for it. – But you haven't paid for the cake either – But I hadn't eaten it.[10] There was an exchange. But how did the exchange begin? At some point, something must have entered the circle of exchange. So the exchange must have already been set up. That is to say that when all is said and done, one is always left paying for the small glass of liqueur with a cake one hasn't paid for.

The absolutely sublime marriage-broker stories are also funny for the same reason. 'The one you introduced me to has an unbearable mother.' – 'Listen, you're marrying the daughter, not the mother.' – 'But she isn't exactly pretty, nor a spring chicken.' – 'She'll be all the more faithful for it.' – 'But she hasn't got much money.' – 'You can't expect everything.'[11] And so on. The conjoiner, the marriage-broker, conjoins on a completely different plane than that of reality, since the plane of an engagement, of love, has nothing to do with reality. By definition, the marriage-broker, paid to deceive, can never fall into crass realities.

Desire always becomes manifest at the joint of speech, where it makes its appearance, its sudden emergence, its surge forwards. Desire emerges just as it becomes embodied in speech, it emerges with symbolism.

To be sure, symbolism links up a certain number of these natural signs, of these loci, which captivate the human being. There is even the beginnings of symbolism in the instinctual capture of one animal by another. But that isn't what constitutes symbolism, it's the symbolising Merken which make what doesn't exist exist. You mark the six sides of a die, you roll the die – from this rolling die emerges desire. I am not saying human desire, for, after all, the man who plays with the die is captive to the desire thus put into play. He doesn't know the origin of his desire, as it rolls with the symbol written on its six sides.

Why is it only man who plays dice? Why don't the planets speak?

Questions I'll leave open for today.

WHY ONE TRAINS ANALYSTS

Last time, I left you with a somewhat strange question, but one which came directly out of what I was saying to you – why don't the planets speak?

1

We aren't at all like planets, that's something we can have a sense of whenever we want, but that doesn't prevent us from forgetting it. We always have a tendency to reason about men as if they were moons, calculating their masses, their gravitation.

That isn't an illusion peculiar to us, us scientists [savants] – it is quite especially tempting for politicians.

I am thinking of a work which has been forgotten, though it wasn't that unreadable, because it probably wasn't written by the author who signed it – it had the title Mein Kampf. Well, in this work by the said Hitler, which has lost a great deal of its topicality, relations between men are spoken of as being like relations between moons. And there's always the temptation to construct a psychology and a psychoanalysis of moons, whereas all you need do to see the difference is refer directly to experience.

For instance, I am rarely altogether happy. Last time, I wasn't at all happy, no doubt because I tried to fly too high – I wouldn't have engaged in all that flapping of wings if everything had been well prepared. However, several kind people, those who accompany me to the door, told me that everybody was happy. Rather an exaggeration of the position, I imagine. No matter, that's what I was told. Moreover, at the time I wasn't convinced. But why not! So I said to myself – if the others are happy, that's the main thing. That's where I am different from a planet.

[1] 'remembrement', which does not have connotations of memory in French, and, in fact, is often translated as 'regrouping'; the passage in the Seminar being referred to discusses the reaggregation of the limbs (cf. 'dismembering').

It isn't simply that I said that to myself, but that it is true – if you're happy, that's the most important thing. I would even say – given that I've been reassured that you were happy, well then, good Lord, I become happy as well. But, even so, with a little margin. Not exactly happy-happy. There was a space between the two. During the time it took me to realise that the main thing is that the other be happy, I persisted in my non-happiness.

So when am I really me then? When I'm not happy, or when I'm happy because the others are happy? This relation of the subject's satisfaction with the satisfaction of the other – to be understood, please, in its most radical form – is always at issue where man is concerned.

I would very much appreciate it if the fact that on this occasion I was dealing with my fellow beings doesn't fool you. I used this example, because I had promised myself to use the first example that came up after the question I left you with last time. But I hope that today I will get you to see that it would be wrong of you to think that it's the same other at issue here as that other I sometimes talk about to you, that other which is the ego, or more precisely its image. Here there's a radical difference between my non-satisfaction and the supposed satisfaction of the other. There is no image of identity, of reflexivity, but a relation of fundamental alterity.

We must distinguish two others, at least two – an other with a capital O, and an other with a small o, which is the ego. In the function of speech, we are concerned with the Other.

What I am saying is worth demonstrating. As always, I can only do so in terms of our experience. To those who would like to have some practice at some mental juggling which is bound to render their articulations more supple, I can't recommend too highly, for whatever use you may wish to put it, reading Parmenides, where the question of the one and the other was addressed in the most vigorous and single-minded way. That is no doubt why it is one of the most misunderstood of all works. When, after all, all it takes are the middling abilities – which should not be belittled – of a solver of crossword puzzles. Don't forget that in one of my written pieces, I formally recommended you to do crossword puzzles. The only thing which is essential is to hold your attention right to the end in developing the nine hypotheses. That's all that matters – paying attention. It is the most difficult thing in the world to get the average reader to do, as a result of the conditions under which the sport of reading is carried out. Those of my students who could devote themselves to a psychoanalytic commentary on the Parmenides would be doing something useful, and would allow the community to find its bearings in relation to a good many problems.

Let us come back to our planets. Why don't they speak? Who wants to articulate something?

All the same there are lots of things to say. What is odd is not that you don't say any of them, but rather that you don't make it apparent that you realise that there's loads to say. If only you would dare to think it. It isn't very important to know what is the clinching reason. But what is certain, is that if one tries to enumerate them – I had no preconceived idea about the way they might be set out when I asked you it – the reasons which come to mind are structured like those we have already encountered on several occasions at play in Freud's work, namely those he comes up with in the dream of Irma's injection apropos of the kettle with a hole in it. The planets don't speak – firstly, because they have nothing to say – secondly, because they don't have the time – thirdly, because they have been silenced.

Each of these three things is true, and might permit us to make important statements with respect to what is called a planet, that is to say what I've taken as my term of reference in showing what we aren't.

I put the question to an eminent philosopher, one of our lecturers this year. He has been much preoccupied with the history of science and has made the most apt comments, the most profound there are, about Newtonianism. You always come away disappointed when you ask people who seem to be specialists, but you are going to see that, in actual fact, I wasn't disappointed. The question didn't seem to him to present any difficulties. He answered – Because they don't have mouths.

At first blush, I was a bit disappointed. When one is disappointed, one is always wrong. You should never be disappointed with the answers you receive, because if you are, that's wonderful, it proves that it was a real answer, that is to say exactly what you weren't expecting.

This point has considerable bearing on the question of the other. We have too great a tendency to be hypnotised by the so-called system of moons, and to model our idea of the answer on what we imagine when we talk about stimulus-response. If we receive the answer we were expecting, is it really an answer? That's another problem, and I won't get involved in that little diversion right now.

In the end, the philosopher's answer didn't disappoint me. No one is obliged to enter into the labyrinth of the question along the path mapped out by any one of the three reasons I mentioned, although we will encounter them again, for they are the true ones. One can enter into it just as well with any old answer, and the one I was given is extremely illuminating, on condition that one knows how to hear it. And I was in a very good position to listen to it, since I am a psychiatrist.

I don't have a mouth, we hear this when we're starting our careers, on the first psychiatric wards we, like lost souls, arrive on. At the heart of this miraculous world, we encounter very old ladies, very old spinsters, and the first thing they tell us is – I don't have a mouth. They inform us that they don't have a stomach either, and what is more that they will never die. In short, they have a very close relationship to the lunar world. The only difference is that for these old ladies, victims of the so-called Cotard syndrome, or negation delirium, in the end that's true. What they have identified with is an image where every gap, every aspiration, every emptiness of desire is lacking, namely whatever it is that really constitutes the property of the buccal orifice. To the extent that the being's identification with its pure and simple image takes effect, there isn't any room for change either, that is to say death. That in fact is what their theme is – they are both dead and incapable of dying, immortal – like desire. To the extent that the subject here symbolically identifies himself with the imaginary, he in some way satisfies [réalise] desire.

The fact that the stars also happen not to have mouths and to be immortal pertains to another order – one can't say that it is true – it's real. There is no question of the stars having mouths. And, at least for us, the word immortal has over time become purely metaphorical. It is incontestably real that a star doesn't have a mouth, but no one would think of that, in the true sense of the word to think, if there weren't beings endowed with an apparatus for giving utterance to the symbolic, namely men, so as to make one notice it.

Stars are real, integrally real, in principle, there is absolutely nothing about them pertaining to an alterity with respect to themselves, they are purely and simply what they are. The fact that we always find them in the same place is one of the reasons why they don't speak.

You've noticed that from time to time I oscillate between planets and stars. It isn't by accident. For it wasn't the planets which manifested the always in the same place first, but the stars. The perfectly regular movement of the sidereal day is clearly what gave men their first opportunity of sensing the stability of the changing world surrounding them, and of starting to found the dialectic of the symbolic and the real, in which the symbolic apparently springs out from the real, which naturally isn't any more well-founded than thinking that the so-called fixed stars really revolve around the Earth. Similarly, one shouldn't think that symbols actually have come from the real. But it is nonetheless striking seeing how captivating these singular forms have been, whose grouping, after all, is not founded on anything. Why did human beings see the Great Bear that way? Why are the Pleiades so obvious? Why is Orion seen this way? I couldn't tell you if I tried. I am not aware that these points of light have even been grouped any differently – I'm asking you. In the dawn of humanity, which, incidentally, we cannot make out very clearly, this fact played quite a role. These signs have been tenaciously preserved to the present day, offering a rather bizarre example of the way in which the symbolic gets hitched up. The famous properties of form do not seem to provide an absolutely convincing explanation of the way in which we have grouped the constellations.

That said, we might have spared ourselves the trouble, since there is no foundation for this apparent stability of the stars we always find in the same place. Clearly we made genuine progress when we realised that there were, on the other hand, things which really were in the same place, which were first perceived as wandering planets, and when we realised that it wasn't just as a function of our own rotation, but really, that some of the stars which fill the sky move and are always to be found in the same place.

This reality is a first reason why the planets do not speak much. Nevertheless, one would be wrong to suppose that they are as dumb as all that. They are so far removed from that that for a long time they were confused with natural symbols. We made them talk, and it would be wrong not to ask ourselves the question as to how that happened. For a very long time, and until rather recently, they retained a sort of subjective existence. Copernicus, who had nonetheless taken a decisive step in specifying the perfect regularity of the movement of the stars, still thought that an earthly body on the moon would make every effort to return home, that is to say to Earth, and that conversely a lunar body would not rest until it had flown back to its maternal home. That gives you an idea of how long these notions have persisted, and how difficult it is not to make beings out of realities.

At last Newton arrived. That had been in the making for some time – there is no better example than the history of science for showing you the extent to which human discourse is universal. Newton ended up stating the definitive formula which the world had been on the edge of for a century. Newton did definitively succeed in getting them to shut up. The eternal silence of infinite spaces, which petrified Pascal, is taken for granted after Newton – the stars do not speak, planets are dumb, and that's because they are silenced, which is the only real reason, for in the end you never really know what can happen with a reality.

Why don't planets speak? That is a real question. You only know what can happen to a reality once you have definitively reduced it to being inscribed in a language. We only became absolutely certain that the planets do not speak once they'd been shut up, that is to say once Newtonian theory had produced the theory of the unified field, in a form which has since been completed, a form which was already entirely satisfactory to every thinker. The theory of the unified field is summed up in the law of gravitation, which consists essentially in the fact that there's a formula which holds all this together, in an ultra-simple language consisting of three letters.

At the time, thinkers came up with all kinds of objections – this gravitation is unthinkable, we've never seen the like of this action at a distance, across a void, every kind of action is by definition an action of things in contact with one another. If you knew how hard Newtonian motion is to get hold of when examined up close! You would realise that operating with contradictory notions isn't the exclusive privilege of psychoanalysis. Newtonian motion makes use of time, but no one worries about the time of physics, because it doesn't in the slightest touch on realities – it's a question of proper language, and the unified field cannot be considered as anything more than a well-made language, than a syntax.

There's no cause to worry from that quarter – everything which enters into the unified field will never speak again, because these are realities which have been totally reduced to language. Here I think you can clearly see the opposition between speech and language.

Don't get the idea that our posture with respect to all the realities has attained a point of definite reduction, which is nonetheless rather satisfying – if planets and other things of the same order spoke, it would make a funny kind of discussion, and Pascal's fright might well be transformed into terror.

In fact, each time we deal with a residue of action, of truly authentic action, with this something new which emerges from the subject – this doesn't require that the subject be animated – we are confronted by something of which only our unconscious is not afraid. For at the level on which physics is currently moving, it would be wrong to imagine that it's all wrapped up, and that the atom and the electron have been silenced. Not at all. And it is obvious that we aren't here to go along with the musings about freedom to which people are wont to abandon themselves.

That is not at all what is at issue. It is clear that it's in relation to language that something funny happens. That is what Heisenberg's principle comes down to. When one is in a position to determine one of the properties of the system, one cannot formulate the others. When one speaks of the location of electrons, when one tells them to stay put somewhere, to remain always in the same place, one loses all sense of what is commonly called their velocity. Conversely, if one tells them – well then, alright, you must always move in the same way – one no longer has any idea where they are. I am not saying that we will always be in this eminently ludicrous position. But until things change, we can say that the elements don't answer where one asks them. More precisely, if one asks them somewhere, it is impossible to grasp them as a whole.

The question of knowing whether they speak isn't settled solely by their not answering. That's unsettling – one day, something may take us unawares. Let us not slide into mysticism – I'm not about to tell you that atoms and electrons speak. But why not? Everything happens as if. In any case, the matter would be settled the moment they started to lie to us. If atoms lied to us, tried to outwit us, we would be convinced, and quite rightly. There you've got your finger on the nub of the matter – the others as such, and not only in so far as they reflect our a priori categories and the more or less transcendental forms of our intuition.

These are things which we would prefer not to think about – if one day they started to get at us, you'd see where we'd end up. We wouldn't know where we were, quite literally, and that is indeed what Einstein thought all along and he never ceased to marvel at it. He always reminded people that the Almighty is a crafty one, but certainly not dishonest. Moreover, because it is a question here of a non-physical Almighty, that's the only thing which allows one to do science, that is to say, in the end reduce the Almighty to silence.

When it comes to this human science par excellence called psychoanalysis, is our aim to arrive at a unified field, and to turn men into moons? Do we get them to speak so much only so as to shut them up?

Besides, the most correct interpretation of the end of history invoked by Hegel is that it is the moment when all that men will have left to do is to close it. Is this a return to animal life? Are men who have reached the point of no longer needing language animals? An important question which seems to me to have received no meaningful answer. Whatever the case may be, the question of knowing what is the end of our practice is at the heart of analytic technique. Some disgraceful mistakes have been committed in this respect.

For the first time, I've read a very congenial article on what is called the typical cure. The necessity of maintaining the ego's capacity for observation intact, I see this written in bold letters. There's talk of a mirror, the analyst – that's not bad, but the author wants this mirror alive. A live mirror, I wonder what that is. Poor fellow, he talks about a living mirror because he clearly senses that there is something not quite right in this story. What's the essential thing in analysis? Does analysis consist in the imaginary realisation of the subject? The ego gets confused with the subject, and the ego is turned into a reality, something which, as they say, integrates, that is, which holds the planet together.

If this planet doesn't speak, it is not only because it is real, but because it doesn't have the time, in the literal sense – it doesn't have this dimension. Why? Because it is round. That's what integration is – whatever a circular form does, it is always equal to itself. What is advanced as being the aim of analysis is to make it well-rounded, this ego, to give it the spherical shape in which it will have definitively integrated all its disjointed fragmentary states, its scattered limbs, its pregenital phases, its partial drives, the pandemonium of its egos, countless and broken up as they are. A race to the triumphant ego – as many objects as egos.

It's not at all the case that everyone means the same thing by the term object relation, but by approaching things by way of the object relation and the partial drives, instead of locating it where it belongs, on the plane of the imaginary, the author I'm talking about, who for a time seemed to have got off to a good start, ends up with nothing less than the following perversion, which consists in locating the entire development of analysis in the imaginary relation of the subject to its most primitive diversity. Thank God, the experiment is never pushed to the limit, one doesn't do what one says one is doing, one stays well this side of one's goals. Thank God, his cures fail, and that is why the subject survives it.

Following the line the author I've just spoken of espoused, one can give an entirely rigorous demonstration of the fact that his way of conceiving of the cure of obsessional neurosis will have no other result than that of making the subject paranoid. What seems to him the abyss one constantly skirts around in the cure of obsessional neurosis is the appearance of psychosis. In other words, according to the author in question, the obsessional neurotic is in fact a madman.

Let us dot the i's and cross the t's – what is this madman? He's a madman who keeps his distance from his madness, that is to say from the greatest imaginary perturbation there can be. He's a paranoid madman. To say that madness is the greatest imaginary perturbation as such doesn't define every kind of madness – I'm referring to states of delirium and paranoia. According to the author I'm reading, everything the obsessional says has got nothing to do with his experience. It is through verbal conformity, social language, that he maintains his precarious equilibrium – which is nonetheless very stable, for what could be harder than to catch out an obsessional? And if the obsessional does indeed resist and digs his heels in so vigorously, that's because, according to what the author I'm referring to has to say, psychosis, the imaginary disintegration of the ego, is behind all this. Unfortunately for his argument, the author cannot show us an obsessional whom he has truly sent round the bend. There's no possibility of doing that – and there are very good reasons why. But in wanting to guard the subject from his so-called menacing madnesses, he would succeed in ending up not that far from there.

Post-analytical paranoia is a long way from being a mythical problem. You don't have to have pushed the treatment very far for it to give rise to a perfectly consistent paranoia. I've actually seen that on this ward. This is the ward where you can see it most clearly, because there's a tendency to shift them gradually on to open wards, from which they often return, and integrate themselves into a closed ward. It happens. You don't need a very good psychoanalyst to get this to come about, it's sufficient to believe very fervently in psychoanalysis. I have seen paranoias one can call post-analytical, and which can be said to be spontaneous. In an adequate environment, where there's a very strong preoccupation with psychological facts, a subject can succeed, on condition nonetheless of having some inclination for it, in girdling himself with problems which without any doubt are fictive, but to which he gives substance, within a ready-made language – that of psychoanalysis, which everyone talks about. It generally takes a very long time for a chronic delirium to get built up, the subject must put a lot into it – generally, he invests a third of his life in it. I must say that, to some extent, the analytic literature constitutes a ready-made[2] delirium, and it isn't rare to see subjects dressed up in it, ready-to-wear. The style, if I may put it like this, of those silent devotees of the ineffable mystery of the analytic experience, is an attenuated form of it, but its foundation is homogeneous with what for now I am calling paranoia.

Today I would like to suggest a little schema to you, to illustrate the problems raised by the ego and the other, language and speech.

This schema would not be a schema if it yielded a solution. It isn't even a model. It's just a way of fixing our ideas, called for by an infirmity in our discursive capacity.

Because I think that you are already quite familiar with it, I haven't gone over what distinguishes the imaginary from the symbolic once again.

What do we know about the ego? Is the ego real, is it a moon, or is it an imaginary construction? We start with the idea, with which I've serenaded you for a long time, that there is no way of grasping anything whatsoever of the analytic dialectic if we do not assume that the ego is an imaginary construction. The fact that it is imaginary doesn't take anything away from it, the poor ego – I would even go so far as to say that that's what's good about it. If it weren't imaginary, we wouldn't be men, we would be moons. Which doesn't mean that all it takes to be men is to have this imaginary ego. We could still be that in-between thing called a madman. A madman is precisely someone who adheres to the imaginary, purely and simply.

This is what I'm talking about.

S is the letter S, but it's also the subject, the analytic subject, that is to say not the subject in its totality. People spend their time plaguing us about taking it in its totality. Why should it be a whole? We haven't the faintest idea. Have you ever encountered whole beings? Perhaps it's an ideal. I've never seen any. I'm not whole. Neither are you. If we were whole, we would each be in our corners, whole, we wouldn't be here, together, trying to get ourselves into shape, as they say. It is the subject, not in its totality, but in its opening up. As usual, he doesn't know what he's saying. If he knew what he was saying, he wouldn't be there. He is there, down on the right.

To be sure, that isn't where he sees himself – that is never the case – even at the end of analysis. He sees himself in a, and that is why he has an ego. He may believe that this ego is him, everybody is at that stage, and there is no way of getting out of it.

What analysis teaches us, on the other hand, is that the ego is an absolutely fundamental form for the constitution of objects. In particular, it perceives what we call, for structural reasons, its fellow being, in the form of the specular other. This form of the other has a very close relation to the ego, which can be superimposed on it, and we write it as a'.

So there's the plane of the mirror, the symmetrical world of the egos and of the homogeneous others. We'll have to distinguish another level, which we call the wall of language.

The imaginary gains its false reality, which nonetheless is a verified reality, starting off from the order defined by the wall of language. The ego such as we understand it, the other, the fellow being, all these imaginary things are objects. To be sure, they aren't homogeneous with moons – and we are liable to forget that all the time. But they are indeed objects, because they are named as such within an organised system, that of the wall of language.

When the subject talks to his fellow beings, he uses ordinary language, which holds the imaginary egos to be things which are not simply ex-sisting, but real. Not knowing what there is in the domain in which the concrete dialogue is held, he is dealing with a certain number of characters, a'. a''. In so far as the subject brings them into relation with his own image, those with whom he speaks are also those with whom he identifies.

That said, we, the analysts, must not overlook our basic assumption – we think there are subjects other than us, that authentically intersubjective relations exist. We would have no reason to think that if we didn't have the testimony of the characterising feature of intersubjectivity, that is, that the subject can lie to us. That is the decisive proof. I am not saying that that is the sole foundation of the reality of the other subject, it is its proof. In other words, we in fact address A_1, A_2, those we do not know, true Others, true subjects.

They are on the other side of the wall of language, there where in principle I never reach them. Fundamentally, it is them I'm aiming at every time I utter true speech, but I always attain a', a'', through reflection. I always aim at true subjects, and I have to be content with shadows. The subject is separated from the Others, the true ones, by the wall of language.

If speech is founded in the existence of the Other, the true one, language is so made as to return us to the objectified other, to the other whom we can make what we want of, including thinking that he is an object, that is to say that he doesn't know what he's saying. When we use language, our relation with the other always plays on this ambiguity. In other words, language is as much there to found us in the Other as to drastically prevent us from understanding him. And that is indeed what is at stake in the analytic experience.

The subject doesn't know what he is saying, and for the best of reasons, because he doesn't know what he is. But he sees himself. He sees himself from the other side, in an imperfect manner, as you know, as a consequence of the fundamentally incomplete nature of the specular Urbild, which is not only imaginary, but illusory. The perverted inflection which analytic technique has been acquiring for some time is founded on this fact. Within this perspective, one would like the subject to aggregate all the more or less fragmented, fragmentary pieces of this thing in which he fails to recognise himself [se méconnaît]. One wants him in effect to gather everything which he experienced in the pregenital stage, his scattered limbs, his partial drives, the succession of partial objects – think of Carpaccio's Saint George skewering the dragon, with small severed heads, arms, and so on, all around. One wants to allow this ego to gather its strength, to realise itself, to integrate itself–the dear little thing. If this end is pursued in a direct fashion, if one focuses on the imaginary and the pregenital, one necessarily ends up in that sort of analysis in which the consummation of partial objects is achieved through the intermediary of the image of the other. Without knowing why, the authors who follow this path all end up with the same conclusion – the ego can only re-encounter and reconstitute itself by way of the fellow being the subject has before him – or behind him, the result is the same.

The subject reconcentrates his own imaginary ego essentially in the form of the analyst's ego. Besides, this ego doesn't remain simply imaginary, for the spoken intervention of the analyst is expressly conceived of as an encounter of ego with ego, as a projection by the analyst of precise objects. In this perspective, the analysis is always represented and planned on the plane of objectivity. What is at issue, as it's written up, is to get the subject to shift from a psychic reality to a true reality, that is to say a moon reconstituted in the imaginary, and very precisely, something also not hidden from us, on the model of the ego of the analyst. This account is sufficiently coherent to realise that it isn't a matter of being indoctrinated, nor of showing what one should be doing in the world. It is clearly on the imaginary level that one is operating. That is why nothing would be more appreciated than locating the ineffable experience beyond what is considered to be the illusion, and not the wall, of language.

Amongst several clinical examples to hand, there's a very pretty vignette, that of the patient terrorised by the thought that the analyst knows what she has in her suitcase. She both knows it and she doesn't. Everything she manages to say is neglected by the analyst from the perspective of this imaginary worry. And all of a sudden, you realise that that is the only thing of importance – she is afraid that the analyst will take away everything she has got in her belly, that is to say the contents of the suitcase, which symbolises her partial object.

The notion of the imaginary assumption of partial objects through the intermediary of the figure of the analyst leads to a kind of Comulgatorio, to use the title which Balthasar Gracián gave to a Treatise on the Holy Eucharist, leads to an imaginary consummation of the analyst. A strange communion – at the stall, a head with parsley stuffed up its nose, or again with a well-cut piece in his pants, and as Apollinaire said in The Breasts of Tiresias – Eat the feet of your analyst in the same sauce, that's the fundamental theory of analysis.

Isn't there another conception of analysis, which allows one to conclude that it is something other than the reconstitution of a fundamental imaginary partialisation of the subject?

This partialisation does in fact exist. It is one of the dimensions which enable the analyst to operate through identification, by giving the subject his own ego. I'll spare you the details, but it is certain that the analyst can, by means of a specific interpretation of the resistances, by a specific reduction of the total experience of the analysis to its solely imaginary elements, succeed in projecting on to the patient the different characteristics of his analytical ego – and God knows they can differ, in a way which comes clear at the end of analyses. What Freud taught us is exactly the opposite.

One trains analysts so that there are subjects in whom the ego is absent. That is the ideal of analysis, which, of course, remains virtual. There is never a subject without an ego, a fully realised subject, but that in fact is what one must aim to obtain from the subject in analysis.

The analysis must aim at the passage of true speech, joining the subject to an other subject, on the other side of the wall of language. That is the final relation of the subject to a genuine Other, to the Other who gives the answer one doesn't expect, which defines the terminal point of the analysis.

Throughout the course of the analysis, on the sole condition that the ego of the analyst does agree not to be there, on the sole condition that the analyst is not a living mirror, but an empty mirror, what happens happens between the ego of the subject – it is always the ego of the subject which speaks, ostensibly – and the others. The entire development of the analysis consists in the progressive displacement of this relation, which the subject can grasp at any moment, beyond the wall of language, as being the transference, which is his and in which he doesn't recognise himself. It isn't a matter of reducing this relation, as you'll find it written, but of having the subject assume it where he is. The analysis consists in getting him to become conscious of his relations, not with the ego of the analyst, but with all these Others who are his true interlocutors, whom he hasn't recognised. It is a matter of the subject progressively discovering which Other he is truly addressing, without knowing it, and of him progressively assuming the relations of transference at the place where he is, and where at first he didn't know he was.

There are two meanings to be given to Freud's phrase – Wo Es war, soll Ich werden. This Es, take it as the letter S. It is there, it is always there. It is the subject. He knows himself or he doesn't know himself. That isn't even the most important thing – he speaks or he doesn't speak. At the end of the analysis, it is him who must be called on to speak, and to enter into relation with the real Others. Where the S was, there the Ich should be.

That is where the subject authentically re-integrates his disjointed limbs, and recognises, reaggregates his experience.

In the course of an analysis, something like an object may be formed. But this object, far from being what is at issue, is only a fundamentally alienated form of it. It is the imaginary ego which gives it its centre and its group, and it is clearly identifiable with a form of alienation, akin to paranoia. That the subject ends up believing in the ego is in itself madness. Thank God, analysis very rarely succeeds in that, but we have a thousand proofs that it is being pushed in that direction.

This will be our programme for next year – what does paranoia mean? What does schizophrenia mean? Paranoia, as compared with schizophrenia, always has a relation to the imaginary alienation of the ego.

Objectified analysis

A CRITIQUE OF FAIRBAIRN
IN ANALYSIS, WHY DOES ONE SPEAK?
THE IMAGINARY ECONOMY AND THE SYMBOLIC REGISTER
THE IRRATIONAL NUMBER

The schema I gave you last time assumes that speech is propagated like light, in a straight line. That shows you the extent to which it is only metaphorical, analogical.

What interferes with the wall of language is the specular relation, whereby what pertains to the ego is always perceived, appropriated, via the intermediary of an other, who for the subject always retains the properties of the Urbild, of the fundamental image of the ego. Hence the misapprehensions [méconnaissances] thanks to which misunderstandings no less than ordinary communication – which itself rests on the said misunderstandings – become established.

This schema has more than one property, as I have shown you in teaching you how to transform it. I have also pointed out to you that the attitude of the analyst may vary considerably, and bring into the analysis diverse, even opposed, consequences.

We've come up against it, or we've come to the crossroads – in analysis, what takes place, depending on whether one assumes the speech relation to be the matrix or, on the contrary, whether one objectifies the analytic situation? According to the authors, and the practitioners, every objectivation, with varying intensity, turns the analysis into a process of remodelling of the ego, on the model of the ego of the analyst.

This criticism takes on all its significance if one is aware of the fundamentally specular, alienated character of the ego. Every kind of ego rendered present as such renders an imaginary function present, if only the ego of the analyst – an ego is always an ego, however perfected it may be.

Certainly, analysis has taken these paths for a good reason. Freud did in fact reintegrate the ego. But was that in order to recentre analysis on the object and on object relations?

Today the object relation is what is on the agenda. I've told you how central it was to all the ambiguities which now make it so difficult to recapture the meaning of the last segments of Freud's work, and to relocate recent technical investigations within the framework of the often forgotten meaning of analysis.

What I teach you here are fundamental alphabetical notions, it is a compass-card, a panoramic table, rather than a complete cartography of the present problems of analysis. This assumes that, armed with this panoramic table, you should try to make your own way using the map, and put my teaching to the test with an extensive reading of Freud's work.

One hears so and so saying that the theory I'm proposing to you here doesn't coincide with what can be found in such and such a text of Freud's. I could easily reply that, in all truth, before broaching the text, one has to comprehend the whole. The ego appears in several places in Freud's work. Someone who hasn't studied the ego in On Narcissism: an Introduction cannot follow what Freud says about it in Das Ich und das Es, which refers the ego to the perceptual-consciousness system.

Even within the topographical argument of Das Ich und das Es, you cannot do full justice to a definition like this one, which makes the ego equivalent to the system of perception-consciousness, by isolating it. This equation cannot pass for a definition. Isolated, it is simply a convention or a tautology.

If it is just to end up with a schema which can support a thousand interpretations – I am talking about this famous schema of the egg, which has had such a hypnotic effect throughout analysis, in which the ego is seen as a kind of lentil, a germinating point, a differentiated part, organised by the mass of the id, whereby the relation is tied to reality – in truth there was no need for the immense detour of Freud's work. Besides, the important thing about this schema is that the ego's organisation is dependent on something completely heterogeneous to it from the point of view of organisation.

The danger with any schema, and especially with any schema which reifies too much, is that the mind immediately falls on it and sees in it only the most summary of images.

Last time, I picked a reference from close to home. Today I've picked an Englishman, or rather a Scotsman, with the name of Fairbairn, who tried, not without a certain rigour, to reformulate the whole of analytic theory in terms of object relations. You'll find this reading accessible – his article, 'Endopsychic structure considered in terms of object-relationships', appeared in volume 25 of the International Journal of Psycho-analysis.

The aim is to describe endopsychic structure in terms of object relations. There's a greater interest to this than if it were an author's particular theory. You will recognise the familiar traces of the manner in which we relate cases, in which we give an account of the incidences and the forces of psychic reality, with which we summarise the treatment. The schema he elaborates, his imagery, has some connection with what we cover by the term 'imaginary economy'. You will also see clearly the great risks which analysis runs by sticking to the level of such a conceptualisation.

It would be best to read the whole of the article, to follow its development – each of you do this work on your own. My exposé will give direction to your research, and will, I hope, encourage you to monitor what I am telling you.

Here's the schema which the author arrives at, traced out by the roles in a dream he recounts. Those of you who have just heard a lecture on psychodrama here, which will moreover be revived this evening, will immediately see the family resemblance, which testifies to a degradation of the theory of analysis.[1] One cannot speak about psychodrama without taking sides – this practice has nothing in common with analytic practice.

There are, according to our author, heterogeneities, peculiar asymmetries, in Freudian theory. The whole thing must be renovated, he says. As far as I'm concerned, says Fairbairn, I don't understand any of it – rather than talking about a libido which we don't know how to handle, and which we end up identifying with the drives, which is indeed a way of objectifying it, why not simply talk of the object? The concept of the libido as energy, with which Freud started, has indeed given rise to all kinds of confusions, since it has been identified with the capacity to love.

According to Freud, Fairbairn says in his language, in his tongue, the libido is pleasure-seeking,[2] it seeks pleasure. But we've changed all that, and we've realised that the libido is object-seeking.[2] Besides, Freud did have some idea of it – the author of these lines, like so many people, hasn't realised that Freud talks of love just when he still thinks what's involved is the criticism of the theory of the libido as – do you see the relation with what I said last time? – something which at least raises the problem of its adaptation to objects. In the end, this notion of object-seeking libido pervades everything which follows.

One of the mainsprings, one of the keys of the doctrine which I expound here, is the distinction between the real, the imaginary and the symbolic. I try to get you used to it, to break you into it. This conception allows you to perceive the secret confusion hidden under this notion of object. This notion of object is in fact sustained by the straightforward confusion of these three terms.

Since objects there are, the objects are there always represented by the way in which the subject brings them – that is what you take literally. And when you grasp them objectively, as one says, that is to say without the knowledge of the subject, you represent them to yourselves as objects homogeneous with those which the subject brings you. Lord knows how you will find your way in the midst of all that.

Fairbairn distinguishes the central ego and the libidinal ego. The central ego is more or less the ego as it has always been imagined once the individual organic unity was reified on the psychic level in terms of the idea of its unity, that is to say once the individual's psychic synthesis was taken to be a given tied to the functioning of the apparatuses. Here it is a psychic object, as such closed off from any dialectic, the empirical ego of the classical conception, the object of psychology. One part of this central ego emerges in the conscious and the preconscious – see what a meagre functional value the original references to the conscious and the preconscious are henceforth reduced to. And, of course, the other part of this ego is unconscious – which no one has ever denied, even in the most outdated psychology.

This unconscious part gives us no access whatsoever to a subjective dimension which might be related to repressed significations. That is the concern of another organised ego, the libidinal ego, directed towards objects. The latter, in view of the extreme difficulty of its relations to these objects, has undergone a dissociation, a schize, such that its organisation, which is actually that of an ego, has been forced back into that of an autonomous function, which from now on no longer fits in with the functioning of the central ego.

Here you recognise a conception which easily takes shape in one's mind on first acquaintance with analytic doctrine. It is a vulgarised doctrine. And that is how a number of analysts have now managed to conceive of the process of repression.

But the situation is far from being as simple as that, for the existence of something else has for some time now been discovered in the unconscious, which isn't libidinal, but is aggressivity, which has led to a grand reworking of analytic theory. Freud didn't confuse internal aggressivity with the super-ego. In Fairbairn, we come upon a quite exciting notion, for the author doesn't seem to have found in the English language a term which appeared to him to signify adequately the disruptive, almost demonic, function of the super-ego, so he made one up – the internal[3] saboteur.

If this saboteur is repressed, it is because at the beginning of the development of the individual two peculiarly inconvenient objects are to be found. These two problematic objects have the bizarre property of having initially been one and the same object. It wouldn't surprise you if I told you that, first and last, we're actually dealing with the mother. Everything leads back to the original frustration or non-frustration.

I'm not distorting anything. I ask each one of you to have a look at this exemplary article, exemplary because it makes quite clear what underlies many moderate, more subtle positions.

The essential structure is the primitive schize between the two faces, good and bad, of the first object, that is to say of the feeding mother. Everything else will be only elaboration, ambiguity, homonymy. The Oedipus complex is only superimposed on this primitive structuration, by giving it motifs[4] – in the ornamental sense of the word. Later, the father and the mother share out, in a way which may be quite subtle, the fundamental roles which are written into the primitive division of the object, on the one hand exciting,[5] exciting desire, the libido here being confused with the desire objectified in its conditioning – on the other rejecting.[5]

[3] English in the original.

I don't want to take you too far, but it is clear that exciting[5] and rejecting[5] do not belong on the same level. Basically, 'rejecting'[5] implies a subjectification of the object. On the exclusively objective plane, an object is either frustrating or it isn't. Whereas the notion of rejection secretly introduces the intersubjective relation, non-recognition. That gives you an idea of the confusion to which one is forever liable to succumb, even in discussions like this one.

But I'm not here to correct Fairbairn. I am trying to uncover his intentions and the results of his work for you. He reduces repression down to a tendency to repulsion and he distinguishes the libidinal ego and the internal[5] saboteur, for the best reasons, which are that the two primitive objects, which in reality make up only one, are difficult to handle.

To be sure, it is a fact that the object is a long way from being univocal, and it elicits from the subject the anguish of rejection as well as the continually renewed libidinal incitation, thanks to which this anguish is reactivated. There's no contesting that internalisation of the bad object occurs. As has been remarked, if it is urgent to internalise something, whatever inconvenience may result from that, it is usually this bad object which is picked on, so as to master it, rather than the good one, which is best left outside, where it can exert its beneficent influence. In the wake of the internalisation of the bad object, a process is set in motion whereby the libidinal ego, which is considered too dangerous, reactivating in too acute a fashion the drama which led to the primitive internalisation, will itself be, secondarily, rejected by the central ego.

The latter is the object of a double, a supplementary, repulsion, manifested this time in the form of aggression stemming from the agency, itself repressed, of the internal[5] saboteur, in a close relation to the bad primitive objects.

That's the schema we get to, and as you see, it may well remind us of more than one clinically observed phenomenon in the behaviour of neurotic subjects.

This schema is illustrated by a dream. The subject dreams that she is the object of an act of aggression on the part of a character who turns out to be an actress – the function of the actress plays a special part in her story. The rest of the dream permits the specification on the one hand of the relations of the aggressive character with the mother of the subject, and on the other, the splitting [dédoublement] of the character attacked in the first part of the dream

[4] 'motifs' – meaning both 'motifs' and 'motives', which Lacan then distinguishes.
[5] English in the original.

into two characters, respectively male and female, who change in the way moiré effects do, leaving ambiguous the appearance of a given object. Through a kind of pulsation, one sees the attacked character pass from a feminine to a masculine form, in which the author has no difficulty recognising his exciting object[6] well repressed behind the two others, an inert element which thus finds itself at the foundation of the unconscious psyche, and which the subject's associations allow to identify as her husband, with whom she has undoubtedly difficult relations.

What can be deduced from this schema as regards the action of the analyst? The individual lives in a perfectly defined and stable world, with the objects which are destined to be his. It is thus a matter of getting him to rediscover the path to a normal relation with these objects, which are there, awaiting him.

The difficulty stems from the hidden existence of these objects, which from this point on are called internal objects, which hinder and paralyse the subject. At the beginning, their character was coaptating, they had, if one may say so, a fully-fledged reality. If they then acquired this function, it is because of the momentary impotence of the subject, it is because the subject didn't know how to face the primitive encounter with an object which didn't live up to expectations. I'm not forcing anything, that's what the text says.

The mother, we are told, didn't fulfil her maternal function. One assumes, in effect, that, in her natural function, the mother is in no way a rejecting object – in the state of nature the mother can only be good, and it is on account of the specific conditions under which we live that such an accident can happen. The subject separates itself from a part of itself, abandons the coat of Joseph, rather than be subjected to ambivalent excitations. The drama stems from this ambiguity – the object is both good and bad.

This schema is not all faults. In particular one can show that any valid notion of the ego must in effect put it into correlation with the objects. But to say that the objects are internalised, there's the sleight of hand. The whole point is to know what an internalised object is. Here we try to solve this question by speaking of the imaginary, with all its implications. In particular, the function which the imaginary plays in the biological order is in fact very far from being identical to that of the real.

In Fairbairn, there is no critique of this order. The object is an object. It is taken as a mass. The position chosen to objectify it, namely the beginning of the subject's life, leads to confusion of the imaginary and the real: thus, the imaginary value of the mother is no less great than the value of her real character. But however dominating these two registers may be, there are no grounds for confusing them, as is done here.

The libidinal ego must be integrated, that is to say it must find the objects which are destined for it, and which partake of a double nature, real and imaginary. On the one hand, they are imaginary in so far as they are objects of desire – if there is something which analysis has from the beginning brought to the fore, doubtless it is the fecundity of the libido in the creation of objects corresponding to the stages of its development. On the other hand, these objects are real objects – it is taken for granted that we cannot give them to the individual, that isn't within our power. What's at issue is allowing him to make manifest, in relation to the exciting[7] object, that is to say eliciting the imaginary reaction, the libido whose repression constitutes the knot of his neurosis.

[6] Both words in English in the original.

If we retain a schema like this one, there is in effect only one course. To know which path the analyst must take, one must know where he is in this schema.

Now, take careful note of the following – when the author deduces from the dream the differentiation of this multiplicity of egos, as he puts it, the central[7] ego is nowhere to be seen, he assumes it – the whole scene takes place in this ego, which observes it. If we now move on from the schema of the individual to that of the analytic situation, there's only one place to locate the analyst – precisely in place of the ego who observes. This second interpretation has the advantage of justifying the first. For up until now, in this theory, the ego, in so far as it observes, has none of the active characteristics of the ego. On the other hand, if there's someone who observes, it is the analyst, and it is his function that he projects into this central[7] ego, which he posits in his subject.

The observing analyst is just as much someone who intervenes in the revelation of the function of the repressed object, the correlative of the libidinal ego. The subject manifests the images of his desire, and the analyst is there to enable him to rediscover the appropriate images, with which he can harmonise. Now, the difference between psychic reality and true reality being, as we are told, precisely that psychic reality is subjected to that identification consisting in a relation to images, there is no other measure of the normality of the images than that given by the imaginary world of the analyst.

So any theorisation of analysis organised around the object relation amounts in the end to advocating the recomposition of the subject's imaginary world according to the norm of the analyst's ego. The original introjection of the rejecting object[7], which has poisoned the exciting[7] function of the said object, is corrected by the introjection of a correct ego, that of the analyst.

Why does one talk in analysis? According to this way of looking at things, it's to keep the audience amused. The analyst has to be on the look out, at the limit of the domain of speech, for what captivates the subject, what stops him, makes him jib, inhibits him, scares him. He should objectify the subject in order to rectify him on an imaginary plane which can only be that of the dual relation, that is to say the analyst as model, in the absence of any other system of reference.

Freud was never satisfied with such a schema. If he had wanted to conceptualise analysis in such a way, he would have had no need for a Beyond the Pleasure Principle.

We don't come upon the imaginary economy at the limit of our experience, it isn't an ineffable experience, it's not a question of looking for a better economy of mirages. The imaginary economy has meaning, we gain some purchase on it, only in so far as it is transcribed into the symbolic order, where a ternary relation is imposed. Although Fairbairn's schema is modelled on the dream which illustrates it, the crucial fact is that this dream is recounted by the subject. And experience tells us that this dream isn't dreamt at any old time, any old way, nor is it addressed to no one. The dream has all the value of a direct declaration of the subject. It is in the very fact that he communicates it to you, that he adjudges himself to have this particular inhibited, difficult, attitude, in some cases, or on the contrary one made easier in others, feminine or masculine, etc., that's where the lever of the analysis is to be found. It is not superfluous that he is capable of saying it in speech. From the start, his experience is organised in the symbolic order. The legal order into which he is inducted almost from the beginning gives signification to these imaginary relations, as a function of what I call the unconscious discourse of the subject. Through all this, the subject is trying to say something, and to do so in a language which is virtually offered in order to become speech, that is to say to be communicated. The spoken clarification is the mainspring of progress. The images will take on their meaning in a wider discourse, in which the entire history of the subject is integrated. The subject is as such historicised from one end to the other. This is where the analysis is played out – on the frontier between the symbolic and the imaginary.

The subject doesn't have a dual relation with an object with which he is confronted, it is in relation to another subject that his relations with this object acquire their meaning, and by the same token their value. Inversely, if he has relations with this object, it is because a subject other than himself has relations with this object, and they can both name it, in an order different from that of the real. As soon as it can be named, its presence can be invoked as an original dimension, distinct from reality. Nomination is invocation of presence, and sustaining of presence in absence.

In short, the schema which places the object relation at the heart of the theorisation of analysis misses the mainspring of the analytic experience, namely that the subject gives an account of himself.

The fact that he gives an account of himself is the dynamic mainspring of the analysis. The rents that appear, thanks to which you can go beyond what he is recounting to you, are not an a-side in the discourse, they occur in the text of the discourse. It is in so far as something in the discourse appears to be irrational that you can bring in the images with their symbolic value.

This is the first time that I'm granting that there is something irrational. Don't worry, I take this term in its arithmetical sense. There are numbers which are called irrational, and the first one which comes to mind, however unfamilar you may be with this thing, is $\sqrt{2}$, which brings us back to the Meno, the archway through which we passed to begin the year.

There is no common measure between the square's diagonal and its side. It took a very long time for us to admit that. However small you make it, you won't find it. That is what we call irrational.

Euclid's geometry is precisely founded on this, that one can employ in an equivalent way the two symbolised realities which have no common measure. And it is precisely because they don't have a common measure that one can employ them in an equivalent way. That is what Socrates does in his dialogue with the slave – You have a square, you want to make the square twice as big, what do you have to do?[8] The slave replies that he will make the length twice as long. The point is to get him to understand that if he takes a length twice as long, he will get a square four times the size. And there is no way of making a square twice as big.

But it is neither squares nor diamonds that are being manipulated. Lines are being traced out, that is to say, they are being introduced into reality. That is what Socrates doesn't tell the slave. It is thought that the slave knows everything, all he has to do is recognise it. But on condition that the work's been done for him. The work is in tracing out this line, and in making use of it in a way equivalent to that which is supposed to be given at the start, allegedly real. When it was simply a matter of larger or smaller, of real little squares, whole numbers were introduced. In other words, the images give the appearance of evidence to what is essentially symbolic manipulation. If one finds the solution to the problem, that is to say a square which is twice the size of the first square, it is because one started by destroying the first square as such, by taking a triangle from it, and by reconstituting it with a second square. This assumes a whole field of symbolic assumptions hidden behind the false evidence to which the slave is brought to adhere.

Nothing is less obvious than a space containing in itself its own intuitions. It took a world of surveyors, of practical procedures, preceding the people who discourse so knowledgeably in the agora of Athens, in order that the slave no longer be what he could have been, living on the banks of a great river, in a wild state of nature, in a space of waves and sweeps of sand, on a perpetually shifting, pseudopial beach. A very long time spent learning was needed, learning to fold things on to others, to match up outlines, to begin to conceive of a space structured in an homogeneous way in three dimensions. It's you who introduce these three dimensions, you with your symbolic world.

The incommensurability of the irrational number introduces these first imaginary inert structurations, invigorated, reduced to operations like those which we still find turning up in the first books of Euclid. Remember with what care one generates the isosceles triangle, checks that it hasn't moved, superimposes it upon itself. That's the way one starts geometry, and that's the trace of its umbilical cord. In fact, nothing is more essential to the Euclidian construction than the fact that one turns on to itself something which, in the end, is just a trace – not even a trace, nothing at all. And that is why, when one grasps it, one is so scared of making it perform operations in a space which it isn't ready to confront. In truth, that is how one perceives the extent to which it is the symbolic order which introduces the entire reality that is at issue.

In the same way, the images of our subject are buttoned down [capitonnées] in the text of his history, they are enmeshed in the symbolic order, in which the human subject is inducted into an event which is just as coalescing as you might imagine the original relation to be, which we are forced to admit as being a kind of residue of the real. As soon as the human being experiences this contrasting rhythm scanned by the first wail and its cessation, something is revealed, something which is operative in the symbolic order.

Anyone who's observed a child has seen that the same blow, the same knock, the same slap, isn't received in the same fashion, depending on whether it is punitive or accidental. The symbolic relation is constituted as early as possible, even prior to the fixation of the self image of the subject, prior to the structuring image of the ego, introducing the dimension of the subject into the world, a dimension capable of creating a reality other than that experienced as brute reality, as the encounter of two masses, the collision of two balls. The imaginary experience is inscribed in the register of the symbolic as early on as you can think it. Everything that happens in the order of the object relation is structured as a function of the particular history of the subject, and that is why analysis, and the transference, are possible.

It remains for me to tell you what the function of the ego in analysis correctly centred on the exchange of speech should be. That's what I'll do next time.

If today's session had seemed too arid to you, I will call upon a literary reference, whose connotations are quite striking. The ego is only one object amongst others in the world of objects, in as much as they are symbolised, but on the other hand, it has its own self-evidence, and for the best of reasons. There is a very close relation between ourselves and what we call our ego. In its insertions in the real, it does not at all appear to us in the guise of an image.

If there is something which gives us a demonstration of the mirage-like quality of the ego, in the most problematic of manners, it must be the reality of the double, and what is more, the possibility of the illusion of the double. In short, the imaginary identity of two real objects puts the function of the ego to the test, and that is what will encourage me to open the next seminar with some literary reflections on the character of Sosie.

The latter didn't come into being at the same time as the legend of Amphitryon, but later. Plautus introduced him as a kind of comic double, the Sosie par excellence, of the most magnificent of cuckolds, Amphitryon. This legend was richly embellished in the course of time and the richest version is that of Molière – not the last, though, for there was a German one, in the eighteenth century, of a mystical variety, invoked as a kind of Virgin Mary, and then the marvellous Giraudoux, in which the resonances of pathos go far beyond simple literary virtuosity. Reread all that for next time.

Since today we have studied a small mechanical schema with the happiest of results, it is natural that I should turn to a dramatic model to illustrate the theorisation of analysis in the symbolic register. I will try to show you, in Molière's Amphitryon, what I will call, to parody the title of a recent book, the adventures – the misadventures even – of psychoanalysis.

Sosie[1]

THE HUSBAND, THE WIFE AND THE GOD
THE WOMAN, OBJECT OF EXCHANGE
ME, WHO KICKS YOU OUT[2]
THE SPLITTINGS [DÉDOUBLEMENTS] OF THE OBSESSIONAL

Who's read Amphitryon?

Today we will be concerned with the ego. We are approaching the question of the ego from another angle than the one we adopted last year. Last year, we dealt with it in connection with the phenomenon of transference. This year, we are trying to understand it in relation to the symbolic order.

Man lives in the midst of a world of language, in which that phenomenon called speech occurs. We believe that analysis takes place in this environment. If we don't situate this environment clearly in relation to other environments, which also exist, the real environment, the environment of imaginary mirages, one obliges analysis to deviate either towards interventions bearing on the real – a trap one falls into but rarely – or, on the contrary, by placing in our opinion an unwarranted emphasis on the imaginary. By following this thread of Ariadne we are brought today to Molière's play, Amphitryon.

I made an allusion to Amphitryon in the presence of our visitor, Moreno, when I said to him that it must surely be the case that our wives cheat on us with God from time to time. It is one of those lapidary formulae which one can use in the course of a joust. It deserves a little closer examination.

Surely you must see that the function of the father is only as crucial as it is within the whole of analytic theory because it is to be found on several levels. We have already been able to see, taking the Wolfman, what distinguishes the symbolic father, what I call the name of the father, from the imaginary father, the rival of the real father, in so far as he is endowed, poor man, with all sorts of [1] 'sosie' has come to be a reasonably common synonym for 'double' in French; Robert gives 1638 as the first occasion of this usage, and notes it became widespread in 1668, the year Molière wrote Amphitryon.

[2] 'Moi qui te fous dehors'.

layers, just like everybody else. Well then, this distinction warrants being taken up on the level of the couple.

In truth, fine minds, solid minds – you meet up with some like that, punctuating history – have already been stirred up by the relations between marriage and love. These things are in general treated in a playful, racy, cynical style. There's a good old French tradition of that, and that may well be the best way of dealing with it, in any case, as far as the practical side of everyday life is concerned. But one of the more serious thinkers can be observed to have one day come upon marriage and love, and not taken them lightly.

I highly recommend you read Proudhon – he had a solid mind, and you rediscover in him the assured emphasis of the Church Fathers. He had thought, at a little distance, about the human condition, and tried to get close to something far more tenacious as well as far more fragile than one thinks, namely fidelity. He arrived at this question – what can be the motive for fidelity, apart from having given one's word? But often one gives one's word lightly. And if it weren't given in such a manner, it is probable that it would be given far more infrequently, which would noticeably hold up the flow of things, good and worthy, in human society.

As we have remarked, that doesn't prevent it from being given and from bearing all its fruits. When it is broken, not only does everyone get upset, and indignant, but it has consequences, whether we like it or not. That is precisely one of the things which we are taught by analysis, and by the exploration of this unconscious in which speech continues to propagate its waves and its destinies. How can one justify this speech, so impudently engaged in, and properly speaking, as no serious mind has ever doubted, untenable?

Let us try to overcome the romantic illusion, that it is perfect love, the ideal value which each of the partners acquires for the other, which upholds human commitment. Proudhon, whose every thought runs counter to romantic illusions, tries, in a style which might at first pass for mystical, to give fidelity its due within marriage. And he finds the solution in something which can only be recognised as a symbolic pact.

Let us look at it from the woman's perspective. The love the wife gives her spouse is not directed at the individual, not even an idealised one – that's the danger of what is called life in common, idealisation isn't tenable – but at a being beyond. The love which constitutes the bond of marriage, the love which properly speaking is sacred, flows from the woman towards what Proudhon calls, all men. Similarly, through the woman, it is all women which the fidelity of the husband is directed towards.

This may seem paradoxical. But in Proudhon all[3] isn't alle, it isn't a quantity, it is a universal function. It is the universal man, the universal woman, the symbol, the embodiment of the partner of the human couple.

[3] In the French. 'tous les' (all the); in English. 'all the' can be taken as covering all existing particulars, but since Lacan's point is concerned with universals, we have rendered it as 'all'.

So the pact of speech goes far beyond the individual relation and its imaginary vicissitudes – there's no need to look very deep into experience to grasp it. But there is a conflict between this symbolic pact and the imaginary relations which proliferate spontaneously within every libidinal relation, all the more so when what intervenes belongs to the order of Verliebtheit. This conflict subtends, one might say, the great majority of the conflicts in that milieu within which the vicissitude of the bourgeois destiny is unravelled, since it occurs within the humanist perspective of the realisation of the ego, and as a consequence within the alienation proper to the ego. All one needs do is observe to see that this conflict exists, but in order to understand the reason for it, one must go further. Our reference-point will be the anthropological data brought forward by Lévi-Strauss.

You know that the elementary structures are naturally the most complicated, and that those which are said to be complex, in the milieu we live in, ostensibly appear to be the most simple. We think ourselves to be free in our conjugal choice, anyone can marry anyone else, this is a profound illusion, despite it being inscribed in law. In practice, the choice is guided by preferential elements which, although veiled, are nonetheless essential. The interest of so-called elementary structures is to show us the structure of these preferential elements in all their complexities.

Now, Lévi-Strauss shows that, in the structure of the alliance, the woman, who defines the cultural order as against the natural order, is the exchange object, just as speech, which is in effect the original object of exchange, is. Whatever the goods, the qualities and the statuses which are transmitted along the matrilineal line, whatever the authorities with which a so-called matriarchal order is invested, the symbolic order, in its initial operation, is androcentric. That's a fact.

It is a fact which, of course, hasn't failed to receive all manner of correctives in the course of history, but for all that it remains no less fundamental, and in particular allows us to understand the dissymmetrical position of the woman in the bonds of love, and especially in their most pre-eminently socialised form, namely the conjugal bond.

If these things were seen on their level, and with some rigour, many phantoms would be dispelled just like that.

The modern idea of marriage as a pact of mutual consent is certainly a novelty, introduced within the framework of a religion of salvation, which gives pride of place to the individual soul. It covers over and masks the original structure, the primally sacred nature of marriage. This institution exists today in a compacted form, some features of which are so solid and so tenacious that social revolutions are not about to make its pre-eminence and signification disappear. But at the same time, some features of the institution have, in history, been erased.

In the course of history, there have always been two contracts, of a very different nature, in this order. For the Romans, for instance, the marriage of people who have a name, who really have one, that of the patricians, the nobles – the ignobiles are precisely those who don't have a name – had a highly symbolic character, guaranteed it by ceremonies of a special nature – I do not want to enter into an elaborate description of the confarreatio. For the plebeians, there was also a kind of marriage, which was based simply on mutual contract, and constituted what Roman society technically called concubinage. Now it is precisely the institution of concubinage which, starting with a certain wavering in society, was generalised, and, in the final period of Roman history, one even sees concubinage established in the higher strata, with the aim of maintaining an independent social status for the partners, and especially for their goods. In other words, it is when the woman begins to emancipate herself, when she has the right to property as such, when she becomes an individual in society, that the significance of marriage begins to be abraded.

At bottom, the woman is introduced into the symbolic pact of marriage as the object of exchange between – I wouldn't say 'men', although it is men who effectively are supports for it – between lineages, fundamentally androcentric lineages. To understand the various elementary structures is to understand how these objects of exchanges, the women, circulate between these lineages. Judging from experience, this can only happen within an androcentric and patriarchal framework, even when the structure is secondarily caught up in matrilineal ancestries.

The fact that the woman is thus bound up in an order of exchange in which she is object is really what accounts for the fundamentally conflictual character, I wouldn't say without remedy, of her position – the symbolic order literally subdues her, transcends her.

The all men of Proudhon is here the universal man, who is both the most concrete and the most transcendent man, and that's the impasse into which the woman is pushed by her specific function in the symbolic order. For her, there's something insurmountable, let us say unacceptable, in the fact of being placed in the position of an object in the symbolic order, to which, on the other hand, she is entirely subjected no less than the man. It is indeed because she has a relation of the second degree to this symbolic order that the god is embodied in man or man in the god, except for conflict, and, of course, there is always conflict.

In other words, in the primitive form of marriage, if a woman isn't given, or doesn't give herself, to a god, to something transcendent, the fundamental relation suffers every form of imaginary degradation, and that is what does happen, because we aren't, and haven't been for a long time, cut out to embody gods. When times were still hard, there was the master. And that was the great period of the women's rights movement – The woman isn't an object of property – How is it that adultery is punished in so dissymmetric a manner? Are we slaves?

After some progress, we've reached the stage of the rival, the relation of the imaginary mode. One mustn't think that our society, through the emancipation of the said women is privileged in this respect. The most naked rivalry between men and women is eternal, and its style is laid down in conjugal relations. Only a few German psychoanalysts believe that the sexual struggle is characteristic of our times. When you've read Livy, you'll know the scandal which a very remarkable trial of a case of poisoning caused in Rome, from whence it transpired that in every patrician family it was par for the course for women to poison their husbands, and that they were dropping off like flies. Feminine rebellion didn't start yesterday.

From master to slave and rival, there is only one dialectical step – the relations of the master to the slave are essentially reversible, and the master sees very quickly his dependency in relation to his slave become established. Today we have come up with a new subtlety, thanks to the introduction of psychoanalytic ideas – the husband has become the child, and for some time now women have been taught to treat him well. Along this path, we've come full circle, we are returning to the state of nature. That's the conception some people entertain of the legitimate intervention of psychoanalysis into what is called human relations, and which, disseminated through the mass media, teaches all and sundry how to behave so that there's peace at home – the woman plays the role of the mother, and the man that of the child.

Having said this, the profound meaning of the myth of Amphitryon, which is so polyvalent, so enigmatic that one can give it a thousand interpretations, is the following – for the situation to be tenable, the position must be triangular. For the couple to keep to the human level, there has to be a god there. Love flows towards the universal man, towards the veiled man, for whom every ideal is only an idolatrous substitute, and this is that famous genital love which makes our Sundays and which we affect to scorn.

Reread what Balint says about this – you'll find that when authors are somewhat rigorous and experimental, they reach the conclusion that this famous love is nothing at all. Genital love turns out to be absolutely unassimilable to a unity that is the fruit of an instinctual maturation. In effect, to the extent that this genital love is conceived as dual, in which any notion of the third party, of speech, of god, is absent, it is fashioned in two pieces. Primo, the genital act, which, as everyone knows, doesn't last long – it's nice but it doesn't last – and it doesn't secure anything. Secundo, tenderness, whose origins are found to be pregenital. Such is the conclusion to which the most fairminded come, when they don't get beyond the dual relation to secure the norm of human relations.

I've reminded you of some basic truths. Now we are going to see what turns up in Plautus and Molière.

It is a fact that Plautus introduced Sosie – Greek myths aren't ego-based [moïque]. But egos exist, and there is one place where the egos quite naturally have their say, in comedy. And it is a comic poet – which isn't to say a funny poet, I think some of you have already thought about this point – who introduces this fundamental novelty, Sosie, from then on inseparable from the myth of Amphitryon.

Sosie is the ego. And the myth shows us how this good little ego of little chaps like you and me behaves in everyday life, what part it plays in the feasts of the gods – a very odd part, since it is always a bit excised from its own pleasure [jouissance]. The irresistibly comical side lying at the base of all this has never ceased furbishing the theatre – in the end, it is always a matter of me [moi], you and the other.

Well then, how does the ego in question behave? The first time that the ego appears in this drama, he encounters himself at the door, in the guise of what has become Sosie for eternity, the other ego [l'autre moi].

I'm going to read the odd bit to you, because you have to have some sense of the sound of it. The first time the ego appears, it encounters me [moi]. Who's me? Me, the one who kicks you out. That is what it's about, and that is why the comedy of Amphitryon is so truly exemplary. All you need do is pick at it here and there, study the very style and the language, to realise that those who have introduced this crucial character knew what they were talking about.

In Plautus, where this character comes on stage for the first time, it takes the form of a dialogue in the night, whose gripping and, in a use of the word which should be placed in inverted commas, 'symbolic' nature the text makes you appreciate.

These characters act according to the tradition of asides, so often poorly done when actors play – two characters together on the stage exchange remarks the force of each of which hangs on their being in the nature of an echo or a quid pro quo, which amounts to the same thing, which he takes from the remarks the other is independently making. The aside is essential to classical comedy. It is at its very best there.

I couldn't help noticing it, at the Chinese theatre the other day, where it is the gesture which is at its very best. These people speak Chinese and you are no less gripped by everything they show you. For more than a quarter of an hour – it seems like hours – two characters move about the same stage, really giving the impression that they are in two different spaces. With an acrobatic agility, they literally pass through one another. These beings reach one another at every moment through a gesture which could not miss the adversary and nonetheless does pass by him, because he is already elsewhere. This truly sensational demonstration suggests to one the miraginary character of space, but no less leads one to the following characteristic of the symbolic level, that no meeting is ever a shock.

Something of the kind does indeed happen in the play, and especially the first time Sosie comes on the classical stage.

Sosie arrives and meets Sosie.

– Who goes there?

– Me.

– Me, who?

– Me. Courage, Sosie, he tells himself, for the former, of course, is the real one, he isn't at ease.

– What is your fate, tell me?

– To be man and speak. Here is someone who hasn't been coming to the seminars, but bears their trade-mark.

– Are you master or servant?

– Depending how I feel. This is straight out of Plautus, and it is a very pretty definition of the ego. The fundamental position of the ego confronted with its image is indeed this immediate reversibility of the position of master and servant.

– Where are you going?

– Where I intend to go . . .

And it goes on –

– Oh, I do not care for this.

– That's music to my ears, says the imbecile, who naturally expects to receive a thrashing and is already acting smart.

In passing, I can point out to you that this text confirms what I told you about the term fides, that it is the equivalent of the phrase to give one's word. Mercury promises not to jump on him, and Sosie tells him – Tuae fide credo, I take your word.[4] You will also find in the Latin text the ignobilis of earlier on, the man without a name.

Let us study the characters in the play, in accordance with a tradition associated with the practice we are criticising, as being just so many embodiments of internal characters.

In Molière's play, Sosie is totally in the foreground, I would even say that he is the only one who matters, he's the one who opens the scene, immediately after Mercury's dialogue paving the way for Jupiter's night. He comes on, good little Sosie, with the victory of his master. He puts down the lantern, and says – That's Alcmena and he begins to tell her about Amphitryon's prowess. He is a man who imagines that the object of her desire, the peace of her pleasure [jouissance], hangs on his merits. This is the man of the super-ego, who is always wanting to elevate himself to the dignity of the ideals of the father, of the master, and who imagines that that is how he will attain the object of his desire.

[4] The French is: 'je crois en ta parole.'

But Sosie will never succeed in getting himself heard by Alcmena, because the ego's fate, by its very nature, is to always find its reflection confronting it, which dispossess it of all it wishes to attain. This sort of shadow, which is simultaneously rival, master, sometime slave, keeps it at a distance from what is fundamentally at stake, namely the recognition of desire.

On this point, the Latin text has some striking formulae, in the course of this priceless dialogue in which Mercury, by using force, obliges Sosie to abandon his identity, to renounce his own name. And just as Galileo says – And yet, the earth does move, Sosie always comes back to it – Yet, I am Sosie, and he has this wonderful line – By Pollux, tu me alienabis numquam, you will never make me other, quin noster siem, than am ours. The Latin text indicates perfectly the alienation of the ego and the support it finds in the we, in its belonging to the order in which its master is a great general.

Enter Amphitryon, the real master, Sosie's guarantor, who will put things in order. What is remarkable is precisely that Amphitryon will also be had just as much, duped just as much, as Sosie himself. He doesn't understand a thing Sosie is telling him, that is, that he has met another me [moi].

– What patience I must resort to!
But tell me, did you enter the house?
– Enter, yes. But in what way? [. . .]
– So how?
– With a stick
Which my back still feels the terrible pain of.
. . .
– Who?
– Me.
– You, fighting yourself [Toi, te battre?]
– Yes, me; not the me here,
But the me from the house, who swipes like four men.
. . . I've seen evidence of it,
And this devil of a me thrashed me good and proper.
– Me, I tell you.
– Who me?
– This me who rained blows on me.

And then Amphitryon rains blows on poor Sosie. In other words, he analyses his negative transference for him. He teaches him what an ego must be. He must reintegrate into his ego his ego-properties.

Racy and indescribable scenes. I could give many more quotations, which always show the same contradiction in the subject between the symbolic and the real plane. Sosie effectively starts doubting whether he is himself because Mercury told him something very special – what he was doing when no one could see him. Sosie, astonished at what Mercury tells him about his own behaviour, begins to give in a little.

– And me I am beginning to doubt in earnest . . .

It is just as remarkable in the Latin text.

– Now I recognise my own image, which I have often seen in the mirror, in speculum.

And he enumerates the symbolic historical qualities of his identity, as in Molière. But the contradiction which is also on the imaginary level splits asunder – equidem certo idem sum qui semper fui, Nonetheless I am the same man as has always been. And then, an appeal to the imaginary elements of intimacy with the gods. After all, I have already seen this house, it is clearly the same – recourse to the intuitive certitude, which however is susceptible to being out of kilter. The déjà-vu, the déjà-reconnu, the déjà-éprouvé, often enter into conflict with the certainties which emanate from recollection and history. Some see the phenomena of depersonalisation as being the premonitory signs of disintegration, when it is by no means necessary to possess a predisposition to psychosis to have experienced a thousand times over similar kinds of feelings, whose mainspring is to be found in the relation of the symbolic to the imaginary.

Just when Sosie accepts his confusion, his dispossession, Amphitryon gives him some supportive psychotherapy. Don't let's say that Amphitryon is in the position of the psychoanalyst. Let's be content with saying that he can be symbolic of it, in so far as in relation to his object – in so far as the object of his love, his far off princess, is psychoanalysis – the psychoanalyst occupies, to put it politely, the exiled position which is that of Amphitryon at his own door. But the victim of this spiritual cuckoldry is the patient.

Every Tom, Dick and Harry – and Lord knows that I've had enough testimony – thinks he has reached the uttermost depths of the analytic experience by having had some fantasies of Verliebtheit, of infatuation, about the person who opens the door at his analyst's – it isn't that rare to hear such testimony, although here I'm alluding to very specific cases. In his encounter with this alleged analytic experience, the subject will be fundamentally dispossessed, will be had.

In everyday chat, in the world of language as it's taken for granted, in the world of the commonly accepted misunderstanding, the subject doesn't know what he is saying – at every moment, the sheer fact that we speak shows that we don't know that. The very foundation of analysis clearly lies in our telling a thousand times more than it would take to get our heads chopped off. We don't know what we are saying, but we do address it to someone – someone who is miraginary and endowed with an ego. Because speech is propagated in a straight line, as I said last time, we have the illusion that this speech comes from the location we give to our own ego, rightly separated off, in the schema which I left on the drawing-board last time, from all the other egos.

As Giraudoux's Jupiter points out when he tries to find out from Mercury what men are – Man is the character who is always asking if he exists, and he's quite right, and there's only one thing wrong, which is his answering yes. In relation to all the others, the privilege his ego has is that it's the only one which he can be sure exists when he questions himself – and Lord knows he does question himself. Essentially, there he is, all alone. And it is because speech is received from this ego that the subject enters into the sweet illusion that this ego is in a unique position.

If the analyst thinks that he has to answer from there, a', he ratifies the function of the ego, which is precisely what dispossesses the subject of himself. He says to him – Go back into your ego – or rather – Stuff everything back into it, everything you let escape from it. Those guts, those limbs of yours you were taking stock of when faced with the other Sosie, reintegrate them now, eat them. Reconstitute yourself in the fullness of these drives you fail to recognise.

But that's not the point. The point is for the subject to get to know what he's saying, get to know who's speaking from there, S, and to this end, to become aware of the essentially imaginary character of what is said in that place when the absolute transcendent Other is invoked, this Other to be found in language each time speech endeavours to be uttered.

Let us take the concrete example of the obsessional. The fatal influence of the ego is brought to a maximum in him. There is no danger of madness, no unleashing of the symbol behind the obsession, as some theoreticians tell us. The obsessional subject isn't the same as the schizoid subject who, in some way, speaks directly at the level of his drives. It is the ego in so far as it bears within itself its dispossession, it is imaginary death. If the obsessional mortifies himself, it is because more than any other neurotic, he binds himself to his ego, which bears within itself dispossession and imaginary death.

But why? It's obvious – the obsessional is always an other. Whatever he tells you, whatever feelings he brings to you, it is always those of someone other than himself. This objectification of himself isn't due to an inclination or to a gift for introspection. It is to the extent that he evades his own desire that all desire to which, were it only ostensibly, he commits himself, will be represented by him as the desire of this other self that is his ego.

And it isn't chiming in with this to plan to reinforce his ego? to allow it its various drives, its orality, its anality, its later oral stage, and its primary anal stage? to teach him to recognise what he wants, which we know from the start, the destruction of the other? And how could this not be the destruction of the other, since it is the destruction of himself which is the issue, which is exactly the same thing?

Before enabling him to recognise the fundamental aggressivity which he disperses and refracts into the world, which structures all his object relations, he must be made to understand what the function of this fatal relation he maintains with himself is, which makes it such that as soon as a feeling is his he starts annulling it. If an obsessional tells you that he doesn't care for something or someone, you can take it that it touches him to the quick. When he expresses great indifference, that is when his interest is caught at its maximum.

To act in such a way that the obsessional recognises himself in the decomposed image of himself which he presents to us in the more or less explicit, degraded, loose form of his aggressive drives, is no doubt essential, but the key to the cure isn't to be found in this dual relation with himself. The interpretation of his fatal relation to himself only carries weight if you get him to understand the function.

He isn't dead to himself, nor in actual fact [réellement]. For whom is he dead? For the person who is his master. And in relation to what? In relation to the object of his pleasure [jouissance]. He effaces his pleasure so as not to arouse the anger of his master. But, on the other hand, if he is dead, or if he presents himself as such, he is no longer here, it's someone other than himself who has a master and, inversely, he himself has another master. It follows that he is always somewhere else. In so far as he desires, he splits himself [se dédouble] indefinitely into a series of characters, which the Fairbairns turn into an enrapturing discovery. Within the psychology of the subject, there are, Fairbairn notes, many more than just the three characters Freud talks of, the id, super-ego and ego, you'll always stumble on at least two others. But you can still find others, as in a silvered mirror – if you look carefully, there isn't just one image, but a second one, which splits, and if the silver is thick enough, there are ten, twenty, an infinity. Similarly, to the extent that the subject annuls himself, mortifies himself when confronted with his master, he is still an other, since he is always there, an other with another master and another slave, etc. The object of his desire equally suffers an automatic split [dédoublement], as I showed in my commentary on the Ratman, as well as on the basis of my detailed account of Dichtung und Wahrheit. What the obsessional hangs on to is always other, for if he truly recognised it, he would be cured.

Analysis doesn't progress, as we are assured, through a kind of auto-observation by the subject, founded on the famous splitting[5] of the ego which would thus be essential to the analytic situation. The observation is an observation of observation, and so on, which simply perpetuates the fundamentally ambiguous relation of the ego. Analysis progresses through the speech of the subject in so far as it passes beyond the dual relation, and thus no longer encounters anything except the absolute Other, whom the subject doesn't know how to recognise. He has to reintegrate this speech progressively in him, that is to say to finally speak to the absolute Other from there where he is, from there where his ego must come to be, by reintegrating the paranoid composition of his drives of which it isn't sufficient to say that he doesn't recognise himself in them – essentially, as an ego, he fails to recognise [méconnaît] them.

In other words, what Sosie has to learn isn't that he has never encountered his double [sosie] – it is unqualifiedly true that he did encounter him. What he has to learn is that he is Amphitryon, the gentleman full of glory who understands nothing about nothing, not a thing about what one desires, who thinks that it is enough to be a victorious general to make love to one's wife. This fundamentally alienated gentleman, who never does encounter the object of his desires, has yet to realise why he cleaves fundamentally to this ego, and how this ego is his fundamental alienation. He has yet to become aware of this profound twinship, which is also one of the essential viewpoints of Amphitryon, and on two levels – that of these doubles who mirror one another, and that of the gods. From a double love, Alcmena engenders a double fruit. Alcmena is far more prominent in Plautus – with time we have acquired a degree of modesty which prevents us from going very deeply into things.

By means of this dramatic, if not psychodramatic, demonstration, which is what the myth of Amphitryon amounts to for us, at least, I wanted to give you a sense today of the extent to which the vital problems which we address ourselves to are inscribed within the register of a traditional way of thinking. But that doesn't prevent me from advising you to look for the evidence of the psychologistic illusion I denounce in the very writings of the authors who sustain it. You'll find a very pretty example of it in this Fairbairn I mentioned to you the other day.

It's not an obsessional case, but rather a woman who has a real genital abnormality – she has a very tiny vagina, which has been left untouched, she is a virgin, and there is no uterus corresponding to this very tiny vagina. That is more or less certain, although, on account of a singular timidity, the matter has never been made absolutely clear. At least when it comes to the secondary sexual characteristics, the abnormality is striking, according to certain specialists, who have gone so far as to say that it is an instance of pseudo-hermaphroditism, and that in reality she was a man. Such is the subject which our Fairbairn takes into analysis.

The kind of grand scale with which the whole of the case's unfolding is discussed is really worth noticing. Without batting an eyelid, he tells us that this subject, a personality of evident quality, has learnt that something wasn't going quite right, that her situation is very peculiar in relation to the reality of the sexes. She has learnt that all the more so on account of there being six or seven girls in the family in the same position. So, one knows what's what, one knows that on this point the women are put together somewhat oddly. She tells herself that it's unique, and she is pleased about it – This way, she tells herself, I'll miss out on a lot of worries. And she duly becomes a teacher.

Then, slowly, she becomes aware that, far from being discharged of nature's burdens owing to the fact that all her pleasure [jouissance] comes from a purely spiritual act, funny things happen – nothing is ever right, things never go well enough. She is horribly tyrannised by her scruples. And when she gets rather run down in the middle of the second term, she has a bout of depression.

The analyst plans, above all else, to reintegrate her drives for her, that is to say to get her to become aware of her phallic complex – what do you know, it's true. It is discovered that there is a relation between the fact that she affects[6] certain men, that the proximity of certain men has an effect on her, and the bouts of depression. From that, the analyst deduces that she would like to hurt them, and for months he gets her to reintegrate this aggressive drive. Throughout the whole of this period, he tells himself – Good gracious me, she does learn all this amazingly well! What he is waiting for is for her to come up with what he calls feelings of guilt. And eventually, he is successful.

What is really most remarkable is that he gives an account of the progress of the analysis on the day that he makes the following observation – she has finally got to her feeling of guilt, that is to say now it's all very simple, she can no longer get close to a man without this triggering bouts of guilt which, this time, have substance.

In other words, in conformity with the schema we looked at the other day, the analyst gave her – firstly, an ego, he apprised her as to what she really wanted, namely to cut men down to size – secondly, he has given her a super-ego, namely that all of this is really very naughty, and that what is more it is absolutely forbidden to get close to these men. That is what the author calls the paranoid stage of the analysis. I'm quite prepared to believe it – he is very good at teaching her where these drives are, and now she sees them all over the place.

Is this really the right tack? Is what these bouts of depression are concerned with to be located in this dual relation, with all that that involves on the schema of regression?

And yet the author has the thing within his grasp. The depressive qualities of the images of men are linked to the fact that men, that's her. It is her own image in so far as it has been taken away from her, and it has this decomposing action on her, disconcerting in the original sense of the word. When she comes close to these men, it is her own image, her narcissistic image, her ego, she comes close to. That is the basis of the depressive position. And the situation would certainly be more difficult for her than for anyone else, since she is very specifically in an ambiguous position, one which has its place in teratology. But any kind of narcissistic identification is as such ambiguous.

There is no better illustration of the function of Penisneid – it is in so far as she identifies with the imaginary man that the penis takes on a symbolic value, and that there's a problem. It would be entirely incorrect, the author tells us, to think that Penisneid is entirely natural in women. Who told him it was natural? Of course it's symbolic. It is in so far as the woman is in a symbolic order with an androcentric perspective that the penis takes on this value. Besides, it isn't the penis, but the phallus, that is to say something whose symbolic usage is possible because it can be seen, because it is erected. There can be no possible symbolic use for what is not seen, for what is hidden.

For this woman, the function of Penisneid is fully operative, since she doesn't know who she is, whether she is man or woman, and she is totally absorbed by the question of her symbolic signification. And this real anomaly is doubled up by something else which perhaps has some relation to this teratological apparition, namely that in her family the masculine side is effaced. It is her mother's father who plays the role of the more elevated character, and it is in relation to him that the triangle is established in a typical way, and the question raised as to her phallicisation or not.

All this is completely passed over in the theory and in the conduct of the treatment, in the name of the following, that what is at issue is to get the subject to recognise her drives, and in particular, because in truth those are the only ones one comes across, those drives known in our elegant language as pregenital. This solid investigation of the pregenital leads to a phase which the therapist comes to call paranoid. We shouldn't be surprised by that. Taking the imaginary for the real is what characterises paranoia, and by failing to recognise [méconnaître] the imaginary register, we bring the subject to recognise his partial drives in the real.

Here, the subject's relations with men, up to then narcissistic and which were already not that simple, become inter-aggressive, which complicates them no end. Taking the path of guilt which it was extraordinarily difficult to instigate, does not bode well for the supplementary detours which will be necessary so that the subject may return to a more pacific course.

You don't have to look very far to find the practical sanction for a theoretical error. In this respect, this an exemplary illustration. One of the secret mainsprings for the failure of the treatments of obsessionals is the idea that there's a latent psychosis behind the obsessional neurosis. It isn't surprising that one then ends up with latent disassociations, and that one substitutes periodic depressions, even a psychic hypochondriacal inclination, for the obsessional neurosis.

Perhaps that is not the best one can do.

However panoramic our comments may be, you must be aware that they have the most precise repercussions, not only for the understanding of cases, but for technique.

Where is speech? Where is language?

THE APOLOGUE OF THE MARTIAN
THE APOLOGUE OF THE THREE PRISONERS

The lecture announced for next Wednesday at 10.30 won't be followed by a seminar. We will have a final session the following week, in case the paper raises questions you would like to hear me discuss. The lecture I just mentioned will in fact be given before a larger audience, and I shan't be able to express myself then in the terms in which I express myself here, which takes for granted acquaintance with our earlier work.

Today, I would like us to talk a bit, so that I get some sense of where you have got to. I would like, as we have already done once before, the greatest possible number of you to raise the questions that in your opinion remain open. I have the impression they're not in short supply, since we try to open up questions here, rather than close them again. So then, what question has been opened up for you by this year's seminar?

MLLE X: I'm not sure of the way in which you locate the symbolic and the imaginary.

What sense do you have of it, after having heard some of the seminar?

MLLE X: I think that the imaginary has more to do with the subject, with his way of receiving, whereas the symbolic order is more impersonal.

Yes, that's true and it isn't.

1

It's my turn to ask you a question. At the point we have reached, what economic function do I give to language and speech in the schema? What relation do they have? What difference? It is a very simple question, but it still deserves an answer.

DR GRANOFF: Language would be the frieze of the imaginary, and speech, full speech, the symbolic landmark, would be the small island starting from which any message can be reconstructed or rather deciphered.

O. MANNONI: I'd say for brevity's sake, that language is geometrical, speech is perspective, and the point of perspective is always an other. Language is a reality, it is geometrical, that is to say that it isn't put into perspective, and belongs to no one, whereas speech is a perspective in this geometry, whose centre of perspective, the vanishing point, is always an ego. Within language, there is no ego.

Are you sure of that?

O. MANNONI: Language is a universe. Speech is a cut through this universe, which is exactly tied to the position of the speaking subject. Language may have a meaning, but only speech has a signification. One understands the meaning of Latin, but Latin isn't speech [une parole].

When one understands Latin, one understands the manner in which the various lexicological and grammatical elements are organised, the manner in which the significations refer to each other, the employment of usages. And why do you say that the system of egos doesn't exist in that? On the contrary, they are entirely comprehended within it.

O. MANNONI: I'm thinking of quite an old joke about the baccalauréat, in which a false candidate is taken for a candidate. The examiner shows him an exam paper – But you wrote this. It's called Letter to Seneca. And the guy says – But, sir, am I the kind of guy to write to Seneca? He looks at things in the perspective of speech. At the limit he could translate the version, but he says – It isn't me, it isn't my speech. Obviously, it is a farcical situation. But it seems to me to have this meaning. If I read a letter not knowing who sent it, nor to whom, I can understand it, I am in the world of language.

When someone shows you a letter to Seneca, it is obviously you who wrote it. The example you've suggested has the very opposite meaning to what you are claiming. If we immediately take up our place in the game of the diverse intersubjectivities, that's because we are in our place anywhere. The world of language is possible in so far as we have our place in it anywhere.

O. MANNONI: When there's speech [une parole].

Precisely, that's the whole question, is that sufficient to yield speech? The foundation of the analytic experience is that not every manner of introducing oneself into language is equally efficacious, isn't equally this body of being, this corpse of being,[1] which makes the existence of psychoanalysis possible, which makes it such that not every random bit of language has the same value for the subject.

DR GRANOFF: Language is from no one to no one, and speech from someone to someone else. Because speech is constitutive and language is constituted.

[1] Phrase in English in the original.

DR PERRIER: In the present state of things, what matters is to introduce the economic problem of language into speech. And to that end I suggest the following – I'm not sure if I'm right – that there would no longer be an economic problem to the extent that the signifying situation of the subject were clearly formulated in all its dimensions, and in particular in its triangular dimensions, with the aid of speech. If language becomes full speech, three-dimensional, the economic factor will no longer be at issue on the level of the quantities channelled into an analysis, quantities of affects or instincts, and will simply become the substratum again, the engine of whatever is brought completely naturally into the situation, to the extent that one has become aware of it in all its dimensions.

I note a word which you used in several ways – dimension.

DR LECLAIRE: The answer which occurs to me is the following. It is a formula – language has the function of communication, even of transmission, and speech, for its part, has a function of foundation, even of revelation.

M. ARENSBURG: So it would be via the intermediary of speech that language could acquire its economic role. Is that what you mean?

DR PERRIER: No, I'm talking about the reinsertion of the economy into the symbolic order, via the intermediary of speech.

The key word in cybernetics is message. That's what language is made for, but it isn't a code, it is essentially ambiguous, semantemes are always polysemantemes, signifers always have several, sometimes extremely disjointed, significations. The sentence, though, has one unique meaning, what I mean is that it can't be lexicalised – one makes dictionaries of words, of word usages or locutions, but one doesn't make a dictionary of sentences. Hence, some of the ambiguities tied to the semantic element are reabsorbed in the context, through usage and the utterance of the sentence. The theory of communication, in as much as it tries to formalise this theme and to isolate out units, refers rather to codes, which in principle avoid the ambiguities – it isn't possible to confuse one sign from the code with another, except in error. We thus find ourselves confronted with language, confronted with a primary category whose function in relation to the message is not a simple one. Now, this introduction still leaves opaque the question of the message. In your opinion, just like that, spontaneously, what's a message?

M. MARCHANT: The transmission of information.

What is information?

M. MARCHANT: Any kind of indication.

MME AUDRY: It's something sent by someone addressed to some else.

M. MARCHANT: That's a communication and not a message.

MME AUDRY: I think that's the essence of a message, a transmitted announcement.

M. MARCHANT: Message and communication are not the same things.

MME AUDRY: In its standard meaning, a message is something transmitted to someone, to let him know of something.

M. MARCHANT: The message is unidirectional. Communication isn't unidirectional, there's coming and going.

MME AUDRY: I said that the message is from someone to someone else.

M. MARCHANT: The message is sent from someone to someone else. Communication is what occurs once the message is exchanged.

DR GRANOFF: The message is a programme one puts into a universal machine, and after a while it retrieves whatever it can from it.

What he is saying isn't bad.

M. LEFORT: It is the enlarging of the symbolic world.

M. MARCHANT: No, it is the shrinking of the symbolic world. With language as backdrop, speech will choose.

Mme Colette Audry introduces the necessity of subjects with respect to the message.

MME AUDRY: A message isn't just direct. It may be carried by a messenger who has got nothing to do with it. The messenger may not know what the message contains.

M. MARCHANT: It may also be transmitted from machine to machine.

MME AUDRY: But in every case there is a point of departure and a point of arrival.

Sometimes, the messenger is confused with the message. If he has something written on his scalp, he can't read it, even in the mirror, to get at the message he has to be shaved. In this case, is that the image of the message in itself? Is a messenger who has a message written under his hair himself a message?

M. MARCHANT: I would say yes.

MME AUDRY: It's obviously a message.

O. MANNONI: There is no need for it to be received.

M. MARCHANT: In general, messages are sent and received. But between the two, that's a message.

MME AUDRY: A bottle in the sea is a message. It is addressed, it doesn't have to arrive, but it is addressed.

M. MARCHANT: It is a signification in motion.

It isn't a signification, but a sign in motion. Now we still have to find out what a sign is.

M. MARCHANT: It is something one exchanges.

DR LECLAIRE: The message is objective speech.

Certainly not!

I will give you an apologue so as to try and put some landmarks in place.

The man known as Wells is commonly thought to have had a somewhat primitive mind. In actual fact, he was quite ingenious, he knew very well what he was doing, what he was refusing and what he was choosing, within the system of thought and behaviour.

I can't recall very clearly in which one of his works he imagines two or three scientists having reached Mars. There, they come upon beings who have modes of communication all their own, and they are very surprised to understand the messages modulated to them. They are amazed, and then, they discuss it together. One says – He told me that he was doing some research on electronic physics. The other says – Yes, he told me that he was working on what constitutes the essence of solid bodies. And the third one says – He told me that he was working on metre in poetry and the function of rhyme.

That is what happens every time we engage in private or public discourse. Does this short story illustrate language or speech?

MME AUDRY: Both.

DR GRANOFF: To my knowledge, there aren't a large number of universal machines. Suppose you run a programme through one. You have to take into account not only the machine, but also the operators. You run a programme, it's a message. On output, one says – the machine is on the blink, or else – it isn't on the blink. In the sense that from the moment when the machine restores a communication, from the moment when someone can receive it – and it can't be received if the operator hasn't understood it – if he finds it well-formed, if he understands it, if he accepts it as valid, if he considers the machine to have been functioning properly, the message has become a communication.

M. MARCHANT: But in that case, all three have understood, but differently.

O. MANNONI: Not differently. If a mathematician writes out equations on a blackboard, one person might say it's magnetism, and another something else. These equations are true for both of them.

That's completely off.

M. RIGUET: I think that it's language, quite simply.

DR LECLAIRE: I have the feeling that the discussion has taken a specific turn as a result of our discussion of cybernetics.

It is an opportunity to gauge a bit where you've got to.

DR LECLAIRE: If, within this perspective, we are, relatively speaking, capable of locating language, I think it far harder, for us, at least for the time being, to locate speech. Now, earlier on, when I was talking of speech, I was talking about it in a specific sense – when I talk of speech, I always mean speech. I would like you to tell us a bit about the pole of speech, so that we can at least gauge the level of the discussion.

M. MARCHANT: In any case can we separate speech from language when they become manifest?

What do you make of all this, Father Beirnaert?

FATHER BEIRNAERT: Like Riguet I also thought it was language, so I haven't understood a thing.

M. RIGUET: We have each understood it in our own way.

MME AUDRY: It is even more complicated than that. One would first have to see what the Martian wanted to say.

We will never know what the Martian wanted to say. If we put ourselves on the side on which the emission of words remains vague, it can't be said that speech and language are confounded with one another.

M. MARCHANT: So, you make language disappear, and then you catch us out on it.

I admit that this apologue deserves some clarification. There is a substitute for language in this apologue, which is the possibility of the three individuals comprehending. The speech they receive operates on this language. The problem is that there is no code.

What this apologue means is this – it is in a world of language that each man has to recognise a calling, a vocation, which happens to be revealed to him. Someone spoke just now of revelation and foundation, and that is indeed what it is about. We are faced with a world of language, which every now and then, gives us the impression that there is something essentially neutralising, uncertain about it. There isn't one philosopher who hasn't insisted, and rightly so, on the fact that the very possibility of error is tied to the existence of language. Each subject doesn't simply have to take cognisance of the world, as if it all happened on the level of noetics, he has to find his way about in it. If psychoanalysis means anything, it is that he is already engaged in something which has a relation with language without being identical to it, and that he has to find his way about in it – the universal discourse.

The concrete, universal discourse, which has been unfolding since the beginning of time, is what has truly been said or rather really been said – to fix our ideas, we can get to that point. The subject locates himself as such in relation to that, he is inscribed in it, that is how he is already determined, by a determination belonging to a totally different register from that of the determinations of the real, of the material metabolisms which caused him to come forth into this semblance of existence which is life. His function, in so far as he continues this discourse, is to rediscover his place in it, not simply as orator, but, here and now, as entirely determined by it.

I have often underlined that already before his birth, the subject is already located not only as sender, but as an atom of concrete discourse. He is in the chorus line of this discourse, he himself is, if you prefer, a message. A message has been written on his head, and he is entirely located in the succession of messages. Each of his choices is a speech.

I appealed to Father Beirnaert for help, because of the in principio erat verbum. One day you said that fides was in your opinion the best translation for speech. It is odd that the religious translation doesn't say in principio erat fides. Verbum, that's language, and even the word. In the Greek text, logos is also language, and not speech. After that, God made use of speech – Let there be light, he said.

Let's try to get a little closer to the manner in which man comes into [s'intéresse], in the sense of inter-esse, speech. We certainly feel the necessity of distinguishing between a message, in the sense of sign, a wandering sign, and the manner in which man gets in on it. If he is himself integrated into the universal discourse, it isn't after all in the same way as the messages which wander the world in bottles or on scalps. From the point of view of Sirius, maybe they are the same, but for us that's not possible. In any case, what concerns us is to know the difference.

M. RIGUET: May I put two or three things on the blackboard? I would simply like to try in a few minutes to explain first, what mathematicians understand by language.

Consider the set of all the words which can be formed by using these letters – ab, ac, ca, ad, and abdd, bb, etc. I place the letters one after another in any kind of order, repetitions being permitted. I can form all these words indefinitely. Amongst these words, take a sub-set WF – well-formed[2] – words formed with the help of these symbols. And a mathematical theory consists in the data of a certain sub-set, these are called axioms, and a set of rules of deduction, which will for instance be of a syntactic kind. If, inside one word, I find the symbol ab, I will have for instance the option of replacing it by p. Thus, starting off with the word, abcd, I will be able to form the word pcd. These are theorems, that is, the set of all the words which I can form on the basis of the axioms with the aid of the productions of syntax. This, WF, is called a language.

The choice of symbols, a, b, c, d, is of course arbitrary. I could have chosen others, u, v, x, y, and thus have generated a theory isomorphic with the first. In actual fact, for mathematicians, the notion of language is pretty nearly defined by an isomorphism. What's more – it is pretty nearly defined by a coding, for if one considers the set of symbols constituted by 0 and 1, I can let a = 00, b = 01, c = 10, d = 11, and translate all the syntactic products and the axioms as functions of the symbols 0 and 1. But I will have to be careful when I want to retrieve the old theory by decoding the new one, for if I code a certain word 00010111001, the decoding will sometimes yield an ambiguity. If e = 000, I won't know if this word begins with a or with e, etc.

It seems to me that your definition of symbols is not the same as this. For you, symbols are tied to another language. You have a kind of basic language of communication, a kind of universal language, and the symbols you speak of are always coded in function of this basic language.

What strikes me in what you have just said, if I've properly understood it – I think I've understood it – is this – when one illustrates the phenomenon of language with something as formally purified as mathematical symbols – and that is one of the reasons for putting cybernetics on the agenda – when one gives a mathematical notation of the verbum, one demonstrates in the simplest possible way that language exists completely independently of us. Numbers have properties which are absolute. They are, whether we're here or not. 1729 will always be the sum of two cubes, the smallest number which is the sum of two different pairs of cubes.

All this can circulate in all manner of ways in the universal machine, which is more universal than anything you could imagine. One can imagine an indefinite number of levels, where all this turns around and circulates. The world of signs functions, and it has no signification whatsoever.

What gives it its signification is the moment when we stop the machine. These are the temporal breaks which we make in it. If they are faulty, we will see ambiguities emerge, which are sometimes difficult to resolve, but which one will always end up giving a signification to.

M. RIGUET: I don't think so, for these cuts may be made by another machine, and there's nothing to say that a man will be able to decipher what will come out of this new machine.

That is perfectly true. Nonetheless, it is the temporal element, the intervention of a scansion permitting the insertion of something which can take on meaning for a subject.

M. RIGUET: Yes, but it seems to me that in addition there's this universe of symbols, belonging to mankind in common.

What we have just said is that it doesn't in any way belong specifically to it.

M. RIGUET: Precisely, machines don't have a common universe of symbols.

That's very delicate, because we build these machines. In fact, that doesn't matter. It is enough to note that by means of your 0 and your 1, that is, the connotation of presence-absence, we are capable of representing everything which presents itself, everything which has been brought about by a determinate historical process, everything which has been developed in mathematics. We are in perfect agreement. All the properties of numbers are there, in these numbers written with binary numbers. Of course, that isn't how one discovers them. It took the invention of symbols, for instance, which made us take a giant step forward the day it was simply inscribed on a bit of paper. We were left for centuries with our mouths open when faced with equations of the second degree without being able to get it out, and it is through writing it down that an advance was made.

We thus find ourselves confronted with the problematic situation, that there is in fact a reality of signs within which there exists a world of truth entirely deprived of subjectivity, and that, on the other hand, there has been a historical development of subjectivity manifestly directed towards the rediscovery of truth, which lies in the order of symbols.

Who doesn't understand a word of this?

M. MARCHANT: I don't agree. You defined language, and I think that it is the best definition, as a world of signs to which we are strangers.

This language here.

M. MARCHANT: I think that it is true of language in general.

Not so. For language is completely burdened with our history, it is as contingent as this sign, and what is more it is ambiguous.

M. MARCHANT: I think the notion of error cannot be applied to language when it is conceived like that.

There is no error in the world of zeros.

M. MARCHANT: But in the world of language, it doesn't mean anything any longer. There are true and false things. You speak of research we are engaged in. At this moment, error and truth are determined. But the world of mathematical symbols is already a bit peculiar, as language.

In the system of language as it exists, I can manage to spot the error as such. If I tell you elephants live in water, I can, through a series of syllogisms, refute this error.

M. MARCHANT: It is already a sentence, a message, a communication which may be false. If one defines every language as a world of signs which exists independently of us, the notion of error cannot be located at this level, but at a higher level, where messages become manifest. Communication and speech are not on the same level. I place language on a lower level, on the basis of which communication, messages and speech become manifest. In my opinion, language must be restricted to a level almost of undifferentiation. If one starts wanting to decipher the meaning of a language, it no longer applies. One can only decipher the meaning of speech. It may have several, and that in fact is its role.

This is what I am aiming at. I'm showing you that the question of meaning comes with speech.

M. MARCHANT: Of course, but not with language. Language enables a meaning to be established and for speech to become manifest.

Two things should be borne in mind. Language as embodied historically, which is that of our community, French, for instance, and then, there is this language here. The important thing is for us to realise that there is something which we can attain in its purity, where laws already have a palpable existence, laws which are completely undeciphered until we intervene to give them some meaning. And what meaning?

M. MARCHANT: Oh, no! Absolutely no way!

The meaning of something that engages us completely. It is the way in which we introduce ourselves into the temporal succession. What's involved is knowing what time is involved.

MISS X: I think some of Piaget's ideas may be relevant here. He defines the essential feature of formal thought in terms of possibility rather than in terms of the real. But within the notion of possibilities themselves, he makes a distinction between what he calls the possible structure, which corresponds to the objective structures of thought, and what he calls materially possible, that is, which must receive a function from the consciousness of the subject.

But there's absolutely no need for thinking here, the circulation of binary signs in a machine enables us, if we give it the right programme, to discover a previously unpublished prime number. The prime number circulating in the machine has got nothing to do with thought.

MISS X: Piaget isn't talking about thought, but about the objective structure which finds the solution to the problem, the structure of the machine in the organism, that is to say, in the case of the human being, the structure of the brain.

These problems aren't on the same level as what concerns us here.

MISS X: One could say that speech is intercalated as the element of revelation between universal discourse and language.

M. LEFÈBVRE-PONTALIS: I'm not sure whether I am following this clearly. I have the impression that we are making a very radical break between language and speech, which doesn't mean a lot to me, for in the end, if there were no speech, there would be no language. In the apologue we heard earlier on, it seemed to me that language was ambiguous by definition, and that one cannot say that it is a universe of signs which assumes a relatively completed closed cycle, to which one would turn in order to draw out this or that signification. In the face of such an ambiguity, the person who receives the speech reveals his preferences.

As soon as language exists – and the question is precisely to know what minimum number of signs is needed to make a language – there is a concrete universe. All the significations must find a place in it. There is no instance of a language in which entire zones are untranslatable. Everything which we know as signification is always embodied in a system which is [a] universe of language. As soon as language exists, it is [a] universe.

M. LEFÈBVRE-PONTALIS: But one can invert this conclusion without twisting it and say that the most impoverished language allows everything to be communicated. But that doesn't mean to say that all the significations are already set down in a language.

That is why I distinguished language and significations. Language is [a] system of signs, and, as such, [a] complete system. With that, one can do anything.

M. LEFÈBVRE-PONTALIS: On condition that there be speaking subjects.

Of course. The question is to know what the function of the speaking subject is in all this.

I am going to turn to another apologue, perhaps clearer than that of Wells, because it was designed especially with the aim of distinguishing the imaginary from the symbolic. It's mine.

Three prisoners are put to a test. One of them is to be freed, but as all three are equally deserving, it is not clear which one should benefit from this unique act of mercy. They are told – Here are three white discs and two black ones. Each of you will have one of these discs attached to his back, and you are going to have to work out for yourself so as to be able to tell us which one you have been stuck with. Obviously there is no mirror, and it isn't in your interest to communicate, since all it needs is for one of you to have revealed to another what he has got on his back for him to gain by it.

So each of them has a disc on his back. All any one of them sees is the way the two others are connoted by these discs.

They are each given a white disc. How is each subject going to reason?

This story enables one to demonstrate the storeys, the dimensions, as Perrier was saying earlier on, of time. There are three temporal dimensions, which deserve to be pointed out, for they have never really been distinguished. It isn't inconceivable that all three of them realise very quickly that they each have white discs on. But if one wants to set it into discourse, it will necessarily be in the following way. There is a fundamental given of the order of 0 and of the small 1s – if one of them were to see two black discs on the backs of the others, there would not be the least bit of doubt, since there are only two blacks, and he could get moving. That is a given of eternal logic, and the grasping of it is perfectly instantaneous – it is just a matter of seeing. But the thing is, each of them doesn't see two black discs and for a good reason, namely that there is no black disc at all. Each of them sees only two white discs.

Nonetheless, the thing one doesn't see plays a decisive role in the speculation whereby the characters can take the step towards the door.

Seeing two white discs, each subject has to say to himself that one of the two others must see either two white discs or else one white and one black one. What's really involved is each of the subject's thinking what the other two must think, and in a completely reciprocal manner. Obviously, for each of the subjects, one thing is certain, which is that the other two each see the same thing, that is a white plus his own colour, the subject's own, which he doesn't know.

So the subject says to himself, that if he himself is black, each of the two others will see a white and a black, and can say to himself – If I am black, the white one would have already made for the door, and since he isn't moving, it's because I am myself white as well, and I'll go.

Now, as our third subject sees neither of the others leave, he concludes from that that he is white, and makes for the door. That is how, on the basis of the immobility of the others, he himself grasps the fact that he is in a strictly equivalent position to the others, that is to say that he is white. Then it is only in a third moment [temps], in relation to a speculation on the reciprocity of the subjects, that he can come to feel that he is in the same position as the two others.

Nonetheless, do note that, as soon as he has reached this understanding, he must rush to the door. Indeed, once he has arrived at this understanding, he must realise that each of the others was able to reach the same result. So, if he gives them a headstart, no matter how small, he will fall back into his uncertainty of the moment [temps] before. That he isn't mistaken hangs on his very haste.

He has to say to himself – If I don't hurry to arrive at this conclusion, I automatically give in, not only to ambiguity, but to error, given my premises. If I let them get ahead of me, it will be proof that I am black.

It is a sophism, as you are well aware, and the argument comes back again to the third moment [temps]. Everything hangs on something ungraspable. The subject holds in his hands the very articulation by which the truth he sifts out is inseparable from the very action which attests to it. If this action is delayed by one instant, by the same token he knows that he will be thrown into error.

Are you with me?

M. MARCHANT: No one can move, or else all three of them.

M. LAPLANCHE: He may end in failure.

We are now concerned with the subject in so far as he discourses about what he is doing. What he does is one thing, the way he discourses about it is another. If he discourses about it, he says – If the act, whose necessity I have just discovered, is undertaken by the others before me, according to the very logic of my reasoning they are whites and I am black.

M. MARCHANT: But in the example, there is no before, that's the point.

M. LAPLANCHE: They leave because I am white, and . . .

From the moment he lets the others get ahead of him, he has no way of getting himself out of it. He can reason in either of two ways, and he has no means of choosing between them. He is confronted with two terms, each having the properties of subjects, thinking like him. And for himself, the truth, from the point he has reached in his deduction, hangs on the haste with which he takes a step towards the door, after which he will have to explain why he thought as he did. The acceleration, the precipitation in the act, reveals itself in this instance to be coherent with the manifestation of the truth.

M. MARCHANT: I don't agree because you are introducing the notions of being late and of hurrying.

Precisely in order to show their logical value.

M. MARCHANT: But these two notions can only be established in relation to something else. Now, here, there is no relation possible. That is why the three subjects cannot move. There is no relation, because each of the three reasons along the same lines, and awaits something . . .

Suppose all three make a go of it.

M. MARCHANT: Then all three get their heads chopped off.

What will happen before they even get to the door?

M. MARCHANT: That's not possible, they are all waiting.

But the act of each depends on something not-happening, and not on something happening. And because each of the others doesn't make it happen, each of them can make it happen. So they will normally reach the same conclusion if they have the same time for understanding, a real element which lies at the heart of all psychological testing. We assume it to be equal.

M. MARCHANT: But then one can't get oneself out of this. If one wants to resolve the problem, one has to say that the times for understanding aren't the same.

But the problem is only interesting if you assume the times for understanding to be equal. If the times for understanding are unequal, not only is it an uninteresting problem, but you will see how complicated it gets.

M. MARCHANT: Either they are not equally intelligent, or else they cannot move.

M. LAPLANCHE: If A doesn't see B leave, he will be deeply puzzled, but that isn't an error.

It is an error, from the moment he reaches the truth.

M. MARCHANT: He can't reach it.

But if you assume the time for understanding to be fixed?

M. MARCHANT: The same for all?

Yes. At the end of this time for understanding, each of them will be convinced that he is white. All three will leave together, and in principle they will explain why they are white. If you want to reintroduce a point of infinitesimal hesitation, in which each would say to himself but aren't the others leaving precisely because they have just realised that I am black, what will happen? A halt. But you musn't think the situation after the halt will be the same. When they start off, some progress will have been made. I'll skip over the details of the analysis – and leave it to you, you'll see how it is structured – but note that they might stop a second, but not a third time. In other words, in two scansions everything will have been said.

So, where is speech here? Where is language?

We have the language in the initial givens – there are two blacks, etc. These are essential givens of language, and they are entirely outside of reality. Speech is introduced from the moment when the subject acts in such a way as to assert, very simply – I am white. Of course, he doesn't assert it in a manner which is, as one says, logically grounded. But the step he takes is nonetheless valid if he has proceeded in the way I've just described to you – If I don't say right away, as soon as I've understood it, that I'm white, I will never be able to affirm it validly again.

I am not giving you this as a model of logical reasoning, but as a sophism, designed to draw out the distinction between language applied to the imaginary – for the two other subjects are perfectly imaginary for the third, he imagines them, they are quite simply the reciprocal structure as such – and the symbolic moment of language, that is to say the moment of the affirmation. Here, you see, there's something which isn't completely identifiable with the temporal break you were talking about earlier on.

M. RIGUET: I agree entirely.

That is where the power revealed by the originality of the machines we have at our disposal falls short. There is a third dimension of time which they undeniably are not party to, which I'm trying to get you to picture via this element which is neither belatedness, nor being in advance, but haste, the relation to time peculiar to the human being, this relation to the chariot of time, which is there, close on our heels. That is where speech is to be found, and where language, which has all the time in the world, is not. That is why, furthermore, one gets nowhere with language.

DR LECLAIRE: There is something which troubles me in all this. Earlier on you translated in the beginning was language, and that is the first time I've heard that. What are you referring to? Is this your translation?

In principio erat verbum, that is undeniably language, it isn't speech.

DR LECLAIRE: So there is no beginning.

I didn't write the Gospel according to St John.

DR LECLAIRE: That's the first time I've ever seen this. One always writes speech, or the word [verbe], and never language.

I have already written the distich up twice on the blackboard and nobody has asked me for the explanation.

> Indem er alles schaft, was schaftet der Höchste? – Sich.
> Was schaft er aber vor er alles schaftet? – Mich.

What was the Almighty doing when he made the creation? – Sich, himself. And what was he before he made anything at all? Mich, myself. It is obviously a risky affirmation.

DR LECLAIRE: I don't understand why you translate in the beginning, and not before the beginning.

I'm not at all engaged in telling you that St John wrote things correctly. I am saying that, in St John, there's in principio erat verbum, in Latin. Now, as you saw when we translated the De significatione, verbum means word, the signifier, and not speech.

MISS X: Verbum is the translation for the Hebrew word dabar which does mean speech, and not language.

We will have to take another look at this bit of Hebrew. As long as the faculty of sciences hasn't been landed with a chair of theology, this will never get sorted out, neither for theology, nor for the sciences. But the question isn't at this point to know whether we should put the word or speech in the beginning. In the perspective we have taken on today and which I just illustrated by Daniel von Chepko's distich; there's a mirage whereby language, namely all your little 0s and 1s, is there from all eternity, independently of us. You may well ask me – Where? I would be really hard pressed finding an answer. But what is certain, as Mannoni was saying earlier on, is that within a certain perspective, we can only see them as being there since the beginning of time.

This is one of the ways in which Platonic and Freudian theory differ from one another. Plato's theory is a theory of reminiscence. Everything we understand, everything we recognise, must always have been there. And why? On occasion I've shown you how this theory is coherent with the fundamental myth of the dyad – Plato cannot conceive of the embodiment of ideas in any other way than in a series of endless reflections. Everything which happens and which is recognised is in the image of the idea. The image existing in itself is in its turn only an image of an idea existing in itself, is only an image in relation to another image. There is only reminiscence and, as we discussed at length yesterday evening, the vagina dentata will be only one image amongst others.[3]

But when we talk of the symbolic order, there are absolute beginnings, there is creation. That is why the in principio erat verbum is ambiguous. It's not for nothing that in Greek, it was called logos. At the beginning one may see it just as well in the perspective of this indefinite homogeneity which we rediscover every time in the domain of the imaginary.

All I need do is think about myself [moi] – I am eternal. From the moment I think about myself [moi], no destruction of me [moi] is possible. But when I say I, not only is destruction possible, but at every instant there is creation. Naturally, it isn't absolute, but for us, if a future is possible, it is because there is this possibility of creation. And if this future isn't, likewise, purely imaginary, it is because our I is carried forward by the entire discourse which came before. If Caesar, at the moment of crossing the Rubicon, isn't engaged in a ridiculous act, it is because he has behind him Caesar's entire past – adultery, the Mediterranean policy, the campaigns against Pompey – it is because of that that he can do something which has strictly symbolic value – for the Rubicon is no wider to cross than what's between my legs. This symbolic act unleashed a series of symbolic consequences. That is what accounts for the fact that there is a primacy of the future of the creation in the symbolic register, in so far as it is assumed by man.

Everything is a function of a past within which we must recognise the succession of prior creations. And even if we do not recognise it there, this past is there forever in the little 0s and the little 1s.

I wasn't trying to tell you that I believed that language was in the beginning – I know nothing of origins. But apropos of this ambiguous term, I wanted to question what for a while you were all agreed on, that the little 0s and the little 1s define a world with irrefutable laws, namely that the numbers are prime from the beginning.

Let us stop there; it is a bit rough-going today.

Psychoanalysis and cybernetics, or on the nature of language

LECTURE[1]

Professor, Ladies and Gentlemen,

In what I am going to say, I would like to single out from amongst you those who come regularly to hear me on Wednesdays, in order to associate them in the gratitude we feel for the person I named first, Jean Delay, who agreed to inaugurate this series of lectures, and who is honouring us by his presence at this session.

On a personal note, I would like to thank him for having given a home to the seminar which I have been running here for the last two years, giving us a roof which adds renown to this teaching through all the memories accumulated under it, and allowing it to share in the resonances of his own speech.

Today I would like to talk about psychoanalysis and cybernetics. As it involves bringing together psychoanalysis and the various human sciences, it seemed to me to be a subject worthy of attention.

[1] This was the last in a series of special lectures organised under the auspices of the Société Française de Psychanalyse, under the patronage of the Clinique de la Faculté de Medecine, around the theme 'Psychoanalysis and the human sciences'. Although some of these lectures have already been referred to, when Lacan or others made allusions to them in the course of the seminar, we thought it convenient to list the entire series, which ran parallel to the work of the seminar throughout the year.

10 November 1954 Jean Delay, Neurosis and Creation
16 November 1954 Alexandre Koyré, Problems of the Platonic dialogue
30 November 1954 Claude Lévi-Strauss, Kinship versus the family
4 January 1955 Jean Hyppolite, Psychoanalysis and phenomenology
18 January 1955 Maurice Merleau-Ponty, Philosophy and psychoanalysis
8 February 1955 Étienne De Greeff, Homicide symbolism in Maeterlinck
15 March 1955 Marcel Griaule, Symbolisation of the world and the conditions of communication in the Sudanese 19 April 1955 Medard Boss (Zurich), Psychoanalysis and analysis of the Dasein
10 May 1955 Émile Benveniste, Psychoanalysis and linguistics
24 May 1955 Daniel Lagache, Psychoanalysis and psychology
22 June 1955 Jacques Lacan, Psychoanalysis and cybernetics, or on the nature of language

I'll tell you right away, I won't be talking about those varieties of cybernetics which are more or less fashionable, nor will I be talking about the big or the little machines. I won't be calling them by their names, I won't be telling you about the wonders they accomplish. In what way could all that be of interest to us?

But nevertheless there is something that can, it seems to me, be got from these two roughly contemporaneous techniques, these two orders of thought and of science, psychoanalysis and cybernetics. Don't expect anything claiming to be exhaustive. Our concern will be to find an axis by means of which some light will be shed on a part of the signification of the one and of the other. This axis is none other than language. And I'm going to give you a quick glimpse of some aspects of the nature of language.

The question we will start off with came up in our seminar when, through a series of associations, we reached a point where we were asking ourselves what it would mean to play a game of chance with a machine.

The game of chance was the game of even and odd, and it may seem surprising that this is of interest in a seminar which deals with psychoanalysis. On occasion we have also talked about Newton. I don't think that these things come up by chance – if I may say so. It is precisely because we talk about the game of even and odd and also of Newton in this seminar that the technique of psychoanalysis has a chance of not falling into disrepair, not to say disrepute.

Well, in the course of this game of even and odd, we wanted to remind ourselves, us analysts, that nothing happens by chance, and also that something might come out of it which might pertain to chance at its purest.

The result was amazing. In this audience of analysts, we encountered genuine indignation at the thought that, as someone told me, I wanted to eliminate chance. In fact, the person who told me this was someone with staunch determinist convictions. And that is what was really frightening. This person was right – there is a close relation between the existence of chance and the basis of determinism.

Let us think about chance for a bit. What do we mean when we say that something happens by chance? We may mean one of two things, which may be very different – either that there is no intention, or that there is a law.

Now, the very idea of determinism is that law is without intention. That is indeed why the determinist theory always seeks to find out how something which is constituted in the real, and which functions according to a law, is engendered, starting off with something that is originally undifferentiated – chance as the absence of intention. To be sure, nothing happens without a cause, determinism tells us, but it is a cause without an intention.

This exemplary experiment might have suggested to my interlocutor – Lord knows how easily the mind slips about when it comes to such matters – that I was about to introduce determinism back into the game of heads or tails, with which he was, more or less intuitively, identifying the game of even and odd. If even the game of heads or tails is determined, what will happen next? A genuine determinism will no longer be possible.

This question opens up that of discovering the nature of that determinism which we analysts take to be at the very root of our technique. We try to get the subject to make available to us, without any intention, his thoughts, as we say, his comments, his discourse, in other words that he should intentionally get as close as possible to chance. What is the determinism here sought after in an intention of chance? It is on this point that cybernetics can throw some light for us.

Cybernetics is a domain with very indeterminate frontiers. Finding its unity obliges us to cast our gaze over a variety of spheres of rationalisation, from politics, via the theory of games, to theories of communication, even to certain definitions of the notion of information.

Cybernetics, we are told, was born very straightforwardly from the work of engineers concerned with the economics of information passing through conductors, concerned with the way in which one can reduce down to its essential elements the mode in which a message is transmitted. In this guise, it would be about ten years old. It was given its name by Norbert Wiener, one of the most eminent of engineers. I think that that limits its importance, and we should cast further afield to find its birth.

To understand what cybernetics is about, one must look for its origin in the theme, so crucial for us, of the signification of chance. The past of cybernetics consists in nothing more than the rationalised formation of what we will call, to contrast them to the exact sciences, the conjectural sciences.

Conjectural sciences, this, I think, is the real name which should from now on be given to a specific group of sciences which are normally designated by the term human sciences. Not that I think that this is an improper term to use, since, in truth, human action is involved in any conjuncture. But I think it is too vague, too bound up with all kinds of confused echoes from pseudo-initiatory sciences which can only lower its tension and level. We can only gain by rendering our definition of the sciences of conjecture more rigorous and more specific.

If this is how we locate cybernetics, we will easily find it ancestors, Condorcet for instance, with his theory of votes and coalitions, of parties, as he says, and further back again Pascal, who would be its father, and its true point of origin.

I am going to start with the fundamental notions of the other sphere of sciences, the exact sciences, whose coming to fruition, in its modern form, doesn't go back very much further than that of the conjectural sciences. The former have in some way occulted, eclipsed, the latter, but they are inseparable from one another.

How are we to define the exact sciences? Should we say that, unlike the conjectural sciences, they are concerned with the real? But what is the real?

I don't think that in this respect the opinion of men has ever varied very much, contrary to what a psychologising genealogy of human thought would have us believe, according to which in early times man lived in dreams, and which claims that children are habitually hallucinated by their desires. A strange conception, so contrary to observation that it can only be described as a myth – a myth whose origin one should inquire into.

The meaning which man has always given to the real is the following – it is something one always finds in the same place, whether or not one has been there. This real may have moved, but if it has moved, one looks for it elsewhere, one looks for why it has been disturbed, one also tells oneself that sometimes it moves under its own steam. But it is always well and truly in its place, whether or not we are there. And our own displacements have, in principle, with certain exceptions, no efficacious influence on this change of place.

To be sure, the exact sciences are very closely tied to this function of the real. Does that mean that, prior to their development, this function was lacking in man, that he was persuaded by this alleged omnipotence of thought which is identified with the so-called archaic stage of animism? It isn't at all the case that man formerly lived at the heart of an anthropomorphic world from which he expected human responses. I think that this conception is totally puerile, and the notion of the infancy of humanity corresponds to nothing historical. Prior to the exact sciences, man thought, as we do, that the real is what keeps turning up where one expected it. At the same time of night one will always find one particular star on a particular meridian, it will turn up again there, it is indeed always there, it is always the same. It's not for nothing that I take the celestial landmark before the terrestrial, for in fact the map of the sky was drawn up before the map of the globe.

Man thought that there were places which endured, but he also thought that his action was concerned with the preservation of this order. For a long time man had the idea that his rites, his ceremonies – the emperor opening the furrow of spring, the dances of spring, guaranteeing the fertility of nature – his ordered and significant actions – action in the real sense, that of speech – were indispensable to sustaining things in their place. He didn't think that the real would vanish if he didn't participate in this ordered manner, but he thought that the real would be disturbed. He did not pretend to lay down the law, he pretended to be indispensable to the permanence of the law. An important definition, for in truth it entirely safeguards the rigour of the existence of the real.

The limit was crossed when man realised that his rites, his dances and his invocations didn't really have anything to do with the order of things. Was he right or wrong? We haven't the faintest idea. But what is certain is that we no longer have the old conviction. From that point on, the perspective of the exact sciences was born.

From the moment man thinks that the great clock of nature turns all by itself, and continues to mark the hour even when he isn't there, the order of science is born. The order of science hangs on the following, that in officiating over nature, man has become its officious servant. He will not rule over it, except by obeying it. And like the slave, he tries to make the master dependent on him by serving him well.

He knows that nature could be on time for the rendezvous he might give it. But what is this exactitude? It is precisely the encounter of two times [temps] in nature.

There is a very great clock, which is none other than the solar system, a natural clock which had to be deciphered, and there's no doubt that this was one of the most decisive steps in the constitution of exact science. But man must also have his clock, his watch. Who is on time [exact]?[2] Is it nature? Is it man?

It isn't clear that nature makes every rendezvous. Of course, one can define what is natural as what shows up on time for the rendezvous. When M. de Voltaire said of Buffon's natural history that it wasn't as natural as all that, he was trying to say something of this sort. This is a question of definition – My loved one always makes the rendezvous, because when she doesn't come, I no longer call her my loved one. Is it man who is on time? What is the source of being on time [exactitude], if not precisely in the synchronisation of watches?

Do note that the watch, the reliable watch, has only existed since Huyghens succeeded in making the first perfectly isochronic clock, in 1659, thus inaugurating the universe of precision – to use Alexandre Koyré's expression – without which no truly exact science would be possible. In what does being on time [exactitude] reside? It consists in something which we cause to fall in this clock, in this watch, namely a factor borrowed from natural time – the g factor. You know that, it's the acceleration caused by gravity, in sum, then, a space time relation. It developed out of a certain thought experiment, to use Galileo's term, which is a hypothesis embodied in an instrument. And if the instrument is constructed to confirm the hypothesis, there is no need whatever to do the experiment which confirms it, since the very fact that it works confirms the hypothesis.

But one still has to calibrate this instrument with a unit of time. And a unit of time is always borrowed from, it always refers to, the real, that is, to the fact that it always turns up again in the same place. The unit of time is our sidereal day. If you ask a physicist – for instance let us take M. Borel – he will maintain that, if an imperceptible but not, in the long run, unappreciable slowing down of the rotation of the earth occurred, given that this rotation governs our sidereal day, we would be absolutely incapable, under the present circumstances, of finding evidence of it, given that we regulate our time as a function of this sidereal day, which we cannot control.

[2] There are a series of puns in this passage and those that follow between 'being on time' (exact) and 'the exact sciences'.

I say this to give you a sense of the fact that if one measures space with something solid, one measures time with time – which isn't the same thing.

There's nothing surprising, under these conditions, if a certain part of our exact science comes to be summed up in a very small number of symbols. That is where our requirement that everything be expressed in terms of matter and motion comes from, I mean in terms of matter and time, since, in so far as motion is something in the real, we have in fact succeeded in eliminating it, in reducing it.

The little symbolic game in which Newton's system and that of Einstein is summed up has in the end very little to do with the real. The science which reduces the real to several little letters, to a little bundle of formulae, will probably seem, with the hindsight of later epochs, like an amazing epic, and will also dwindle down, like an epic, to a rather short circuit.

Having considered the foundation of the exactitude of the exact sciences, namely the instrument, we might well go on to ask something else, namely – what are these places? In other words, let us concern ourselves with these places as empty.

It is in fact because this question was raised, contemporaneously with the birth of the exact sciences, that this calculus, which has been ill rather than well understood, began to emerge – the probability calculus, which appears in a truly scientific form for the first time in 1654, with Pascal's treatise on the arithmetic triangle, and emerging in the form of a calculation, not of randomness, but of chances, of the encounter in itself.

What Pascal develops with the arithmetic triangle, the first machine, has a claim on the attention of the scientific world, in that it enables one to determine immediately what a gambler has a right to expect at any given moment when the succession of turns which make up a game is interrupted. A succession of turns is the simplest form one can give to the idea of the encounter. As long as one hasn't come to the end of the sequence of turns fixed by convention, something can be evaluated, that is, the possibilities of the encounter as such. What's at issue is the place, and what does or doesn't come to fill it, something then which is strictly equivalent to its own inexistence. The science of what is found at the same place is substituted for by the science of the combination of places as such. It arises in an ordered register which assuredly assumes the notion of the turn, that is, the notion of scansion.

Everything which up until then had been the science of numbers becomes a combinatory science. The more or less confused, accidental traversal of the world of symbols is organised around the correlation of absence and presence. And the search for the laws of presence and absence will tend towards the establishing of the binary order which leads to what we call cybernetics.

And in keeping on this frontier the originality of what appears in our world in the form of cybernetics, I am tying it to man's waiting. If the science of the combinations of the scanned encounter has come to the attention of man, it is because it deeply concerns him. And it is not for nothing that it comes out of games of chance. And it is not for nothing that game theory is concerned with all the functions of our economic life, the theory of coalitions, of monopolies, the theory of war. Yes, war itself, considered in its aspect as game, detached from anything which might be real. It is not for nothing that the same word designates such diverse fields as well as the game of chance. Now, in the first games I mentioned, what is involved is a relation of intersubjective coordination. Does man make a call on something, does he look for something in the game of chance – and also in the calculation he consecrates to it – whose semantic homophony shows that it must have some relation with intersubjectivity, even though in the game of chance it seems to have been eliminated? Here we come very close to the central question with which I began, namely – what is the chance of the unconscious, which in some way lies behind man?

In the game of chance no doubt he will test his luck [chance], but also he is going to read his destiny in it. He has the idea that something is revealed there, which belongs to him, and, I would say, all the more so given that there is no one confronting him.

I've told you how the entire movement of the theory converges on a binary symbol, on the fact that anything can be written in terms of 0 and 1. What else is needed before what we call cybernetics can appear in the world?

It has to function in the real, independently of any subjectivity. This science of empty places, of encounters in and of themselves has to be combined, has to be totalised and has to start functioning all by itself.

What is required for that? To support this, something must be taken from the real. From the beginning, man has tried to join the real in the play of symbols. He has written things on the wall, he has even imagined that things like Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin, get written all by themselves on walls, he has placed figures at the spot where, at each hour of the day, the shadow of the sun comes to rest. But in the end, the symbols always stayed where they were intended to be placed. Stuck in this real, one might think that they were just its landmark.

What's new is having permitted them to fly with their own wings. And this has come about thanks to a simple, commonplace apparatus, which anyone can use, an apparatus where all you need do is turn the handle – a door.

Please give this a thought – a door isn't entirely real. To take it for such would result in strange misunderstandings. If you observe a door, and you deduce from that that it produces draughts, you'd take it under your arm to the desert to cool you down.

I have spent a considerable amount of time looking in all the dictionaries for the meaning of a door. There are two pages in Littré on the door – ranging from door as opening to door as more or less hinged means of closure, from the Sublime Porte to the door with which one makes a mask on the nose – if you come back, I'll mask your face with it, as Regnard writes.[3] After this, without further comment, Littré writes that a door must either be open or shut. That didn't entirely satisfy me, despite its literary echoes, because I am naturally suspicious when it comes to the wisdom of nations – there are a lot of things written into it, but in a form which is a little confusional, and that is indeed why psychoanalysis exists. A door must, it is true, be either open or shut. But they aren't equivalent.

Language can help us here. A door, my God, opens on to fields, but we don't say that it closes on to the sheepfold, nor on to the paddock. I'm aware that here I am confusing porta and fores, which is the door of the paddock, but one more confusion won't make much difference at this point, so we'll pursue our meditation on the door.

One might think, because I've spoken of the field and the sheepfold, that what is at issue is the inside and the outside. I think this would be a serious mistake – we live in a sufficiently grand age to imagine a great wall which would go exactly round the earth, and if you knock a door through it, which is the inside, which is the outside?

You don't think a door is any the more generous for being open. We say that a window gives on to open country. It is rather bizarre that, when we say that a door gives on to somewhere, it is generally a door which is for the most part closed and sometimes even blocked up . . .

One takes to the door sometimes, and it is always a pretty decisive act. And more often than not, a door is denied you.

There may be two people watching either side of a door, but try to imagine that happening with a window. You can break down a door – even when it is open. Naturally, as Alphonse Allais used to say, that is dumb and cruel. On the contrary, going in by the window is always viewed as a free and easy act, and always intentional, whereas one often goes through a door without noticing it. Thus, to a first approximation, the door doesn't have the same instrumental function as the window.

[3] 'Si vous revenez, je vous en fais un masque sur le nez.'

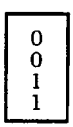
In its nature, the door belongs to the symbolic order, and it opens up either on to the real, or the imaginary, we don't know quite which, but it is either one or the other. There is an asymmetry between the opening and the closing – if the opening of the door controls access, when closed, it closes the circuit. The door is a real symbol, the symbol par excellence, that symbol in which man's passing, through the cross it sketches, intersecting access and closure, can always be recognised.

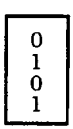
Once it has become possible to fold the two characteristics together, to construct an enclosure, that is to say a circuit, so that something passes when it is closed, and doesn't when it is open, that is when the science of the conjuncture passes into the realm of realisation of cybernetics. If there are machines which calculate all by themselves, add, do sums, do all the marvellous things which man had until then thought to be peculiar to his thinking, it is because the fairy electricity, as we say, enables us to establish circuits, circuits which open and close, which interrupt themselves or restore themselves, as a function of the existence of cybernetised doors.

Note that what's important about this is the relation as such, of access and closure. Once the door is open, it closes. When it is closed, it opens. A door isn't either open or shut, it must be either open and then shut, and then opened and then shut. Thanks to the electrical circuit, and to the induction circuit connected on to it, that is to say what is called feedback,[4] it's sufficient for the door to close for it to be returned by an electro-magnet to an open state and that is its closure again, and its opening again. In this way what is called an oscillation is produced. This oscillation is the scansion. And the scansion is the basis upon which one can inscribe indefinitely the ordered action through employing a series of montages which will be nothing more than child's play.

Here are four cases for a door – in the first two, a closed door, in the others, an open door.



For another door, we can have alternatively an open or a closed door.



[4] English in the original.

As the fancy might take you, you now decide, for instance, that a third door will be open or closed under certain circumstances, depending on the position of the two preceding doors.

0	1	:	1
1	0	:	1
1	1	:	1

– Formula 1 –

For the third door to be open, all that's needed is that at least one of the preceding ones be open.

There are other formulae. You can decide that the two doors have to be open for the third one to be open.

1	1	:	1

– Formula 2 –

The third formula has considerable interest:

0	0	:	0
0	1	:	1
1	0	:	1
1	1	:	0

Here, you decide that the third door will only be open when only one of the two doors is.

What does all this amount to? Anything one wishes. Formula 1 can be called, from a logical perspective, reunion or conjunction. Formula 2 also has a logical reading and since its law merges with that of arithmetic multiplication, it is sometimes called logical multiplication. Finally, formula 3 is addition modulus 2. When you add 1 and 1, in a world of binary notation, you get 0 and you carry 1.

Once we have the possibility of embodying this 0, this 1, the notation of presence and absence, in the real, embodying it in a rhythm, a fundamental scansion, something moves into the real, and we are left asking ourselves – perhaps not for very long, but after all some substantial minds are doing so – whether we have a machine that thinks.

We are very well aware that this machine doesn't think. We made the machine, and it thinks what it has been told to think. But if the machine doesn't think, it is obvious that we don't think either when we are performing an operation. We follow the very same procedures as the machine.

The important thing here is to realise that the chain of possible combinations of the encounter can be studied as such, as an order which subsists in its rigour, independently of all subjectivity.

Through cybernetics, the symbol is embodied in an apparatus – with which it is not to be confused, the apparatus being just its support. And it is embodied in it in a literally trans-subjective way.

I've had to proceed by paths which may seem to you to have been long-winded. But you have to have them in your minds in order to understand the true meaning of the contribution of cybernetics, and in particular the notion of the message.

4

In cybernetics, the notion of the message has nothing in common with what we usually call a message, which always has a meaning. The cybernetic message is a sequence of signs. And a sequence of signs always comes down to a series of 0s and 1s. That is indeed why what is called the unit of information, that is to say what the efficacity of any kind of sign is measured against, always refers back to a primary unit called the keyboard, which is nothing other than the alternative, quite simply.

Within this system of symbols, the message is caught in a banal network, that of the combination of the encounter on the basis of a unified scansion, that is to say of a 1 which is the scansion itself.

On the other hand, the notion of information is as simple to grasp as one of these little tables I've been drawing for you.

1	1	:	1

Let us start with this table, which should read as follows – I must have two positive plays to win. This means that at the beginning, I have an expectation of 1/4. Suppose that I have already had one go. If it was negative, I haven't got another chance. If it was positive, I have one chance in two, 1/2. This means that a differentiation of level has come about with respect to my chances, in the form of an increase.

The phenomena of energy and of nature always tend in the direction of an equalisation of levels of difference. In the order of the message and of the calculation of chances, to the extent that the information increases, the difference in levels becomes more differentiated. I am not saying it always increases, for you may find cases in which it doesn't, but it doesn't necessarily diminish, and always tends towards differentiation.

Everything we call language can be organised around this basic element. In order for language to come into being, insignificant little things such as spelling and syntax have to be introduced. But all that is a given from the start, because these tables constitute a syntax, and that is indeed why one can get machines to undertake logical operations.

In other words, within this perspective, syntax exists before semantics. Cybernetics is a science of syntax, and it is in a good position to help us perceive that the exact sciences do nothing other than tie the real to a syntax.

So what is semantics, that is to say concrete languages, those we deal with, with their ambiguities, their emotional content, their human meaning? Are we going to say that semantics is peopled, furnished with the desire of men?

What is certain is that it is us who introduce meaning. In any case it is certain for a great number of things. But can we say that everything circulating in the machine has no meaning whatsoever? Certainly not in all the senses of the word meaning, because, for the message to be a message, not only must there be a sequence of signs, but there has to be a sequence of directed signs. For it to function in accordance with a syntax, the machine must run in a certain direction. And when I say machine, you can sense that it isn't simply a little box – when I am writing on paper, when I go through the transformations of the little 1s and 0s, that also is always a directed activity.

It is therefore not entirely rigorous to say that it is human desire which, all by itself, introduces meaning into this primitive language. The proof of that is that nothing unexpected comes out of the machine. That is to say, not so much what interests us, but what we predicted. It stops just where we have determined that it would stop, and that's where a certain result can be read.

The foundation of the system is already in play. How could it be established if it didn't rest on the notion of chance, that is to say on a certain pure anticipation, which already has a meaning?

So this is the symbol in its most purified form. The latter can already by itself yield more than mistakes in syntax. Mistakes in syntax engender only errors, they are only accidents. But mistakes in programming engender falsehood. Already, at this level, the true and the false are at stake. What does that signify for us analysts? What are we faced with when the human subject addresses himself to us?

His discourse is an impure discourse. Impure – is it so just because of mistakes in syntax? No, of course not. The whole of psychoanalysis is quite rightly founded on the fact that getting something meaningful out of human discourse isn't a matter of logic. We look behind this discourse, which has its own meaning, for its meaning, in another meaning, and precisely in the symbolic function which is manifested through it. And also there now emerges another meaning of the world symbol.

At this point we come upon a precious fact revealed to us by cybernetics – there is something in the symbolic function of human discourse that cannot be eliminated, and that is the role played in it by the imaginary.

The first symbols, natural symbols, stem from a certain number of prevailing images – the image of the human body, the image of a certain number of obvious objects like the sun, the moon, and some others. And that is what gives human language its weight, its resources, and its emotional vibration. Is this imaginary homogeneous with the symbolic? No. And it would be a perversion of the meaning of psychoanalysis to reduce it to an emphasis on these imaginary themes, to the coaptation of the subject by an elective, privileged, prevailing object, which gives the modulus of what is called, in what has now become a fashionable term, the object relation.

The one thing which cybernetics clearly highlights is the radical difference between the symbolic and the imaginary orders. A cybernetician recently admitted to me the extreme difficulty one has, whatever is said about it, in translating cybernetically the functions of Gestalt, that is the coaptation of good forms. And what is good form in living nature is bad form in the symbolic.

As has often be said, man invented the wheel. The wheel isn't to be found in nature, but it is a good form, that of the circle. On the other hand, in nature you won't find a wheel which describes the trace of one of its points on each of its circuits. There is no cycloid in the imaginary. The cycloid is a discovery in the symbolic. And whereas the latter can easily be produced by a cybernetic machine, one encounters unprecedented difficulties, except in the most artificial manner, in getting one circle to correspond to another by means of a dialogue between two machines.

That is what highlights the essential distinction between the two planes – that of the imaginary and that of the symbolic.

There is an inertia in the imaginary which we find making itself felt in the discourse of the subject, sowing discord in the discourse, making it such that I do not realise that when I mean someone well, I mean him ill, that when I love him, it is myself that I love, or when I think I love myself, it is precisely at this moment that I love an other. It is precisely the exercise of the dialectic of analysis which should dissipate this imaginary confusion, and restitute to the discourse its meaning as discourse.

The issue is to know whether the symbolic exists as such, or whether the symbolic is simply the fantasy of the second degree of the imaginary coaptations. This is where there is a choice between two orientations of analysis.

Given that, through the vicissitudes of history, all meanings have for a long time been accumulating as semantic ballast, is it a matter of following the subject in the direction which he has given, in the here and now, to his discourse, in that he knows that he is engaged in psychoanalysis, and that psychoanalysis has formulated certain norms? Is it a matter of encouraging him to be a good person, to become someone of substance who has attained instinctual maturity, leaving behind the stages in which the image of this or that orifice dominates? Is it a matter, in analysis, of a coaptation of these fundamental images, of a rectification, of a normalisation in terms of the imaginary, or of a liberation of meaning in the discourse, in this continuation of the universal discourse in which the subject is engaged? That is where the schools diverge.

Freud had this sense of meaning in the highest degree, which accounts for the fact that so many of his works, The Three Caskets for instance, read as if they were written by a divine, as if they were guided by a meaning belonging to the order of poetical inspiration. What's at issue is knowing whether or not, yes or no, analysis will continue in the Freudian direction, searching not for the ineffable, but for meaning.

What is the meaning of meaning? Meaning is the fact that the human being isn't master of this primordial, primitive language. He has been thrown into it, committed, caught up in its gears.

We don't know the origin. We are told, for instance, that the cardinal numbers appeared in languages before the ordinal numbers. That hadn't been expected. One might have thought that man comes upon number by way of the ordinal, through dancing, through civil and religious procession, the order of precedence, the organisation of the city, which is nothing more than order and hierarchy. And yet the cardinal number came first, the linguists tell me.

We must marvel at the paradox. Here man isn't master in his own house. There is something into which he integrates himself, which through its combinations already governs. The passage of man from the order of nature to the order of culture follows the same mathematical combinations which will be used to classify and explain. Claude Lévi-Strauss calls them the elementary structures of kinship. And yet primitive men are not supposed to have been Pascals. Man is engaged with all his being in the procession of numbers, in a primitive symbolism which is distinct from imaginary representations. It is in the middle of that that something of man has to gain recognition. But what has to be recognised, Freud teaches us, is not expressed, but repressed.

With a machine, whatever doesn't come on time simply falls by the wayside and makes no claims on anything. This is not true for man, the scansion is alive, and whatever doesn't come on time remains in suspense. That is what is involved in repression.

No doubt something which isn't expressed doesn't exist. But the repressed is always there, insisting, and demanding to be. The fundamental relation of man to this symbolic order is very precisely what founds the symbolic order itself – the relation of non-being to being.

What insists on being satisfied can only be satisfied in recognition. The end of the symbolic process is that non-being come to be, because it has spoken.

VERBUM AND DABAR
THE MACHINE AND INTUITION
SCHEMA OF THE CURE
THE LIBIDINAL AND THE SYMBOLIC

In the course of our penultimate meeting, the question I put to you had mixed responses, and that session has had a variety of impacts on the minds of those who participated in it. For me it was a way of tuning my instrument for what I had to tell you in my paper on psychoanalysis and cybernetics. I hope you also found it useful.

Although I didn't pause to consider it at the time, because the way things were going, it would have given you even more of a feeling of aberration, I did take in your remark about Hebrew. So, what were you trying to tell me, when you said to me that the verbum of the first verse of St John was the Hebrew dabar? What grounds do you have for that?

It isn't a trap. I thought about it again, an hour ago, and I am no better up on this than you are, almost certainly less so.

M. X: Well, first of all, I would say that there is an a priori fact which leads us to think that.

If it really is certain that St John wrote in Greek, that doesn't necessarily entail that he thought in Greek, and that his logos was the Babylonian logos for instance. You say he was thinking of the Hebrew dabar. Can you tell me why? Because it isn't the only way to render what dabar means in Hebrew.

M. X: To give a summary of the question, I would say that one doesn't find one truly Platonic concept in St John. It is a fact, and I could prove it to you. What is interesting, is that in general logos . . .

Who is saying anything about Platonic concepts? I paused over this verbum so as to bring it closer on this occasion to the Latin use, which is sufficiently signposted by the use Saint Augustine makes of it in De Significatione, which we discussed last year. You should have a clearer sense of all its implications after my last lecture. I put it to you that the verbum was perhaps prior to any speech, and even to the fiat of Genesis, as a kind of prior axiomatic. And at that point you objected that it is the Hebrew dabar.

M. X: Because you said – in the beginning was language. Upon which Leclaire said – not language, but speech. And I agreed.

There are two questions. First, why does dabar underlie the logos of St John? And then, does dabar mean speech rather than anything else? Deal with these two questions. So, why dabar?

M. X: For two reasons. The first is that it is quite clearly an implicit reference to the beginning of Genesis.

At the beginning of Genesis, we find, verse 3 – fiat lux, precisely va'omer. It isn't at all dabar, va'omer. In fact it is exactly the opposite.

M. X: No! it isn't exactly the opposite!

Tell me why.

M. X: There is a Rabbinical tradition which has nominalised this third verse of Genesis, into something like a mediating entity between the Creator and the creation, and this would be speech, as there is wisdom. But what is certain is that the entire Biblical tradition contains no concept of ratio, of logos in the Greek sense. That is what Bultmann has shown through very deep analysis. The concept of the universe doesn't exist in the Biblical tradition. It is completely lacking in the concept of a fixed, determinate law whereby everything is linked together, which is what the Greek concept of logos means, the rationality of the world, the world considered as a whole in which everything happens in a linked, logical manner. The Hebrews always talk of a totality of things, or the sky and the earth and all that. But they do not think in static, essentialist concepts.

Having heard my lecture, do you think that, when I speak of a radical symbolic order, I have in mind this game of places, this initial conjecture, this original conjectural game, prior to the advent of determinism, prior to any rationalised notion of the universe? If I may put it this way, that's the rational prior to its conjunction with the real. Do you think that is what I have in mind? Is it the four causalities, the principle of sufficient reason, the whole caboodle?

M. X: But if you say in the beginning was language, it is like a retrospective projection of present-day rationality.

It is not for me to say it. I'm not saying it, St John is.

M. X: No, he doesn't say that.

Come on, Father Beirnaert, because we are in the middle of trying to demonstrate the philological expertise of X. That the Semites never had the notion of a universe as closed as the 0, whose system Aristotle gives us, is one thing.

M. X: It is essentially in motion and without rational law. What happens in nature is the resonances of God's speech. It is a universe which isn't determined, isn't rational, historical if you want, where everything happens through personal initiatives.

Yes, but that doesn't mean that it isn't rational, since it is speech which modulates it.

M. X: I would say – not essentialist.

And you, Father Beirnaert?

FATHER BEIRNAERT: I've been through the Holy Scriptures, like everyone else.

Do you know what a certain Burnett did?

M. X: Yes.

He studied the first verse of St John with great care. I wasn't able to find his text since you raised this objection, but I can more or less remember the conclusion. He says that behind the logos of St John, what is assumed is the Aramaic memmra.

M. X: That is the same thing as dabar in Hebrew. It is dabar which has been rendered substantial, rabbinical, as I told you.

That's not the point.

M. X: That is to say that several things have led to this first verse. You have the tradition of Genesis, then the current of Rabbinical thought.

In any case, memmra is far closer to va'omer from the first verse of Genesis, it is the first root. I looked up dabar an hour ago in the Genesius. It is an embodied imperative, of the style, duxit, locutus est, and even includes the translation of insidiatus est, to engage, to seduce. Its precise implication is everything which is warped, vitiated, corrupted, in connection with speech, when it descends to the archi-temporal. In any case, dabar is always whatever is alluring, deceiving, speech at its most self-invalidating in relation to ammara.

M. X: No, not always. For instance, thunder is the speech of God, and not in the self-invalidating sense. What you're talking of is a secondary meaning, but it isn't the primary meaning.

But it shows the point to which the movement of derivation of the meaning tends.

M. X: It can derive, obviously it can derive.

It is clearly attested.

M. X: Of course, but that doesn't prove anything.

But in any case it shows that nothing allows us to identify this dabar with the albeit problematic usage, let us say, since one does get quite attached to it, of logos in the Greek text of St John.

M. X: In any case, one thing is certain, the Platonic sense of logos must be excluded, for it is totally absent everywhere else.

But that isn't what I had in mind.

M. X: In any case it must not be translated by language.

As far as the logos in question is concerned, one mustn't neglect the inflection that the Latin verbum yields. We can turn it into something completely different from the reason for things, namely this play of absence and presence which already provides the frame for fiat. For, in the end, fiat is made on a backdrop of the un-made which is prior to it.[1] In other words, I think that it isn't inconceivable that even the fiat, the most primary of creative speeches, is secondary.

M. X: Yes. But I would say that one is there placed at the beginning of the temporal historic order, and one doesn't go beyond, as you are insinuating.

Saying, when it's a matter of speech, in principle, in principio, has a mirage aspect to it.

M. X: I'm not sure I follow you now.

Once things are structured in a certain imaginary intuition, they seem to have been there from the beginning, but that is a mirage, of course. Your objection is to say that there is a retro-action of this constituted world, in a model or archetype which would constitute it. But it isn't necessarily the archetype. I absolutely exclude from what I am teaching you the retro-action in an archetype which would amount to a condensation. It's not the Platonic logos, the eternal forms.

M. X: For my part, I've always understood language in contrast to speech, like this condensation, this essence of all that there is.

I was trying to get you to understand another meaning of the word language.

M. X: Ah!

[1] In French, 'fait' and 'non-fait'.

What's at issue is a succession of absences and presences, or rather of presence on a background of absence, of absence constituted by the fact that a presence can exist. There is no absence in the real. There is only absence if you suggest that there may be a presence there when there isn't one. In the in principio, I am proposing to locate the word in so far as it creates the opposition, the contrast. It is the original contradiction of 0 and 1.

M. X: Then, in what way is it opposed to speech?

It gives it its radical condition.

M. X: Yes, but to my way of thinking, you can designate this condition as satisfactorily by speech as by language, because it is so far beyond this opposition.

That is true. But that's what I want to point out to you. It is this kind of master word, if I may call it so, which is at issue, and not the register of dabar, which is in some sense the legalist orientation.

M. X: Oh!

You can check Genesius again when you get home.

M. X: But I have studied all these texts. There is a long article by Guideau which collects all the possible texts together, and he doesn't take it in this direction. I find him more sophisticated than Genesius, which points in the direction of what you are saying – insidious.

The fact that dabar can include insidiatus est shows the extent to which it can be inflected.

M. X: It may inflect, yes, the way speech can become chatter.

FATHER BEIRNAERT: It is the same with the word parole in French – Il parle [he talks], that is, he does nothing.

That's not quite right, because dabar doesn't include the sense of emptiness.

M. X: There's a text, Isaiah, fifty-five – God's speech comes down to earth, and returns as if fertilised. It is creative speech, not insidious speech, and it corresponds to the Aramaic memmra, in part rendered a little substantial, it is speech imbued with life.

You think that is the meaning of the Aramaic memmra? You think that this speech makes any compromise with life? Here we're on the level of the death instinct.

M. X: That comes from the tendency to try to understand what is there as an intermediary between the person who is speaking and what he produces. It must have a certain consistency, and that is the beginning, if you like, of a speculative tendency in Hebraic thought.

What, dabar?

M. X: Memmra.

You think so?

M. X: Yes, that's the Rabbinical tradition.

FATHER BEIRNAERT: When does memmra appear?

M. X: It must date from the third century.

In the article by Burnett that I mentioned, he shows, by all kinds of cross-checkings, that St John thought in Aramaic.

M. X and FATHER BEIRNAERT: That is certain.

What you call the Rabbinical tradition is its gnostic inflection.

M. X: Yes, it obviously allows gnostic thought to gain a hold, but it isn't gnostic in itself. It is essentially legalist thought, seeking to codify everything.

You don't think dabar is closer to that?

M. X: No, memmra.

2

I am not engaging you in an ex cathedra teaching. I don't think it would befit our object, language and speech, for me to bring something apodictic for you here, something you would just have to record and put in your pocket. Of course, as things go on, there is more and more language in our pockets, and it even overflows into our brains, which doesn't make that much difference there – you can always put your handkerchief over it.

If there is a true speech behind this discourse, it is yours, my listeners, as much, if not more, than mine.

Last time I asked you to put questions to me. And as they proved to be a bit lightweight, I suggested a theme to you – what do you make of what I am trying to get at vis-à-vis language and speech? On this topic, some valuable objections were in fact formulated and the fact that they were halted in the course of explication, and that they even sometimes generated a certain confusion, wasn't in the least discouraging. It simply means that analysis is in progress.

As the lecture I gave might seem to be the dialectical culmination of everything which has been triggered by this year's work, I ask you again today, if you have any questions to put to me. Today I ask you once again to risk yourselves in the unknown, in this zone of ignorance, which we must never forget in the analytic experience, for it is the position we automatically adopt.

Some say that, as far as analytic theory is concerned, it is I who build, who put my construction to you, and you, you go off with it. I don't want any of that. Vis-à-vis this archetypal, Platonic order, about which you know I have such reservations, vis-à-vis this original speech which is there to give us the emergence of the symbolic, we are in the position of having to conceive, in the full sense of the word.

We do not think for one moment that everything has already been written. As M. Lefèbvre-Pontalis pointed out the other day, there wouldn't be anything at all if a speaking subject didn't exist. And that is why, for something new to come into existence, ignorance must exist. That is the position we are in, and that is why we must conceive, in the full sense. When we know something, we are already not conceiving anything any longer.

Who will take the floor? M. Marchant, who looks as if the spirit has descended upon him?

M. MARCHANT: The spirit which has descended on me at this moment would rather make me protest. What is the point of our asking questions?

There may have been some turn in my discourse, in my last lecture, which may have seemed too abrupt, too elusive, abridged, forgotten for you, and which stops you seeing the connection.

M. MARCHANT: I'm pitching my question at a far higher level, if I may say so. We have been listening here, for a number of months, to a seminar from which we have each drawn what we could. If we ask questions, we'll always have a tendency to bring all this down to things on a more solid level, if one may say so, with all the ill effects that implies.

We do these things to end up with practice, and don't forget that the latter is entirely conceptualised.

M. VALABREGA: I have a question about your paper. You spoke of triangularity, which may or may not be recognised by the cybernetic machine. Does this notion then belong to the imaginary or to the symbolic order? Since you spoke of ignorance just now, I though of Nicholas da Cusa, who, throughout the whole of the first part of the De Docta Ignorantia engages in a formal analysis of the notion of triangularity, and ties it, it seems to me, to the symbol.

You are alluding to what I said about the special difficulties one encounters in formalising, in the symbolic sense of the word, certain Gestalten. And I didn't take the triangle as my example, but the circle, and that's not the same thing.

M. VALABREGA: In what I said, I alluded to the fact that the cybernetic machine may or may not recognise a form, depending on its position in space. I then got confused, and so did others – we no longer knew whether, for you, the circularity or triangularity pertains to the symbolic or the imaginary order in these experiments.

Everything intuitive is far closer to the imaginary than to the symbolic. It is very much a present-day concern of mathematical thought to eliminate the intuitive elements as thoroughly as possible. The intuitive element is considered to be an impurity in the development of the mathematical symbolic. This isn't to say, however, that mathematicians consider the issue settled. Some think intuition cannot be eliminated. Nevertheless, there remains the aspiration to reduce everything to an axiomatic.

When it comes to the machine, I think that it cannot, of course, settle the question. But note what happens each time we try to put the machine in a position to recognise good form, despite all the aberrations of perspective. Gestalt theory says that, for us, it is the simplest thing to recognise good form in intuition, in the imagination. With the machine, we never produce an effect founded on a simplicity of the same order – it is always through the most complex, the most artificial compositions, by a point-by-point sweeping of space, a scanning,[2] and by means of formulae which are in consequence very complicated, that one recomposes what one could call the sensitivity of the machine to a particular form. In other words, good forms do not constitute the simplest formulae for the machine. Which is already a sufficient indication in experience of the opposition between the imaginary and the symbolic.

M. VALABREGA: I didn't make myself clear. The debate you're referring to, concerning the origins of mathematics, between intuitionists and non-intuitionists, is certainly very interesting, but it is an old one, and it is besides the point when it comes to the question I'm raising, which has to do with the idea and not the perception of a triangle or a circle. It is the pointedness that there is in the very notion of triangularity, for instance, which I am getting at.

We could take another look at the text you mentioned. I read a part of it again this year on the subject of maxima and minima, but I'm no longer very clear how Nicholas da Cusa tackles the question of the triangle. I think that for him the triangle is far more the ternary than the triangle.

M. VALABREGA: I am not specifically referring to him. It seems to me that the notion of triangularity, whatever the intuitionist or non-intuitionist positions of mathematicians, cannot be other than symbolic.

Without a doubt.

M. VALABREGA: Well then, the cybernetic machine should recognise this triangularity, which it doesn't. That is why you, it seems, were inclined to say that triangularity in fact belonged to the imaginary order.

[2] English in the original.

Absolutely not.

One must give a far more problematic sense to the fact that the machine recognises. This triangularity you're talking about is in some way the very structure of the machine. It is the basis on which the machine comes into being as such. If we have 0 and 1, something comes after. It is on the basis of a succession that the independence of 0 and 1 can be established, the symbolic generation of the connotations of presence-absence. I showed you that the logical product, logical addition, always requires three columns. In one such margin, 0 and 1 will make 1, and in another, 0 and 1 will make 0. In other words, the ternarity is essential to the structure of the machine. And, of course, I prefer ternarity to triangularity, which lends itself to an image.

M. VALABREGA: I wasn't talking about ternarity, but about triangularity. I was talking about the triangle itself, about the notion of the triangularity of the triangle, and not of ternarity.

You mean the triangle as form?

M. VALABREGA: If this notion belongs, as I think it does, to the symbolic order, it is inexplicable why one can't build a cybernetic machine which recognises the form of the triangle.

Quite specifically in so far as it belongs to the order of the imaginary.

M. VALABREGA: So it doesn't belong to the symbolic order.

It is the function 3 which is really minimal in the machine.

M. RIGUET: Yes. One could generalise the question somewhat, asking whether the machine can recognise a certain ternary relation in another machine? The answer is yes. Whether it recognises the triangle in all cases is, in my view, perhaps not an impossible question, although it is far from being resolved. But, within the order of forms, the triangle is highly symbolised – there are no triangles in nature.

M. VALABREGA: If the problem were insoluble, one would have to suppose that the notion of triangularity at issue didn't belong to the symbolic order, but also to the imaginary order.

Yes.

M. VALABREGA: If only concrete elaborated concepts exist, there is a contradiction with research in axiomatics. In axiomatics, it seems that one eliminates – at least in large part, a residue is all that is left, and some people have said that there is nothing left over – the concrete concepts of intuition. That's a question.

You mean that there is as wide a margin as one wants. The problem remains open.

M. VALABREGA: Yes, in the sense that you yourself said that the triangle doesn't exist in nature. So then, what is this intuition? It isn't a concrete concept, an elaboration on the basis of existing forms. It is a notion, it is symbolic.

M. RIGUET: In recent researches in axiomatics, a triangle is something symbolic, for a triangle is a certain relation.

Yes. One can reduce the triangle to a certain relation.

M. RIGUET: A notion of the incidence between points and straight lines.

As a consequence, the machine must be able to recognise it in the end?

M. RIGUET: Yes. But one must define very precisely the universe of all the forms which we can consider. And you ask the machine to recognise a well determined form from amongst these.

It is on the basis of an already effected symbolic reduction of forms, in fact of the work already performed by the machine, that one asks the real, concrete machine to operate.

M. MARCHANT: That's a matter of description.

No, I don't think so.

M. RIGUET: It is a description of the relation which you impose on this incidental relation, requiring it to have a certain number of properties, without, however, enumerating them. It is a non-enumerative description, because you don't draw up a list of all the straight lines, of all the points you are considering, but a list of all the points, lines, etc. in nature. That is where the imaginary comes in.

M. MARCHANT: Where do you place this concept, in what domain?

M. RIGUET: It isn't very useful, if you don't situate yourself within the framework of a deterministic axiomatic. I've talked of the incidence of the straight line, but there are other ways of axiomatising elementary geometry.

O. MANNONI: One can in fact constitute the triangle schematically, even without knowing that we are talking about a triangle. How are we to be sure that the triangle we are drawing is a triangle? That is a problem concerning the relation of the symbolic to the imaginary, and it's very obscure.

Yes. Taken in the opposite sense, if I may say so.

O. MANNONI: Yes, the other way around.

M. RIGUET: When you recognise a triangle drawn on a sheet of paper, you accumulate a certain number of properties which have their correlate in the axiomatic model which you are considering.

O. MANNONI: So, you speak two languages which translate.

Absolutely.

O. MANNONI: So the imaginary is already language, already symbolic.

The language embodied in a human language is made up of, and there's no doubt about this, choice images which all have a specific relation with the living existence of the human being, with quite a narrow sector of its biological reality, with the image of the fellow being. This imaginary experience furnishes ballast for every concrete language, and by the same token for every verbal exchange, with this something which makes it a human language – in the most down to earth and most ordinary sense of the word human, in the English sense of 'human'.[3]

It is precisely through that that it may be an obstacle to the progress of the realisation of the subject in the symbolic order, whose pure function manifests itself in a thousand ways in human life, a function connotable in terms of presence and absence, of being and non-being.

And that is indeed why we are always faced with some sort of resistance opposing the restitution of the integral text of the symbolic exchange. We are embodied beings, and we always think by means of some imaginary go-between, which halts, stops, clouds up the symbolic mediation. The latter is perpetually ground up, interrupted.

O. MANNONI: What bothers me is the feeling I have that this imaginary lining doesn't just grind up, but is the indispensable nourishment of the symbolic language, and that language, if completely deprived of this nourishment, becomes the machine, that is to say something which is no longer human.

Don't be soft. Don't go and say that the machine is really rather nasty and that it clutters up our lives. That is not what is at stake. The machine is simply the succession of little 0s and 1s, so that the question as to whether it is human or not is obviously entirely settled – it isn't. Except, there's also the question of knowing whether the human, in the sense in which you understand it, is as human as all that.

O. MANNONI: That is a very serious question.

All the same, the notion of humanism, which I won't give you a seminar on, seems to me to be for us sufficiently weighed down by history so as to be capable of being considered as a particular position realised within a very much localised field which we imprudently continue to call humanity. And we shouldn't be surprised by the fact that the symbolic order is absolutely irreducible to what is commonly called human experience. You tell me that there would be nothing if it weren't embodied in this imagination. We don't doubt it for a minute, but are all the roots there? Nothing entitles us to say so. Not only hasn't the empirical deduction of whole numbers been accomplished, but it even seems to have been proved that it can't be.

I will try to relate all these considerations to the little summarising schema I've already introduced you to.

At the beginning of the third chapter of Beyond the Pleasure Principle, Freud explains the stages of the process of analysis. An illuminating text, a copy of which you should all have in your pockets, so that you can refer to it at any moment.

First, he says, we took as our goal the resolution of the symptom by giving it its signification. Some insights were gained and even some effects were produced by using this procedure.

FATHER BEIRNAERT: Why?

What I am teaching you only tries to express the conditions thanks to which what Freud says is possible. Why? you ask. Because the symptom is in itself, through and through, signification, that is to say, truth, truth taking shape. It is to be distinguished from the natural index in that it is already structured in terms of signified and signifier, with all that that entails, namely the play of signifiers. Even within the concrete given of the symptom, there is already a precipitation into signifying material. The symptom is the inverse side of a discourse.

FATHER BEIRNAERT: But how is immediate communication to the patient efficacious?

The communication of the signification to the patient cures to the extent that it produces Überzeugung, that is to say, conviction. The subject integrates the explication which you give him into the set of significations he has already admitted, and that may have an effect, in a punctual way, in wild analysis. But it is far from being generally the case.

That is why we move on to the second stage, in which the necessity of integration in the imaginary is recognised. What must emerge is not simply understanding of the signification, but reminiscence properly speaking, that is the passage into the imaginary. The patient has to reintegrate the sequence of significations which had not been recognised [méconnaître] into this imaginary continuum which we call the ego, to recognise it as being his, to integrate it into his biography. At the moment, I am following the beginning of the third chapter of Beyond the Pleasure Principle.

Third stage – one realises that that isn't enough, namely that there is an inertia peculiar to what is already structured within the imaginary.

The main emphasis, during the course of these efforts, the text goes on, falls on the resistances of the patient. Now the art is to discover in the quickest possible manner these resistances, to show them to the patient, and to move him, push him through human influence, to bring him to give up these resistances. Even via this path, it is not always entirely possible to achieve the coming to consciousness, the becoming conscious of the unconscious. All this remembering is not, perhaps, strictly the essential thing, if one doesn't at the same time obtain Überzeugung, conviction.[4]

You have to read the text as I do, in German, for the French text – as a result of the art of the translator – has something greyish, pasty about it, which conceals the violence of the picture Freud is sketching.

Freud insists on the following, that after the reduction of the resistances, there is a residue which may be what is essential. Here he introduces the notion of repetition, Wiederholung. It consists essentially in the following, he says, that on the side of what is repressed, on the unconscious side of things, there is no resistance, there is only a tendency to repeat.

In this same text, Freud underlines the originality of his new topography. The simple qualitative connotation unconscious/conscious isn't the essential thing here. The line of cleavage doesn't pass between the unconscious and the conscious, but between, on the one hand, something which is repressed and tends simply to repeat itself, that is to say speech which insists, this unconscious modulation of which I talk, and on the other hand, something which is an obstacle to it, and which is organised in another manner, namely the ego. If you read this text in the light of the notions which I believe I have inured you to, you will see that the ego is strictly located there as belonging to the order of the imaginary. And Freud stresses that all resistance as such comes from this order.

Before I leave you, and since one must punctuate, put in a final full stop, to serve you as an orientation table, I will turn once again to the four poles which I have more than once written on the board.

I begin with A, which is the radical Other, that of the eighth or ninth hypothesis of Parmenides, which is equally the real pole of the subjective relation and is what Freud ties the relation to the death instinct to.

Then, here you have m, the ego, and a, the other which isn't an other at all, since it is essentially coupled with the ego, in a relation which is always reflexive, interchangeable – the ego is always an alter-ego.

Here you have S, which is simultaneously the subject, the symbol, and also the Es. The symbolic realisation of the subject, which is always a symbolic creation, is the relation between A and S. It is subjacent, unconscious, essential to every subjective situation.

This schematisation doesn't start off with an isolated and absolute subject.

[4] See GW XIII 16; Stud III 228; SE XVIII 18.

Everything is tied to the symbolic order, since there are men in the world and they speak. And what is transmitted and tends to get constituted is an immense message into which the entire real is little by little retransplanted, recreated, remade. The symbolisation of the real tends to be equivalent to the universe, and the subjects are only relays, supports in it. What we get up to in all this is to make a break on the level of one of these couplings.

You won't understand anything unless you start with this, which the whole of Freud's work teaches us and reminds us of. Take the schema of the psychic apparatus, which appears in one of the little manuscripts Freud used to send Fliess, and also at the end of The Interpretation of Dreams. One might think that he was simply trying to formalise using what could be called the scientistic symbolic – nothing could be further off the mark. The critical point in what Freud is doing, the idea which can be found nowhere else, is what he insists on principally in Chapter VII – there really is an opposition between conscious and unconscious functions. This starting point – justified or not, it doesn't matter, we are engaged in commenting on Freud – seems essential to him in order to explain what actually happens with the subjects with whom he is dealing, in order to understand the domains of psychic life. What happens on the level of pure consciousness, on the level of the cortex in which this reflection of the world which is where consciousness is located, is as such immediately erased, leaving no traces. The traces take place elsewhere.

This has been the starting-point for many absurdities, fed by this term 'depth' which Freud could have avoided, and which has been so abused. That means that in the end, the living organism can only receive, record, what it is constructed to receive – more precisely, that its functions are far more constructed in order not to receive than to receive. It doesn't see, it doesn't hear, what isn't useful to its biological subsistence. Except, the human being goes beyond the real which is biologically natural to it. And that is where the problem begins.

All animal machines are strictly riveted to the conditions of the external environment. If they vary, it is, we are told, to the extent that this external environment varies. Of course, the essence of most animal species is not to want to know anything about what bothers them – they'd rather peg out. That is in fact why they do peg out, and why we are strong. Freud's inspiration isn't mystical. He doesn't think that there is a morphogenic power as such in life. For the animal, the type, the form are linked to a choice in the external environment, as inside and outside. Why is it otherwise for the human being?

There are enough really rather tiresome laboratory experiments, which show that if one holds an octopus, or any other animal, with sufficient doggedness in front of a triangle, they will recognise it in the end, that is to say generalise it. M. Valabrega's question should be answered on the level of the general. But what is new in man is that something is already sufficently open, imperceptibly shifted within the imaginary coaptation, for the symbolic use of the image to be inserted into it.

One has to assume a certain biological gap in him, which I try to define when I talk to you about the mirror stage. The total captation of desire, of attention, already assumes the lack. The lack is already there when I speak of the desire of the human subject in relation to his image, of this extremely general imaginary relation which we call narcissism.

Living animal subjects are sensitive to the image of their own kind. This is an absolutely essential point, thanks to which the whole of living creation isn't an immense orgy. But the human being has a special relation with his own image – a relation of gap, of alienating tension. That is where the possibility of the order of presence and absence, that is of the symbolic order, comes in. The tension between the symbolic and the real is subjacent here. It is substantial, if you are willing enough to give the term substance its purely etymological meaning. It's an upokeimenon.

For all existing human subjects, the relation between A and S will always pass via the intermediary of these imaginary substrates, the ego and the other, which constitute the imaginary foundation of the object – A,m,a,S.

Let us try to light up the magic lantern a little. We are going to take on a mechanical outlook, which is the enemy of man, by imagining there to be a triode lamp at the point of intersection of the symbolic direction and the passage through the imaginary. Let us suppose that a current passes down the circuit. If there is a vacuum, a bombarding of electrons takes place between the cathode and the anode, thanks to which the current passes. Besides the anode and the cathode, there is a third ode, a transverse one. You can make the current pass through it by making it positive, in such a way that the electrons are led towards the anode, or else by making it negative, cutting the process short – what emanates from the negative is repelled by the negative you've interposed.

It is simply a new version of the story of the door which I spoke of the other day, on account of the non-homogeneous character of the audience. Let us say that it is a door in a door, a door to the power of two, a door within the door. The imaginary is thus in a position to interrupt, to grind up, to scan what passes on the level of the circuit.

Note that what happens between A and S in itself has a conflictual character. At best, the circuit contradicts itself, cuts itself off, grinds itself up. I say at best, for the universal discourse is symbolic, it comes from a long way back, we didn't invent it. We didn't invent non-being, we fell into this little corner of non-being. And as far as the transmission of the imaginary is concerned, we've had our fill of it, what with all the fornications of our parents, grandparents, and the other scandalous stories which give psychoanalysis its piquancy.

From then on, the necessities of language and those of interhuman communication are easy to understand. You know those messages that the subject sends out in a form which structures them, grammaticalises them, as coming from the other, in an inverted form. When a subject says to another you are my master or you are my wife, it means precisely the opposite. It passes via A and via m, and then gets to the subject, who it all of a sudden enthrones in the perilous and problematic position of spouse or disciple. That's how fundamental speech is expressed.

Well then, what is the symptom, or to put it another way, the neurosis, about? You may have noted that in the circuit, the ego is really separated from the subject by the little a, that is to say by the other. And yet, there is a bond. I am me, and so are you, you. Between the two, there is this structuring given, namely that the subjects are embodied. In effect, what happens at the level of the symbol happens in all living beings. What is present in S passes via the corporeal support of the subject in order to be realised, via a biological reality which establishes a division between the imaginary function of the living organism, of which the ego is one of the structured forms – we don't really have any cause for complaint – and the symbolic function which it is capable of filling and which gives it a preeminent position vis-à-vis the real.

To say that there is a neurosis, to say that there is a repressed, which never goes anywhere without a return ticket, is to say that something of the discourse going from A to S passes and yet at the same time doesn't pass.

What merits the name resistance is the fact that the ego isn't identical to the subject, and it is in the nature of the ego to integrate itself into the imaginary circuit which determines the interruptions of the fundamental discourse. It is this resistance that Freud emphasises when he says that every resistance stems from the organisation of the ego. For it is in so far as it is imaginary, and not simply in so far as it is carnal existence, that the ego is, in analysis, the mainspring of the interruptions of this discourse, which simply asks to be put into action, into speech, or into Wiederholen – it amounts to the same thing.

When I tell you that the only real resistance in analysis is the resistance of the analyst, that means that an analysis is conceivable only to the extent that the a is effaced. A certain subjective purification must be accomplished in analysis – otherwise, what is the point of all these ceremonials which we subject ourselves to? – in such a way that one can throughout the analytic experience, confuse the pole a with the pole A.

The analyst partakes of the radical nature of the Other, in so far as he is what is most inaccessible. From then on, and beginning at this point in time, what leaves the imaginary of the ego of the subject is in accordance not with this other to which he is accustomed, and who is just his partner, the person who is made so as to enter into his game, but precisely with this radical Other which is hidden from him. What is called transference happens very precisely between A and m, in so far as a, represented by the analyst, is lacking.

What is involved, as Freud says in an admirable way in this text, is an Überlegenheit – which on this occasion is translated by supériorité,[5] but I suspect there is a play on words here, as what follows indicates – thanks to which the reality which appears in the analytic situation is recognised immer, always, als Spiegelung – an astonishing term – as the mirage of a certain forgotten past.[6] The term Spiegel, mirror, is there. From the moment the resistance of the imaginary function of the ego no longer exists, the A and the m can in some way come to an accord, communicate enough so that a certain isochronism is established between them, a certain simultaneous positivation, in relation to our triode lamp. The fundamental speech which goes from A to S here encounters a harmonic vibration, something which, far from interfering, allows its passage. One can even give this triode lamp its real role, which is often that of an amplifier, and say that the fundamental discourse – up until then censored – to use the best term – becomes clearer.

This progress is achieved by the effect of transference, which happens somewhere other than the repetitive tendency. What insists, what simply demands to pass through, takes place between A and S. Whereas transference takes place between m and a. And it is to the extent that the m learns little by little, if one may put it this way, to come to agree with the fundamental discourse, that it can be treated in the same way as the A is treated, that is little by little linked to the S.

This doesn't mean that an allegedly autonomous ego finds support in the ego of the analyst, as Loewenstein writes in a text I won't read you today, but which I meticulously selected, becoming a stronger and stronger ego. On the contrary, it means that the ego becomes what it wasn't, that it gets to the point where the subject is.

Don't, however, get the idea that the ego volatilises after an analysis – be it didactic or therapeutic, one doesn't go to heaven, disembodied and pure symbol.

All analytic experience is an experience of signification. One of the great objections which is made to us is the following – what catastrophe will come about if one reveals to the subject his reality, his je-ne-sais-quoi-drive, his homosexual life? Lord knows how much the moralists have to tell us under this heading. And yet it is nonetheless an unfounded and empty objection. Even admitting that one reveals to the subject some tendency which might well have been kept at bay by him forever, through I don't know what effort, what is at stake in analysis is not our revealing his reality to the subject. A certain conception of the analysis of resistances is to be traced, in fact, within this register. But the authentic experience of analysis is absolutely opposed to it – through the analysis the subject discovers his truth, that is to say the signification taken on in his particular destiny by those givens which are peculiar to him and which one can call his lot.

[5] 'aloofness' in SE.

[6] GW XIII 17; Stud III 229; SE XVIII 19.

Human beings are born with all kinds of extremely heterogeneous dispositions. But whatever the fundamental lot is, the biological lot, what analysis reveals to the subject is its signification. This signification is a function of a certain speech, which is and which isn't the speech of the subject – this speech, he already receives it ready-made, he is its point of passage. I don't know if that is the original master word of the Book of Judgement in the Rabbinical tradition. We aren't searching that far off, we have more limited problems, but ones in which the terms of vocation and of calling have their full value.

If this speech received by the subject didn't exist, this speech which bears on the symbolic level, there would be no conflict with the imaginary, and each of us would purely and simply follow his inclination. Experience shows us that nothing of the sort happens. Freud never renounced an essential dualism as constitutive of the subject. This means nothing other than these intersections, I would like to pursue them.

The ego is inscribed in the imaginary. Everything pertaining to the ego is inscribed in imaginary tensions, like all the other libidinal tensions. Libido and the ego are on the same side. Narcissism is libidinal. The ego isn't a superior power, nor a pure spirit, nor an autonomous agency, nor a conflict-free sphere – as some dare to write – in which we could find some support. What kind of story is this? Do we have to exact from subjects their higher tendencies towards truth? What is this transcendent tendency towards sublimation? Freud repudiates it in the most formal way in Beyond the Pleasure Principle. He cannot find the slightest tendency towards progress in any of the concrete and historical manifestations of human functions, and this really has a value for the person who invented our method. All forms of life are as surprising, as miraculous, there is no tendency towards superior forms.

This is the point where we open out into the symbolic order, which isn't the libidinal order in which the ego is inscribed, along with all the drives. It tends beyond the pleasure principle, beyond the limits of life, and that is why Freud identifies it with the death instinct. Reread the text, and you'll see whether it seems to you worthy of being endorsed. The symbolic order is rejected by the libidinal order, which includes the whole of the domain of the imaginary, including the structure of the ego. And the death instinct is only the mask of the symbolic order, in so far – this is what Freud writes – as it is dumb, that is to say in so far as it hasn't been realised. As long as the symbolic recognition hasn't been instituted, by definition, the symbolic order is dumb.

The symbolic order is simultaneously non-being and insisting to be, that is what Freud has in mind when he talks about the death instinct as being what is most fundamental – a symbolic order in travail, in the process of coming, insisting on being realised.

TRANSLATOR'S NOTE

This is a translation of the seminar that Lacan delivered to the Société Française de Psychanalyse over the course of the academic year 1955–56. The original French text is the third in a series of Lacan's seminars, beginning in 1953, that is being edited by Jacques-Alain Miller.

I have been mindful of James Strachey's translations of Freud in the Standard Edition. On the whole it has been possible to avoid major divergences from Strachey, the two exceptions being to render "investissement" as "investment" rather than "cathexis" and "pulsion" as "drive" rather than "instinct." In this I follow the practice adopted by the translators of Seminars I and II and by Stuart Schneiderman in Returning to Freud: Clinical Psychoanalysis in the School of Lacan (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1980).

The translation of this seminar is faced with one further complication arising from the fact that it deals extensively with Schreber's Memoirs of My Nervous Illness. Schreber's terms have often been rendered differently in the English translation of the Memoirs, in the Standard Edition version of Freud's case history, and in Lacan's article, "The question preliminary to any possible treatment of psychosis," in Ecrits: A Selection. This has, on a very small number of occasions, required some explanation, which will be found in the footnotes.

I should add that I have diverged in two major ways from the translations of Seminars I and II.

First, the terms "signification" and "sens," which appear in Seminars I and II as "signification" and "meaning" respectively, have been translated as "meaning" and "sense." I am following the practice of Stuart Schneiderman here, for essentially the same reason he gives: there seems little reason to resort to the archaism of the English "signification" when there are two common English terms that will do adequate service.

Secondly, the term "méconnaissance" is rendered as "misrecognition," instead of "failure to recognize" or "misunderstanding." The latter term has to be reserved for "malentendu," while there are contexts in which the first does not capture the appropriate meaning.

I have followed Seminars I and II in indicating the distinction, a significant one in the original, between "moi" and "ego" by putting "ego" in roman when "moi" appears in the original and in italics when "ego" has been used.

Finally, the numbers in the margin of this translation refer to the pagination of the French edition published by Editions du Seuil in 1981. It is hoped that this practice will assist those who, while needing to refer to the English edition, are in a position to consult the original.

I wish to thank Jacques-Alain Miller for the assistance and advice he gave me while I was preparing this translation. I am also grateful to the editor at W. W. Norton, Susan Barrows Munro, for her encouragement and patience in helping me to bring this long and sometimes difficult translation to publication.

Many very helpful comments were made by Kerry Murphy and Rosemary Sorensen, who both generously read an entire draft of the manuscript. I owe them gratitude for invaluable suggestions on ways to improve the style of the translation. Dominique Hecq, with her sensitivity to the idiom of both languages, gave me sound advice on a number of difficult points.

Finally, I would like to record my thanks to Deakin University for its support while I was engaged on this work.

SCHIZOPHRENIA AND PARANOIA

M. DE CLÉRAMBAULT

THE MIRAGES OF UNDERSTANDING

FROM VERNEINING TO VERWERFUNG

PSYCHOSIS AND PSYCHOANALYSIS

This year the question of the psychoses begins.

I say the question because one can't speak straightaway of their treatment, as was announced in the initial notice, and still less of the treatment of psychosis in Freud, for he never spoke of it, except by allusion.

We shall start with Freud's theory and assess what it contributes to the issue, but we shall not fail to introduce the notions we have developed over the past years, nor to deal with all the problems that the psychoses raise for us today. Clinical and nosographic problems first. I've been thinking that all the benefit analysis might produce with respect to them hasn't yet been fully extracted. Problems of treatment, too, which our work for this year ought to lead into – this is our aim.

Thus it's not by chance that I initially gave what we shall finish with as our title. Let us say it was a lapsus, a significant lapsus.

I would like to stress one primary, self-evident truth – the least noticed as is always the case.

In what has been done, is done, and is now in the course of being done concerning treatment of the psychoses the schizophrenias are much more 12 readily explored than the paranoias, a much more lively interest is taken in them, and greater results are expected from this. Why then does paranoia, on the contrary, have a rather privileged position for Freudian doctrine – that of a knot, but also of a resistant nucleus?

It might take us a long time to answer that question, but it will remain just below the surface of our approach.

Of course, Freud wasn't unaware of schizophrenia. The movement involving this concept's development was contemporary with him. But while he recognized, admired, and even encouraged the work of the Zurich school and put analytic theory into relation with what was being constructed around Bleuler, he kept his distance nevertheless. He was initially and essentially interested in paranoia. And, to give you straightaway a reference point that you can return to, I remind you that at the end of the observation on the Schreber case, which is his major text concerning the psychoses, Freud traces out a watershed, as it were, between paranoia on the one hand and on the other everything he would like, he says, to be called paraphrenia, which exactly covers the field of the schizophrenias.[1] This is a necessary reference point for the intelligibility of everything we shall subsequently have to say – for Freud the field of the psychoses divides in two.

What does the term psychosis cover in the field of psychiatry? Psychosis is not dementia. The psychoses, if you like – there is no reason to deny oneself the luxury of this word – correspond to what has always been called and legitimately continues to be called madness. This is the domain Freud divides in two. He did not go in for much more nosology than this on the subject of psychosis, but on this point he is quite clear, and given the status of its author we cannot neglect this distinction.

In this respect, as sometimes happens, Freud is not absolutely in step with his time. Is he way behind it? Is he way ahead of it? There lies the ambiguity. At first sight he is way behind it.

I can't recount to you here the history of paranoia since it made its first appearance with a psychiatrist disciple of Kant at the beginning of the nineteenth century,[2] but let me tell you that at its maximum extension in German psychiatry it covered almost all forms of madness – seventy percent of the ill in asylums bore the label of paranoia. Everything we call psychosis or madness was paranoia.

In France the word paranoia, at the time it was introduced into nosology – this was very late, a matter of some fifty years – was identified with some-13 thing fundamentally different. A paranoiac – at least until the thesis of a certain Jacques Lacan attempted to stir up people's minds,[3] which was limited to a small circle, to the small circle that matters, which means that nobody talks of paranoiacs as they used to before – a paranoiac was a nasty person, an intolerant one, a bad-humored type, proud, mistrustful, irritable, and who overestimated himself. This feature formed the foundation of paranoia – when the paranoiac was far too paranoid, he would end up deluding. It was less a question of a conception than of a clinical picture, moreover a very fine one.

[2] R. A. Vogel is generally credited with having introduced the term into modern usage in 1764.

[3] Jacques Lacan, De la psychose paranoïaque dans ses rapports avec la personnalité.

This is roughly where things stood in France, without my distorting anything, after the publication of M. Génil-Perrin's work on the paranoid constitution, which had spread the characterological notion of anomaly of the personality, essentially made up of what one may well describe – the book's style bears the mark of this inspiration – as the perverse structure of character.[4] Like all perverts, it sometimes happens that the paranoiac goes beyond the limits and falls into that frightful madness, the unbounded exaggeration of his unfortunate character.

That outlook can be described as psychological, psychologizing, or even as psychogenetic. All the formal references to an organic base, to temperament for example, don't change a thing – it's really a psychological genesis. Something is defined and assessed at a certain level, and its development follows uninterrupted with an autonomous coherence that is self-sufficient in its own field. This is why, in a word, it's a question of psychology, despite the author's own explicit rejection of this point of view.

In my thesis I tried to promote another view. I was certainly still a young psychiatrist then, and I had been introduced to psychiatry largely through the works, the direct teaching, and, I would even be so bold as to say, the intimacy of someone who played a very important role in French psychiatry of that period, M. de Clérambault, whose personality, action, and influence I call to mind in this introductory discussion.[5]

For those among you who have only an approximate knowledge of his work – and there must be some – M. de Clérambault is supposed to have been the fierce defender of an extreme organicist conception. That was certainly the explicit design of his theoretical statements. However, I do not believe they give a correct perspective – either on the influence of his personality and teaching or on the true range of his discoveries. 14

His work has, independently of its theoretical aims, a concrete clinical value – there are a considerable number of clinical syndromes that Clérambault located in a completely original manner and that have since then been

[4] See Georges Génil-Perrin, Les Paranoïaques, specially pt. 2, "La constitution paranoïaque."

[5] Gaëten Gatian de Clérambault (1872–1934), Psychiatrist-in-charge at the Special Infirmary for the Insane of the Paris Prefecture of Police from 1920 to 1934, sought to describe the psychoses on the basis of a common element, the syndrome of mental automatism, on the grounds that delusion underlies all the different forms in which psychosis appears. He claimed that the disturbances from which delusions stem, which he called elementary phenomena, are of purely organic origin; not being part of the subject's own thought processes, they impose themselves upon the subject's mind from without. These phenomena include thought-echoes, verbal enunciations of actions, and various forms of hallucination. See de Clérambault, "Psychoses à base d'automatisme."

In 1966 Lacan, describing de Clérambault as his "only master in psychiatry," observed that "his mechanistic ideology . . . seems to me, in its grasp of the subjective text, to be closer to what can be constructed as a structural analysis than does any other clinical effort in French psychiatry." "De nos antécédents," E, 65.

integrated into the heritage of psychiatric experience. He made precious, original contributions which have never been taken up since. I have in mind his studies on psychosis caused by toxic substances. In a word, in the realm of the psychoses Clérambault remains absolutely indispensable.

The notion of mental automatism is apparently brought into focus in Clérambault's work and teaching by his concern to demonstrate the fundamentally anideational [anidéique], as he put it, character of the phenomena that manifest themselves in the development of psychosis. What this means is that which doesn't correspond to a train of thought, but unfortunately this doesn't make much more sense than the master's discourse does. This reference point is supposedly located, then, in terms of being understandable. The initial reference to understanding serves to decide exactly what it is that introduces a breach and appears as unintelligible.

Here we have an assumption that it would be an exaggeration to describe as naive, since surely none is more commonly held – and still, I fear, by you, or at least many among you. The major progress in psychiatry since the introduction of this movement of investigation called psychoanalysis has consisted, or so it's believed, in restoring meaning to the chain of phenomena. This is not false in itself. But what is false is to imagine that the sense in question is what we understand. What we are supposed to have learned once again, as is thought everywhere in medical quarters, the expression of psychiatrists' sensus commune, is to understand patients. This is a pure mirage.

The notion of understanding has a very clear meaning. It's a source that, under the name of relation of understanding, Jaspers has made the pivot of all so-called general psychopathology.[6] It consists in thinking that some things are self-evident, that, for example, when someone is sad it's because he doesn't have what his heart desires. Nothing could be more false—there are people who have all their heart desires and are still sad. Sadness is a passion of quite another color.

I would like to insist on this. When you give a child a smack, well! it's understandable that he cries – without anybody's reflecting that it's not at all obligatory that he should cry. I remember a small boy who whenever he got a smack used to ask – Was that a pat or a slap? If he was told it was a slap he cried, that belonged to the conventions, to the rules of the moment, and if it was a pat he was delighted. But this isn't the end of the matter. When one gets a smack there are many other ways of responding than by crying. One can return it in kind, or else turn the other cheek, or one can also say – Hit me, but listen! A great variety of possibilities offer themselves, which are neglected in the notion of relation of understanding as it's spelled out by M. Jaspers.

Before next time you can refer to his chapter entitled "Meaningful Connections." Its inconsistencies soon appear – this is the value of a sustained discourse.

Understanding is evoked only as an ideal relation. As soon as one tries to get close to it, it becomes, properly speaking, ungraspable. The examples that Jaspers takes as the most apparent – his reference points, with which he very quickly and inevitably confuses the notion itself – are ideal references. But what is striking is that in his own text he cannot, despite all the art he puts into sustaining this mirage, avoid giving precisely the examples that have always been refuted by the facts. For example, since suicide demonstrates a tendency towards decline, towards death, it seems that each and every one of us could say – but only if one sets out to get us to say it – that it more readily takes place at the decline of nature, that is during autumn. Yet it has been known for a long time that many more people commit suicide in spring. That is neither more nor less understandable. Surprise at there being more suicides in spring than autumn can only be based on this inconsistent mirage called the relation of understanding – as if there were anything that could ever be grasped in this order!

One is led to think then that psychogenesis is to be identified with the reintroduction of this celebrated relation into a relationship with the object of psychiatry. This is in fact very difficult to conceive, because it's literally inconceivable but, like all things that are not well grasped, or captured in a real concept, it remains a latent assumption, one that has been latent throughout all the changes in the complexion of psychiatry over the last thirty years. Well, if that is what psychogenesis is, I say – because I think that most of you are by now capable of grasping it, after two years of teaching on the symbolic, the imaginary and the real, and I also say it for those who aren't yet up to it – that the great secret of psychoanalysis is that there is no psychogenesis. If that is what psychogenesis is, there is precisely nothing that could be further from psychoanalysis in its whole development, its entire 16 inspiration and its mainspring, in everything it has contributed, everything it has been able to confirm for us in anything we have established.

Another way of expressing things, one that goes much further, is to say that the psychological is, if we try to grasp it as firmly as possible, the ethological, that is, the whole of the biological individual's behavior in relation to his natural environment. There you have a legitimate definition of psychology. There you have an order of real relations, an objectifiable thing, a field with quite adequately defined boundaries. But to constitute an object of science, one must go a little bit further. It has to be said of human psychology what Voltaire used to say about natural history, which was that it's not as natural as all that and that, frankly, nothing could be more anti-natural.[7] Everything that in human behavior belongs to the psychological order is subject to such profound anomalies and constantly presents such obvious paradoxes that the problem arises of knowing what needs to be introduced in order for a cat to find its kittens.

If one forgets the landscape, the essential mainspring, of psychoanalysis, one comes back – which is naturally the constant, daily-observed tendency of psychoanalysts – to all sorts of myths formed ages ago. How long ago remains to be defined, but they date more or less from the end of the eighteenth century. The myth of unity of the personality, the myth of synthesis, of superior and inferior functions, confusion about automatism, all these types of organization of the objective field constantly reveal cracks, tears and rents, negation of the facts, and misrecognition of the most immediate experience.

Make no mistake, though. I'm not going to fall into the myth of immediate experience that forms the basis of what people call existential psychology or even existential psychoanalysis. Immediate experience is no better placed to arrest or captivate us than in any other science. In no way is it the measure of the development that we must ultimately reach. Freud's teaching, which in this respect is in total agreement with what takes place in the rest of the scientific domain – however differently we have to conceive it from our own myth – brings resources into play that are beyond immediate experience and cannot be grasped in any tangible fashion. In psychoanalysis, as in physics, it's not the property of color as sensed and differentiated by direct experience that holds our attention. It's something which is behind this, and which conditions it.

17 Freudian experience is in no way preconceptual. It's not a pure experience, but one that is well and truly structured by something artificial, the analytic relation, as it's constituted by what the subject recounts to the doctor and by what the doctor does with it. It's by setting out from this initial mode of operation that everything gets worked out.

Throughout this reminder you must have already recognized the three orders that I'm forever harping on as so necessary to understanding anything at all about analytic experience – that is, the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real.

You saw the symbolic appear just now when I alluded, and from two different directions, to what is beyond all understanding, which all understanding is inserted into, and which exercises such an obviously disruptive influence over human and interhuman relationships.

You have also seen the imaginary indicated in the reference I made to animal ethology, that is to the captivating or ensnaring forms that constitute the rails upon which animal behavior is conducted towards it natural aims. M. Piéron, who for us doesn't have an odor of sanctity, called one of his books Sensation, the Guide to Life.[8] It's a very pretty title, but I don't know that he applies himself to sensation as much as he says, and the book's contents certainly don't confirm this. What is correct in his approach is that the imaginary is surely the guide to life for the whole animal domain. While the image equally plays a capital role in our own domain, this role is completely taken up and caught up within, remolded and reanimated by, the symbolic order. The image is always more or less integrated into this order, which, I remind you, is defined in man by its property of organized structure.

[7] On hearing someone praise Buffon's monumental work, L'histoire naturelle, Voltaire is said to have exclaimed, "Not so natural as all that!"

What difference is there between what belongs to the imaginary or real orders and what belongs to the symbolic order? In the imaginary or real orders we always have more and less, a threshold, a margin, continuity. In the symbolic order every element has value through being opposed to another.

Take an example from the domain that we are beginning to explore.

One of our psychotics tells us how foreign the world is which he entered some time ago. Everything has become a sign for him. Not only is he spied upon, observed, watched over, not only do people speak to, point, look, and wink at him, but all this – you will see the ambiguity straightaway – invades the field of real, inanimate, nonhuman objects. Let us look at this a bit more closely. If he encounters a red car in the street – a car is not a natural object – it's not for nothing, he will say, that it went past at that very moment.

Let us inquire into this delusional intuition. The car has a meaning, but 18 the subject is very often incapable of saying what it is. Is it favorable? Is it threatening? Surely there is some reason for the car's being there. Of this, the most undifferentiated phenomenon there is, we can form three completely different conceptions.

We can consider the thing from the angle of an aberration of perception. Don't think we are currently so far removed from this. Not so long ago this was the level at which the question was raised concerning what a madman's rudimentary experience was. He might just be color blind and see red as green and vice versa. Perhaps he can't distinguish colors.

Again, we can consider the encounter with the red car along the lines of what happens when the robin redbreast, encountering its mate, displays the breast that gives it its name. It has been demonstrated that its dress corresponds to the guarding of the limit of its territory and that the encounter alone occasions a certain form of behavior towards its adversary. Here the red has an imaginary function which, precisely in the order of relations of understanding, can be translated into the fact that for the subject this red will have made him see red and seemed to him to bear within it the expressive and immediate character of hostility or anger.

Finally, we can understand the red car within the symbolic order, namely in the way one understands the color red in a game of cards, that is, as opposed to black, as being a part of an already organized language.

There you have the three registers distinguished from one another, and also distinguished from one another are the three planes on which our so-called understanding of the elementary phenomenon can be undertaken.

The novelty of what Freud introduced in investigating paranoia is even more dazzling than it is anywhere else – perhaps because it's more localized and breaks more with contemporary discoveries on psychosis. Here we see Freud proceed from the very first with an audacity that has the character of an absolute beginning.

To be sure, the Traumdeutung [The Interpretation of Dreams] is a creation, also. Despite its being said that interest had already been taken in the meaning of dreams, this had absolutely nothing to do with the pioneering work 19 that is performed before our eyes. This doesn't finish just with the formula that the dream tells you something, for the only thing that interests Freud is the elaboration through which the dream says this something – it says it in the same way as one speaks. No one had ever seen that before. People had been able to notice that dreams have a meaning, that something could be read in them, but not that dreams talk.

But let's allow that Freud's approach to the dream may have been prepared for by the artless practices that preceded his own attempt. By contrast there has never been anything comparable to the manner in which he proceeds with Schreber. What does he do? He takes the book of a paranoiac which, at the time he is writing his own work, he blithely recommends that one read – do not fail to read him before reading me – and gives it a Champollion-like decipherment. He deciphers it in the way hieroglyphics are deciphered.

Of all the literary productions of the type that plead a cause, of all the communications of those who, having gone beyond the limits, have spoken of the psychotic's alien experience, Schreber's work is certainly one of the most remarkable. Here we have an exceptional encounter between the genius of Freud and a unique book.

I said genius. Yes, there is a true stroke of genius on Freud's part that owes nothing to any intuitive insight – it's the genius of the linguist who sees the same sign appear several times in a text, begins from the idea that this must mean something, and manages to stand all the signs of this language right side up again. The prodigious identification that Freud makes between the birds of the sky and maidens is a part of this phenomenon – it's a remarkable hypothesis, which enables the entire chain of the text to be reconstituted, the famous fundamental language that Schreber talks about. More clearly than anywhere else, analytic interpretation is here demonstrated to be symbolic, in the structured sense of the term.

This translation is remarkable indeed. But, be careful, it leaves the fields of the psychoses and the neuroses both on the same level. If the application of the analytic method yielded no more than a symbolic-order reading, it would show itself incapable of explaining the distinction between the two fields. It's therefore outside this dimension that the problems forming the object of our research this year arise.

Since discourse, the lunatic's printed discourse, is at issue, it's therefore manifest that we are in the symbolic order. Now, what is the actual material of this discourse? At what level does the sense translated by Freud unfold? From what are the naming elements of this discourse borrowed? Generally 20 speaking the raw material is his own body.

In man the relation to one's own body characterizes, in the final analysis, the restricted, but really irreducible, field of the imaginary. If there is anything in man that corresponds to the imaginary function as it operates in animals, it's everything that, in a fundamental manner but one that is always barely graspable, relates him to the general form of his body at a point called an erogenous zone. Only analytic experience has been able to seize this relationship, always at the limit of the symbolic, at its mainspring.

This is what the symbolic analysis of the Schreber case demonstrates for us. It's only by entering through the symbolic that we can successfully make any inroads into the case.

The questions that arise touch upon exactly all the categories effective in our field of operation.

It's classically said that in psychosis the unconscious is at the surface, conscious. This is even why articulating it doesn't seem to have much effect. Within this perspective, quite instructive in itself, we can observe first of all that it's not purely and simply, as Freud always emphasized, from the negative trait of being an Unbewusst, a nonconscious, that the unconscious derives its efficacity. Translating Freud, we say – the unconscious is a language. Its being articulated doesn't imply its recognition, though. The proof of this is that everything proceeds as if Freud were translating a foreign language, even carving it up and reassembling it. The subject is, with respect to his own language, quite simply in the same position as Freud. If it's ever possible for someone to speak in a language that he is totally ignorant of, we can say that the psychotic subject is ignorant of the language he speaks.

Is this a satisfactory metaphor? Certainly not. The question is not so much why this unconscious, which is articulated at ground level, remains excluded for the subject, not adopted by him – but why it appears in the real.

I hope that there are enough of you who remember the commentary that M. Jean Hyppolite made for us here on Die Verneinung,[9] and I regret his absence this morning, which prevents me from being certain I'm not distorting the terms he uncovered in it.

21 What emerged clearly from his analysis of this striking text is that in what is unconscious not only is everything repressed, that is, misrecognized by the subject after having been verbalized, but that behind the process of verbalization there must be admitted a primordial Bejahung, an admission in the sense of the symbolic, which can itself be wanting. This point is borne out by other texts, and especially by a passage that is as explicit as can be where Freud admits a phenomenon of exclusion for which the term Verwerfung appears valid and from which Verneinung, produced at a much later stage, is distinguished. It can happen that a subject refuses access to his symbolic world to something that he has nevertheless experienced, which in this case is nothing other than the threat of castration. The subject's entire subsequent development shows that he wants to know nothing about it, Freud literally says, in the sense of the repressed.[10]

What comes under the effect of repression returns, for repression and the return of the repressed are just the two sides of the same coin. The repressed is always there, expressed in a perfectly articulate manner in symptoms and a host of other phenomena. By contrast, what falls under the effect of Verwerfung has a completely different destiny.

It's not pointless in this respect for me to remind you of the comparison I made last year between certain symbolic order phenomena and what happens in those machines, in the modern sense of the word, that do not quite talk yet but any day now will. One feeds figures into them and waits for them to give what would perhaps take us 100,000 years to calculate. But we can only introduce things into the circuit if we respect the machine's own rhythm –

[9] See "Introduction and Reply to Jean Hyppolite's Presentation of Freud's Verneinung," Sem I:52–66; and "A Spoken Commentary on Freud's Verneinung by Jean Hyppolite," app. to Sem I:289–97.

[10] "When I speak of his having rejected it, the first meaning of the phrase is that he would have nothing to do with it, in the sense of having repressed it. This really involved no judgement upon the question of its existence, but it was the same as if it did not exist." "From the History of an Infantile Neurosis," SE 17:84. The German text reads, "Wenn ich gesagt habe, dass er von ihr nichts wissen wollte im Sinne der Verdrängung. Damit war eigentlich kein Urteil über ihre Existenz gefällt, aber es war so gut, als ob sie nicht existierte." GW 12:117.

otherwise they won't go in and can't enter the circuit. We can re-use the same image. Only it also happens that whatever is refused in the symbolic order, in the sense of Verwerfung, reappears in the real.

Freud's text is free of ambiguity on this point. It concerns the Wolf Man, as you know, who gives evidence of psychotic tendencies and qualities, as is demonstrated by the brief paranoia he enters between the end of Freud's treatment and when he is taken under observation again. Well, the fact that he has rejected all means of access to castration, which is nevertheless apparent in his conduct, all access to the register of the symbolic function, the fact that any assumption of castration by an I has become impossible for him, has the closest of links with his having had a brief hallucination in childhood, of which he recounts extremely precise details.

The scene is as follows. While playing with his knife he cut his finger, 22 which was left hanging on by only a small piece of skin. The subject recounted this episode in a style traced from lived experience. All temporal reference points seem to have disappeared. Then he sat on a bench, beside his nurse, who was precisely the confidant of his early experiences, and he didn't dare mention it to her. How significant is that suspension of all possible speech! – and precisely with the person he used to recount everything to, and especially things of that order! There is an abyss here, a temporal submersion, a rupture in experience, following which it turns out that he has nothing at all wrong with him, it's all over, let's drop the subject. The relation that Freud establishes between this phenomenon and this very special knowing nothing of the thing, even in the sense of the repressed expressed in this text translates as this – what is refused in the symbolic order re-emerges in the real.

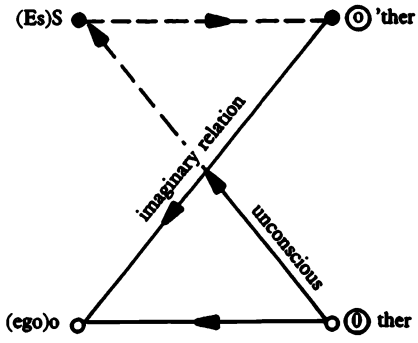
There is a close relation between, on the one hand, negation and the reappearance in the purely intellectual order of what has not been integrated by the subject and, on the other, Verwerfung and hallucination, that is, the reappearance in the real of what the subject has refused. Here we have a range, a series, of relations.

What is involved in a hallucinatory phenomenon? This phenomenon has its own source in what we shall provisionally call the subject's history in the symbolic. I don't know whether I shall retain this combination of terms, because all history is by definition symbolic, but let's keep to this formula for the moment. The essential distinction is this – the origin of the neurotic repressed is not situated at the same level of history in the symbolic as that of the repressed involved in psychosis, even if there exists the closest of relations between their contents. This distinction alone provides a key that allows the problem to be raised in a much simpler fashion than up till now.

The same thing goes for the diagram from last year concerning verbal hallucination:



23 Our schema, I remind you, represents the interruption of full speech between the subject and the Other and its detour through the two egos, o and o', and their imaginary relations. Here it indicates triplicity in the subject, which overlaps the fact that it's the subject's ego that normally speaks to another, and of the subject, the subject S in the third person. Aristotle pointed out that one must not say that man thinks, but that he thinks with his soul. Similarly, I say that the subject speaks to himself with his ego.

However, in the normal subject, speaking to oneself with one's ego can never be made fully explicit. One's relationship to the ego is fundamentally ambiguous, one's assumption of the ego always revocable. In the psychotic subject on the other hand certain elementary phenomena, and in particular hallucinations, which are their most characteristic form, show us the subject completely identified either with his ego, with which he speaks, or with the ego assumed entirely along instrumental lines. It's he who speaks of him, the subject, the S, in the two equivocal senses of the term, the initial S and the German Es.[11] This is what presents itself in the phenomenon of verbal hallucination. The moment the hallucination appears in the real, that is, accompanied by the sense of reality, which is the elementary phenomenon's basic feature, the subject literally speaks with his ego, and it's as if a third party, his lining, were speaking and commenting on his activity.

This is where our attempt to situate the diverse forms of psychosis in relation to the three registers of the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real will lead this year. It will enable us to get to the ultimate source of the function to give to the ego in the cure. The question of the object relation lies on the horizon.

The current handling of the object relation in the context of an analytic relation conceived as dual is founded on a misrecognition of the autonomy of the symbolic order. This automatically introduces a confusion between the imaginary and real levels. But it doesn't eliminate the symbolic relation however, since we continue talking and, indeed, do nothing else. But it results from this misrecognition that what in the subject calls for recognition on the appropriate level of authentic symbolic exchange – which is not so easy to attain since it's always interfered with – is replaced by a recognition of the imaginary, of fantasy. Thus to authenticate everything of the order of the imaginary in the subject is properly speaking to make analysis the anteroom of madness, and we can only admire the fact that this doesn't lead to a deeper alienation – no doubt this indicates sufficiently that to be mad some predisposition, if not some precondition, is necessary.

[11] "Das Es" is Freud's term for the id.

In Vienna a charming young man to whom I was trying to explain a few 24 minor details asked me whether or not I believed that the psychoses were organic, so I said to him that the question was totally out of date, that for a very long time I had been making no distinction between psychology and physiology, and that, surely, nobody goes mad through wanting to, as I had stuck up on the wall of my medical quarters in those former, slightly archaic times.[12] It remains true though that we must attribute the well-known cases of fairly rapid onset of more or less persistent and sometimes lasting delusion to a certain way of handling the analytic relation, which consists in authenticating the imaginary, in substituting recognition on the imaginary level for recognition on the symbolic level.

The fact that an analysis can, right from its first stages, trigger a psychosis is well known, but no one has ever explained why. It's obviously a function of the subject's disposition, but also of an imprudent handling of the object relation.

I believe that today I have done nothing but put before you the interest there is in what we are going to study.

We shall find it useful to investigate paranoia. However thankless and arid this may be for us, it involves purifying, elaborating, and applying Freudian notions, and therefore also involves our training in analysis. I hope I have made you feel how it is that this conceptual elaboration can have the most direct effect on the ways we shall think, or be careful not to think, what our daily experience is and must be.

The meaning of delusion

CRITIQUE OF KRAEPELIN

DIALECTICAL INERTIA

SÉGLAS AND PSYCHOMOTOR HALLUCINATION

PRESIDENT SCHREBER

The more one studies the history of the notion of paranoia, the more significant it seems and the more one appreciates the lesson that can be drawn from the progress, or lack of progress – whichever you like – that characterizes the psychiatric movement.

No notion is in the end more paradoxical. If I took care last time to put madness in the foreground, it was because it's quite possible to say that with the word paranoia authors have displayed all the ambiguity present in the use of the old term madness, which is the fundamental, common term.

The term doesn't date from yesterday, nor even from the birth of psychiatry. Without giving way to a facile deployment of erudition, I shall simply remind you that reference to madness has always been part of the so-called language of conventional wisdom. In this respect, the celebrated Praise of Folly[1] retains all its value for having identified it with normal human behavior – although this latter expression was not in use at that time. What was then said in the language of philosophers, between philosophers, eventually ended up being taken seriously and literally – a turning point that took place with Pascal, who formulated, with grave and meditative emphasis, that there is undoubtedly a necessary madness, that it would be another form of madness not to be mad with the madness of everybody.[2]

26 These reminders aren't useless, when you look at the paradoxes implicit in the premises of the theorists. It might be said that until Freud madness had been reduced to a number of modes of behavior, of patterns,[3] while others thought of judging everybody's behavior in this way. In the end the difference, pattern for pattern, isn't obvious. The emphasis has never been fully placed where it would enable an image to be formed of what normal, or even understandable, conduct is and how properly paranoid conduct may be distinguished from it.

Let us remain at the level of definitions. The dissection of paranoia was incontestably much more extensive during the whole nineteenth century than it has been since the end of the last century, that is around 1899, at the time of the fourth or fifth edition of Kraepelin.[4] For a very long time Kraepelin remained attached to the vague notion that on the whole the man of experience knows, by a sort of sense, how to recognize natural signs. The true medical gift is to be able to perceive the signs that correctly dissect reality. It was only in 1899 that he introduced a finer subdivision. He brings the old paranoias back within the framework of dementia praecox by creating the paranoid sector and he puts forward quite an interesting definition of paranoia, distinguishing it from other modes of paranoid delusions with which it had until then been confused.

Paranoia is distinguished from the others because it is characterized by the gradual development of internal causes and according to a progressive evolution of a stable delusional system that is impossible to disturb and establishes itself with total preservation of clarity and order in thought, will, and action.[5]

This definition, coming as it does from the hand of an eminent clinician, is remarkable in that point by point it contradicts all clinical material. There isn't a word of truth in it.

Its development isn't gradual, there are always surges and phases. It seems to me, but I'm not absolutely sure of this, that it was I who introduced the notion of fertile moment. This fertile moment is always visible at the beginning of a paranoia. There is always a break in what Kraepelin goes on to call the progressive evolution of a delusion dependent on internal causes. It's obvious that the evolution of a paranoia can't be limited to internal causes. To be convinced of this one only has to go to the chapter "Aetiology" of his textbook and also read the contemporary authors, Sérieux and Capgras, whose work dates from five years later.[6] When one looks for the triggering causes of a paranoia, one always observes, with the required question mark, an emotional element in the subject's life, a life crisis that in fact does involve his

[4] The fifth edition of Emil Kraepelin's textbook, Psychiatrie: Ein Lehrbuch für Studirende und Aerzte appeared in 1896 and the sixth in 1899. A translation of the seventh (1903–04) edition, Clinical Psychiatry, was published in 1907.

[5] "Paranoia is a chronic progressive psychosis occurring mostly in early adult life, characterized by the gradual development of a stable progressive system of delusions, without marked mental deterioration, clouding of consciousness, or disorder of thought, will, or conduct." Clinical Psychiatry, 423.

27 external relationships, and it would be astonishing were one not led to do this with respect to a delusion that is essentially characterized as a delusion of reference [délire de relation] – the term isn't Kretschmer's but Wernicke's.[7]

I read – . . . progressive evolution of a stable delusional system that is impossible to disturb . . . Nothing could be more false – the delusional system varies, whether it has been disturbed or not. As a matter of fact this question seems secondary to me. The variation comes from interpsychology, from external interventions, from the preservation or disruption of a certain orderliness in the world around the patient. He is very far indeed from not taking this into account and seeks, over the course of his delusion's evolution, to incorporate these elements into the composition of his delusion.

. . . which establishes itself with total preservation of clarity and order in thought, will, and action. Sure. But it's a question of knowing what clarity and order are. While something meriting these names can be discovered in the account the subject gives of his delusion, it still needs to be stated what this means, and this will by its very nature call into question the notions concerned. As for thought, will, and action, we are here to attempt to define them in terms of a number of specific forms of behavior, one of which is madness, rather than treat them as acquired notions at the outset. To us it seems that academic psychology has to be recast before it's capable of yielding concepts rigorous enough to be exchanged, at least at the level of our experience.

What is the ambiguity that surrounds the notion of paranoia due to? To many things, and perhaps to an inadequate clinical subdivision. I think that the psychiatrists among you have enough knowledge of the different clinical types to know for example that an interpretation delusion [délire d'interprétation] isn't at all the same thing as a litigious delusion [délire de revendication]. Equally there is every reason to distinguish between paranoid psychoses and passional psychoses, a difference that has been admirably emphasized by the work of my master, de Clérambault, whose function, role, personality, and doctrine I began pointing out to you last time.[8] It's precisely at the level of psychological distinctions that his work is the most significant. Does this mean that the clinical types have to be distributed more widely, that we have in some way to break them up? I do not believe so. The problem that arises for us bears on the framework of paranoia as a whole.

A century of clinical work has always just drifted around the problem. Every time psychiatry has made a bit of progress, advanced slightly, it has also lost the ground it has won through its very manner of conceptualizing what is immediately accessible to observation. Nowhere is the contradiction between observation and theorization more apparent. It can almost be said that there is no more apparent and visible discourse of madness than the psychiatrist's – and precisely on the subject of paranoia. 28

[7] Ernst Kretschmer (1888–1964), professor of psychiatry at the University of Marburg. Carl Wernicke (1848–1905), psychiatrist and neurologist, noted for his work on aphasia.

[8] See de Clérambault, "Les délires passionnels; érotomanie, revendication, jalousie," where the author distinguishes between interpretation delusions, which are based on the paranoid character, and passional delusions, which comprise delusions of demands, delusions of jealousy, and erotomaniacal delusions.

There is something here that, it seems to me, goes straight to the heart of the problem. If you read for example the work I wrote on paranoid psychosis, you will see that I emphasize what I call, borrowing the term from my master de Clérambault, the elementary phenomena and that I try to show how radically different these phenomena are in relation to what can be drawn from what he calls ideational deduction, that is, from what is understandable by everybody.[9]

Ever since that period I have strongly emphasized that the elementary phenomena are no more elementary than what underlies the entire construction of a delusion. They are as elementary as a leaf is in relation to the plant, in which a certain detail can be seen of the way in which the veins overlap and insert into one another – there is something common to the whole plant that is reproduced in certain of the forms that make it up. Similarly, analogous structures can be found at the level of the composition, motivation, and thematization of a delusion and at the level of the elementary phenomenon. In other words, it's always the same structuring force, as it were, at work in a delusion, whether it's the whole or one of its parts that is under consideration.

What is important isn't that the elementary phenomenon should be an initial nucleus, a parasitic point as de Clérambault used to say, inside the personality, around which the subject supposedly constructs something, a fibrous reaction destined to envelop and enclose it in a cyst, and at the same time to integrate it, that is to explain it, as is often said. A delusion isn't deduced. It reproduces its same constitutive force. It, too, is an elementary phenomenon. This means that here the notion of element is to be taken in no other way than as structure, differentiated structure, irreducible to anything other than itself.

The source of this structure has been so profoundly misrecognized that the whole discourse on paranoia I was talking about before bears the mark of that misrecognition. You can test this while reading Freud, or almost any author – you will find pages, sometimes entire chapters, on paranoia. Take them out of their context, read them out loud, and you will see the most wonderful descriptions of the behavior of everyone. It was touch and go whether what I read out loud before from Kraepelin's definition of paranoia defined normal behavior. You will find this paradox time and again, and even among analyst 29 authors, precisely when they put themselves on the level of what a while ago I called the pattern – a term whose domination of analytic theory is recent, but which has nonetheless been there potentially for a very long time.

To prepare for today's meeting I was re-reading an already old article, from 1908, in which Abraham describes the behavior of a case of dementia praecox and his so-called lack of affectivity, starting with his relationship to objects.[10] There he was for months on end, heaping up, stone by stone, the crude rocks that for him were affected with the greatest good. Now, because he has stacked them up on a plank, the plank breaks, there's a great din in the room, everything is swept out, and the character who seemed to attach such importance to these rocks doesn't pay the slightest bit of attention to what is going on, doesn't raise the slightest protest before the general evacuation of the objects of his desires. He simply starts again, accumulating others. And that is dementia praecox.

It is tempting to make a fable of this little apologue, one that would show that this is what we all do all the time. I should go even further – to accumulate a stack of things without value, to have to consider them lost at a moment's notice and start again is a good sign. Indeed, if the subject were to remain attached to what he loses, not being able to bear being deprived of it, it could be said that here you have a case of the overvaluation of objects.

These supposedly conclusive cases are so completely ambiguous that one wonders how it's possible to maintain the illusion for one second, unless through a sort of eclipse of the critical sense that seems to seize all readers as soon as they open a technical work, specially where our experience and profession are concerned.

It's surprising that the remark I made last time, that the understandable is an ever-fleeting and elusive term, is never assessed as being a lesson of prime importance, as an obligatory formulation at the threshold of the clinical. Begin by thinking you don't understand. Start from the idea of a fundamental misunderstanding. This is an initial attitude, failing which there is really no reason why you should not understand anything and everything. One author presents certain behavior as indicating a lack of affectivity in a certain context; for another it will be the contrary. Starting one's work again after having acknowledged its loss may be understood in completely opposite senses. Appeal is constantly made to notions that are thought to be commonly accepted, while they are not commonly accepted at all.

This is the point I wanted to get to – the difficulty of addressing the prob-30 lem of paranoia arises precisely because it's situated on the plane of understanding.

[10] Karl Abraham, "The Psycho-Sexual Differences between Hysteria and Dementia Praecox."

The irreducible elementary phenomenon here is at the level of interpretation.

Let's return to the example we took last time.

We have, then, a subject for whom the world has begun to take on a meaning. What does this mean? For some time he has been prey to strange phenomena that consist in his noticing things going on in the street. But what things? If you question him you will see that some points remain mysterious to him while he will express himself about others. In other words, he symbolizes what is happening in terms of meaning. Very often he doesn't know, if you look closely, whether things are favorable or unfavorable towards him, but he looks for what is revealed by the way his counterparts act, or by some observed feature in the world, in this world which is never purely and simply inhuman since it's man-made. In discussing the red car I was attempting, with respect to this, to show you the different import the color red can have, according as its perceptive, imaginary, or symbolic value is considered. In normal behavior, too, features that have until then been neutral can take on value.

What is the subject ultimately saying, specially at a certain period of his delusion? That there is meaning. What meaning he doesn't know, but it comes to the foreground, it asserts itself, and for him it's perfectly understandable. And it's precisely because it's situated at the level of understanding as an incomprehensible phenomenon, as it were, that paranoia is so difficult for us to grasp and, also, of such great interest.

What has made it possible here to speak of reasonable madness, of the preservation of clarity, order, and will, is the feeling that, however far into the phenomenon we go, we remain in the realm of the understandable. Even when what one understands can't even be articulated, named, or inserted by the subject into a context that makes it clear, it's already situated at the level of understanding. It's a question of things that in themselves already make themselves understood. And by virtue of this fact we ourselves feel that we are within reach of understanding. This is where the illusion starts to emerge 31
– since it's a question of understanding, we understand. Well, no, precisely not.

Someone once pointed this out, but he didn't go beyond this basic remark. It was Charles Blondel, who in his book on the troubled conscience observed that psychopathologies characteristically deceive the understanding.[11] It's a valuable work, even though Blondel has obstinately refused to understand anything of the subsequent development of ideas. This is nevertheless an appropriate point at which to take the problem up again – it's always understandable.

You will observe in the training we give to our students that this is always a good place to stop them. It's always at the point where they have understood, where they have rushed in to fill the case in with understanding, that they have missed the interpretation that it's appropriate to make or not to make. This is generally naively expressed in the expression – This is what the subject meant. How do you know? What is certain is that he didn't say it. And in most cases, on hearing what he did say, it appears that at the very least a question mark could have been raised which alone would have been sufficient for the valid interpretation, or at least for the beginnings of it.

Let me now give you an idea of the point on which this discourse is converging. Whether some moment in the subject's perception, in his delusional deduction, in his explanation of himself, or in his dialogue with you is more or less understandable isn't what is important. At some of these places something may occur that appears to be characterized by the fact that there is indeed a completely understandable kernel, if you really want to hold to this. Whether there is or not, is of absolutely no interest at all. What, on the contrary, is altogether striking is that it's inaccessible, inert, and stagnant with respect to any dialectic.

Take elementary interpretation. To be sure, this comprises an element of meaning, but it's a repetitive one, it proceeds by reiteration. Sometimes the subject does elaborate on this element, but what is certain is that it will remain, at least for a while, being constantly repeated with the one interrogative sign that is always involved, without any answer, any attempt to integrate it into a dialogue, ever being made. The phenomenon is closed to all dialectical composition.

Take what is known as passional psychosis, which seems so much closer to what is called normal. If in this case the prevalence of litigiousness is stressed, it's because the subject can't come to terms with a certain loss or injury and because his entire life appears to be centred around compensation for the injury suffered and the claim it entails. Litigation moves into the 32 foreground so much that sometimes it seems completely to dominate his interest in what is at stake. Here also the dialectic comes to a halt, centered of course in a totally different way from the preceding case.

I pointed out to you last time what the phenomenon of interpretation hinges on – it's linked to the relation between the ego and the other, inasmuch as analytic theory defines the ego as always being relative. In passional psychosis what is known as the understandable kernel, which is in fact a kernel of dialectical inertia, is situated obviously much closer to the I, the subject. In short, it's precisely because there has always been a radical misrecognition of the dialectical dimension in the phenomenology of pathological experience that the clinical has gone astray. This misrecognition, it may be said, characterizes a class of mind. It seems that from the entry into the field of human clinical observation a century and a half ago when, with the beginnings of psychiatry, this field as such was formed, from the moment we became concerned with man, we have radically misrecognized that dimension which everywhere else nevertheless seems to be alive, accepted, handled with ease in the sense of the human sciences, namely, that of the autonomy as such of the dialectical dimension.

Authors point to the integrity of the paranoid subject's faculties. Will and action, as Mr. Kraepelin was saying just before, seem to us to be homogeneous in him with what we expect from normal beings. There is no deficiency anywhere, no fault; there are no functional disorders. One forgets that the dialectical changeability of actions, desires, and values is characteristic of human behavior and that it makes them liable to change not only from one moment to the next but constantly and even that it makes them pass over to strictly opposite values as a function of a change of direction in the dialogue. This absolutely fundamental truth is present in the most popular of fables that show what was loss and disadvantage at one instant becoming happiness bestowed by the gods a moment later. The ever-present possibility of bringing desire, attachment, or even the most enduring meaning of human activity back into question, the constant possibility of a sign's being reversed as a function of the dialectical totality of the individual's position, is such a common experience that it's stupefying to see this dimension forgotten as soon as one's fellow whom one wants to objectify is concerned.

It's never completely forgotten, though. We find a trace of it whenever the observer allows himself to be guided by his feeling for what is going on. The term interpretation lends itself to all sorts of ambiguities in the context of this reasonable madness into which it's inserted. Authors speak of combinatory 33 paranoia – how fertile this term could have been had they been aware of what they were saying, that the secret effectively resides in the way the phenomena are combined.

The question that has been advocated frequently enough here to be of full value, that of Who speaks?, must dominate the whole subject of paranoia.

I already pointed this out to you last time when I reminded you that verbal hallucination plays a central role in paranoia. You know how long it took to perceive what is nevertheless sometimes quite visible, which is that the subject himself utters what he says he hears – it took M. Séglas and his book Leçons cliniques.[12] By a sort of brilliant stroke at the beginning of his career he pointed out that there were people having verbal hallucinations who could be observed, by quite obvious signs in some cases and by looking slightly more closely in others, to be uttering the words they accused their voices of having spoken to them, whether or not they were aware of it, or did not want to know. It constituted a small revolution to observe that the source of auditory hallucination was not external.

This is because, or so it was thought, the source is internal, and what is more tempting than to think that this corresponds to the tingling of a zone itself called sensory? It remains to be known whether this can be applied to the domain of language. Are there verbal psychical hallucinations properly so-called? Are they not always more or less psychomotor hallucinations? Can the phenomenon of speech, in both its pathological forms and its normal form, be dissociated from the fact, which is nonetheless perceptible, that when the subject speaks he hears himself? One of the essential dimensions of the phenomenon of speech is that the other isn't the only person who hears you. The phenomenon of speech can't be schematized by the image that serves a number of what are called communication theories – sender, receiver, and something that takes place in between. It seems to have been forgotten that among many other things in human speech the sender is always a receiver at the same time, that one hears the sound of one's own words. It's possible not to pay attention to it, but it's certain that one hears it.

Such a simple remark dominates the entire question of what is known as verbal psychomotor hallucination, and it's perhaps because it's too self-evident that in the analysis of these phenomena it has moved into the background. Of course the little Séglasian revolution is far from having brought 34 us a solution to the enigma. Séglas remained with the phenomenal exploration of hallucination, and he had to retract what was too absolute in his initial theory. He restored their place to certain hallucinations that are untheorizable in this register, and he threw some new clinical light and contributed a subtlety of description, neither of which can be ignored – I advise you to have a look at him.

If many of these episodes in the history of psychiatry are instructive, it's perhaps more by virtue of the errors they bring into focus than by the positive contributions that supposedly result from them. But it's not possible simply to devote oneself to negative experiences of the field concerned and construct solely on the basis of errors. Errors are in any case so abundant as to be almost inexhaustible. We shall just have to take a few shortcuts to try to get to the heart of the matter.

We shall do this by following Freud's advice and, with him, enter into the analysis of the Schreber case.

After a short illness between 1884 and 1885, a mental illness consisting of a hypochondriacal delusion, Schreber, who then occupied quite an important place in the German judiciary, left Professor Flechsig's Psychiatric Clinic completely cured, it would seem, with no apparent aftereffects.

For the next eight years or so he led an apparently normal life and he himself points out that the only shadow over his domestic happiness was the regret at not having had children. At the end of these eight years he was named Presiding Judge to the Court of Appeal in the city of Leipzig. Having received the announcement of this extremely important promotion before the vacation period, he took up office in October. He was, it seems, as so often happens in many mental crises, a bit overwhelmed by his functions. At fifty-one he was young to be presiding over a court of appeal of this importance and the promotion unhinged him slightly. He found himself among men far more experienced, more accustomed to dealing with such difficult matters, and for a month he overworked, as he himself says, and began to become disturbed again – insomnia, flight of ideas, the appearance of more and more disturbing themes in his thoughts, which led him to further consultations.

And once again he was confined. First in the same Psychiatric Clinic, Professor Flechsig's, then, after a short stay in the mental home of Dr. Pierson in Dresden, in the Sonnenstein Asylum, where he was to remain until 1901. 35
It was there that his delusion went through an entire series of phases of which he gives us an account that is, it seems, extremely trustworthy and extraordinarily composed, written during the last months of his confinement. The book was to be published immediately upon his release. Therefore, at the time he claimed the right to leave he hid from no one that he would make his experience known to all humanity, with the view of informing everybody of the most important revelations for them that his experience contained.

This book, published in 1903, is the one Freud picked up in 1909. He spoke of it on his holidays with Ferenczi and it was in December 1910 that he wrote his "Psycho-Analytic Notes upon an Autobiographical Account of a Case of Paranoia."[13]

We shall quite simply open Schreber's book, Memoirs of My Nervous Illness. The letter preceding the body of the work, which is addressed to Professor Flechsig, private consultant, clearly shows the medium by which a delusional's critique of the terms he holds to most can be established. This, at least for those of you who have no experience of these cases, is of a value that deserves to be highlighted. You will observe that Dr. Flechsig occupies a central place in the construction of the delusion.

[13] James Strachey, who says the book seems to have attracted Freud's attention in 1910, suggests it was September of the same year, while on vacation with Ferenczi, that Freud discussed the whole question of paranoia; see SE 12:3.

Lacan reads the letter, pp. vii–xii.

You will appreciate the courteous tone, the clarity and order. The first chapter is taken up with a whole theory concerning, at least in appearance, God and immortality. The terms at the centre of Schreber's delusion consist in an admission of the prime function of nerves.

Lacan reads the first paragraph, pp. 6–7.

Everything is there. These rays, which exceed the bounds of recognized human individuality, which are unlimited, form the explanatory network, but which he also experiences, on which our patient spins his entire delusion like a web.

The essential point stems from the relation between the nerves, principally between the subject's nerves and the divine nerves, which comprises an entire series of vicissitudes, among which there is the Nervenanhang, or nerve-contact, a form of attraction apt to put the subject in a state of dependence upon several characters, on whose intentions he decides in different ways over the course of his delusion. Initially these intentions are far from benevolent, if 36 only because of their catastrophic effects upon him, but are found over the course of the delusion to be transformed, integrated, into a real progressiveness, like the one you see dominating the personality of Dr. Flechsig at the beginning of the delusion and, at the end, the structure of God. There is examination and even progress characteristic of the divine rays, which are the foundation of souls. This is not to be confused with the identity of the said souls – Schreber strongly emphasizes that the immortality of these souls must not be reduced to the level of the person. The preservation of the ego's identity doesn't seem to him to require justification. All this is said with an air of likelihood that doesn't render the theory unacceptable.

On the other hand, an entire metabolic imagery is developed with extreme precision regarding the nerves, according to which the impressions registered by the nerves subsequently become the primary material which, reincorporated into the rays, nourishes divine action and may well be taken up again, reworked, and utilized in later creations.

The details of these functions matter enormously and we shall come back to them. But already it appears to be characteristic of these rays that they talk – they are obliged to, they have to speak. The nerves' soul intermingles with a certain fundamental language defined by the subject – I shall show you with what subtlety when I read out the appropriate passages. It's akin to a highly vigorous German, with an extremely developed use of euphemism, that includes using the ambivalent power of words – next time I shall give you a condensed reading to greater effect.

It's quite exciting to recognize a striking likeness here to Freud's famous article on the double meaning of primitive words.[14] You recall that Freud thought he had found an analogy between the language of the unconscious, which admits no contradiction, and primitive words that are characterized by their ability to designate the two poles of a property or quality, good and bad, young and old, long and short, etc. A lecture by M. Benveniste last year presented you with a convincing critique of that from the point of view of linguistics,[15] but it remains no less true that Freud's remark carries weight in our experience with neurotics, and if there were anything that guarantees its value it would be the emphasis that in passing Schreber confers on it.

This delusion, whose richness you will see, presents surprising analogies – not only through its content, the image's symbolism, but also through its construction, its very structure – with certain schemas that we can ourselves be called upon to draw out of our own experience. You may, in this theory of divine nerves that talk and may be integrated by the subject while remaining radically separate from him, vaguely see something that isn't totally different from what I teach about the way one has to describe the functioning 37 of the unconscious. The Schreber case objectifies certain structures supposed correct in theory – with the possibility of overturning that stems from this, which is in any case a question that arises concerning all species of emotional construction in these sensitive domains that we are habitually exploring. This remark was made by Freud himself, who in some ways authenticates the homogeneity I'm claiming. At the end of his analysis of the Schreber case he notes that he has never yet seen anything that so much resembles his own libido theory, with its disinvestments,[16] separation reactions, influence at a distance, as Schreber's theory of divine rays, which doesn't bother him, since the drift of his whole exposition is to reveal a surprising approximation between Schreber's delusion and structures of both interindividual exchange and intrapsychical economy.[17]

So, as you see, we are dealing with an advanced case of madness. His delusional introduction gives you an idea of the polished nature of Schreber's lucubrations. And yet, owing to this exemplary case and to the intervention of such a penetrating mind as Freud's, we find ourselves for the first time in a position to grasp structural notions which it's possible to extrapolate to all cases – this vivid and at the same time illuminating novelty allows a classification of paranoia to be recast on completely new foundations. We also find in the very text of the delusion a truth that isn't hidden, as it is in the neuroses, but made well and truly explicit and virtually theorized. The delusion presents it – one can't even say from the moment one has the key to it, but as soon as one takes it for what it is, a double, perfectly legible, of what is explored by theoretical investigation.

This is where the exemplary character of the field of the psychoses, for which I have recommended that you reserve the greatest extension and the greatest suppleness, is located, and this is what justifies our giving special attention to it this year.

The Other and psychosis

HOMOSEXUALITY AND PARANOIA
THE WORD AND THE REFRAIN
AUTOMATISM AND ENDOSCOPY PARANOID KNOWLEDGE
GRAMMAR OF THE UNCONSCIOUS

The life of a psychoanalyst – as I was reminded by my analysands [analysés] several times on the one day – isn't rosy.

The comparison that can be made between the analyst and a rubbish dump is justified. All day long in fact he has to endure utterances that, surely, are of doubtful value to himself and even more so to the subject who communicates them to him. This is a feeling that the psychoanalyst, if he is a real one, has not only been accustomed to overcoming for a long time, but, to be honest, it's one that he purely and simply abolishes within himself in the exercise of his practice.

I must on the other hand say that this feeling comes alive again with all its force when one is led to go over the sum total of works that make up what is called the analytic literature. There is no more disconcerting an exercise for scientific attention than to be made aware over a short space of time of the points of view that authors have elaborated on the same subjects. And nobody seems to perceive the flagrant and permanent contradictions that are brought into play whenever basic concepts arise.

You know that psychoanalysis explains the case of President Schreber, and paranoia in general, by portraying the subject's unconscious drive as nothing other than a homosexual tendency.[1] Drawing attention to all the facts grouped around such a notion was surely fundamentally new, and it profoundly changed our outlook on the pathogenesis of paranoia. But as for knowing what this homosexuality is, at which point of subjective economy it acts, how it occa-

40

[1] "Tendance" has a meaning in both psychology and psychoanalysis. In psychoanalysis it has been used for "Trieb," drive, though in more narrowly psychoanalytic contexts Lacan uses the term "pulsion."

sions the psychosis – I believe I can testify that, in this sense, all the outlines we have contain the most imprecise, even the most contradictory approaches.

People speak of defense against the supposed irruption – and why this irruption at this point? – of the homosexual tendency. But this is far from having been proved, if one is to give a meaning that is in any way precise to the term defense – which one is very careful not to do, so as to be able to continue cogitating in the dark. It's nevertheless clear that there is a constitutive ambiguity here and that the defense maintains a far from univocal relation with the cause that provokes it. It's thought either that the defense helps maintain a certain equilibrium or else that it provokes the illness.

We are also assured that the initial determinants of Schreber's psychosis are to be sought in the moment of onset of the different phases of his illness. You know that around 1886 he had his first crisis, whose co-ordinates people try to show us by means of his Memoirs – at that time he had nominated for the Reichstag, we are told.[2] Between this crisis and the second, which covers a period of eight years, Magistrate Schreber was normal, with the exception that his hope of paternity was unfulfilled. At the end of this period he happened to accede, in a way that up to a point was premature and certainly at an age at which it could not have been foreseen, to a very high function, that of Presiding Judge of the Leipzig Court of Appeal. This function, which was in the nature of an eminent distinction, conferred authority on him, so it's said, that elevated him to responsibility that, though not quite total, was at least greater and heavier than any he could have hoped for, which gives the impression that there was a relation between his promotion and the onset of the crisis.

In other words, in the former case one appeals to the fact that Schreber was unable to satisfy his ambition, and in the other that it was fulfilled from the outside, in a manner that is virtually consecrated as being undeserved. These two events are given the same value as trigger. It's carefully noted that the President had no children, so as to assign a prime role to the notion of paternity. But at the same time it's claimed that because he finally accedes to the position of father, the fear of castration thus comes to life in him again, with a corresponding homosexual craving. This is what is supposed to be 41 directly at issue in the onset of the crisis and to entail all the distortions, pathological deformations, and mirages that progressively evolve into a delusion.

Surely the fact that the masculine characters in the medical entourage are present from the outset, that they are named one after the other and successively come to the centre of President Schreber's extreme paranoid persecution, is enough to show their importance. This is, in a word, a transference – which is undoubtedly not to be taken in quite the sense that we usually mean, but it's something of that order, bound up in a special way with those in whose care he had been. Undoubtedly this is an adequate explanation of the choice of characters, but before we become too satisfied with this overall arrangement it needs to be observed that, in providing its motivation, the proof by the contrary is neglected. People fail to realize that both fear of the struggle and premature success are given the value of a sign with the same positive sense in each case. If by chance President Schreber had, between his two crises, become a father, this would be emphasized and much would be made of the fact that this paternal function would have been unbearable for him. In short, the notion of conflict is always played upon in an ambiguous manner – the source of conflict and, what is much less easy to see, the absence of conflict are placed on the same level. The conflict leaves an empty place, one might say, and it's in the empty place of the conflict that a reaction, a construction, a bringing into play of subjectivity, appears.

This suggestion is only designed to show you that the same ambiguity as the one our last lesson was about is at work, the ambiguity of the very meaning of a delusion, and which here is concerned with what is normally called the content and which I would prefer to call the psychotic statement [dire].

You think you are dealing with someone who is communicating with you because he speaks the same language as you. And then, what he is saying is so understandable that you get the feeling, particularly if you are a psychoanalyst, that here is someone who has penetrated, in a more profound way than is given to the common lot of mortals, into the very mechanism of the system of the unconscious. Somewhere in the second chapter Schreber expresses it in passing – Enlightenment rarely given to mortals has been given to me.[3]

My discourse today is about this ambiguity whereby the very system of the delusional is supposed to provide us with the elements of its own understanding.

Those of you who attend my case presentations are aware that last time I presented quite a clear case of psychosis and will recall the amount of time I put into drawing from her the sign, the stigma, that proved we were indeed dealing with a delusional and not simply with a person of difficult character who quarrels with those around her.

The examination went well beyond the hour that it usually takes for it to appear clearly that, at the limits of this language that there was no way of making her go beyond, there was another one. This is the language, which has a particular and often extraordinary savor, of the delusional. It's a language in which certain words take on a special emphasis, a density that sometimes manifests itself in the very form of the signifier, giving it this frankly neologistic character that is so striking in the creations of paranoia. From out of the mouth of our patient of the other day there finally emerged the word galopiner,[4] which gave us the signature to everything that had been said up to that point.

This was something quite different from the frustration of her dignity, of her independence, of her daily affairs, of which the patient was the victim. This term frustration has belonged to the vocabulary of decent people for some time now – who doesn't go on all day long about the frustrations they have experienced or will experience or that others about them experience? She was obviously in another world, in a world in which this term galopiner, and doubtless many others that she hid from us, constitute essential reference points.

Let me pause here for a moment so you can appreciate how necessary are the categories of the linguistic theory that last year I was trying to make you feel comfortable with. You recall that in linguistics there is the signifier and the signified and that the signifier is to be taken in the sense of the material of language. The trap, the hole one must not fall into, is the belief that signifieds are objects, things. The signified is something quite different – it's the meaning, and I explained to you by means of Saint Augustine, who is as much of a linguist as Monsieur Benveniste, that it always refers to meaning, that is, to another meaning. The system of language, at whatever point you take hold of it, never results in an index finger directly indicating a point of reality; it's the whole of reality that is covered by the entire network of lan-
43 guage. You can never say that this is what is being designated, for even were you to succeed you would never know what I am designating in this table – for example, the color, the thickness, the table as object, or whatever else it might be.[5]

Let us pause at this quite simple little phenomenon of galopiner that came from the mouth of the patient the other day. Schreber himself constantly underlines the oddness of certain terms in his discourse. When he speaks to us for example of the Nervenanhang, nerve contact, he makes it quite clear that this word was spoken to him by the tested souls or the divine rays. These are key words, and he himself notes that he would never have found the formula for them, for the original words, the full words, which are very different from the words he uses to communicate his experience. He himself makes no mistake about this, there are different levels here.[6]

[4] As it happens, "galopiner" is not a neologism. Zola, e.g., employs the word, which derives from "galopin," street-urchin; see Trésor de la langue française, s.v. "galopiner."

[5] See the discussion in chaps. 20 and 21, Sem I:247–72.

At the level of the signifier, in its material aspect, the delusion is characterized precisely by that special form of discordance with common language known as a neologism. At the level of meaning, it's characterized by the following, which will appear to you only if you set out with the idea that a meaning always refers to another meaning, that is, precisely, that the meaning of these words can't be exhausted by reference to another meaning.

This can be seen in Schreber's text as well as in the presence of a patient. The meaning of these words that pull you up has the property of referring essentially to meaning as such. It's a meaning that essentially refers to nothing but itself, that remains irreducible. The patient himself emphasizes that the word carries weight within itself. Before being reducible to another meaning it signifies within itself something ineffable, it's a meaning that refers above all to meaning as such.

We can see this at the two poles of all the concrete manifestations of which these patients are the centre. However far the endophasia that covers the entire phenomena to which they are subject is taken, there are two poles where this characteristic is taken to its highest point, as Schreber's text stresses, two types of phenomena where the neologism is displayed – the intuition and the formula.

The delusional intuition is a full phenomenon that has an overflowing, inundating character for the subject. It reveals a new perspective to him, one whose stamp of originality, whose characteristic savor, he emphasizes, as Schreber does in speaking of the fundamental language to which his experience introduced him. There, the word – with its full emphasis, as when one says the word for, the solution to, an enigma – is the soul of the situation.

At the opposite pole there is the form that meaning takes when it no longer refers to anything at all. This is the formula that is repeated, reiterated, drummed in with a stereotyped insistence. It's what we might call, in contrast to the word, the refrain. 44

These two forms, the fullest and the emptiest, bring the meaning to a halt, it's like lead in the net [plomb dans le filet], in the network, of the subject's discourse – a structural characteristic in which, once we approach it clinically, we recognize the mark of delusion.

This is how this language we can let ourselves be taken in by in our first initial contact with the subject, sometimes even the most delusional subject, brings us to the point of going beyond his conception and positing the term discourse. For, to be sure, these patients speak to us in the same language as ourselves. Without this component, we would be in total ignorance. It's therefore the economy of discourse, the relationship between meaning and meaning, the relationship between their discourse and the common organization of discourse, that allows us to ascertain that delusion is involved.

I once tried to outline an analysis of psychotic discourse in an article published in the Annales médico-psychologiques in the thirties.[7] It concerned a case of schizophasia where effectively one can, at every level of discourse, semanteme as well as taxeme, pick out the structure of what is, perhaps not without reason, but no doubt without full awareness of the term's significance, known as schizophrenic disintegration.

I've been talking about language. You must in this respect touch upon the inadequacy, the undesirable tendency that is betrayed in the expression – One has to speak the patient's language. No doubt those who say such things must be forgiven, like all those who don't know what they are saying. Evoking so summarily what is at issue is the sign of hasty thoughts, of repentance. One absolves oneself, pays one's debts – except that one only displays condescension and reveals at what distance one maintains the object in question, namely the patient. Since he, too, is present, well then, let's speak his language, the language of simpletons and idiots. To mark this distance, to make language a pure and simple instrument, a way of making oneself understood by those who understand nothing, is completely to elude what is at issue – the reality of speech.

Let's leave analysts to one side for the moment. On whom is the psychiatric discussion of delusion, whether it seeks to be phenomenological, psychogenetic, or organogenetic, centered? What do the extraordinarily penetrating analyses of a de Clérambault signify, for instance? Some people think that it is a matter of discovering whether or not delusion is an organic phenomenon. This, it seems, is supposed to be discernible in its very phenomenology. This is all very well, but let's look at the thing a bit more closely.

45 Does the patient speak? If we did not distinguish language and speech, it's true, he speaks, but he speaks like those sophisticated dolls that open and close their eyes, drink liquid, etc. When a de Clérambault analyzes the elementary phenomena, he looks for their signature in their mechanical, serpiginous structure, and God only knows what neologisms. But even on that analysis personality is never defined but is always assumed, since everything rests on the ideogenic character of a primary comprehensibility, on the link between affections and their linguistic expression. This is supposed to be self-evident, this is where the demonstration starts from. We are told this – the automatic character of what takes place is demonstrable phenomenologically, and this proves that the disorder isn't psychogenetic. But it's in relation to a psychogenetic reference itself that the phenomenon is defined as automatic. It's assumed that there is a subject who understands by himself and who observes himself. Otherwise, how would the other phenomena be grasped as foreign?

Notice that this isn't the classical problem that has brought all philosophy since Leibniz to a standstill, that is, at least since consciousness has been emphasized as the foundation of certainty – must a thought, to be a thought, necessarily think of itself thinking? Must all thought necessarily perceive that it's thinking of what it is thinking? This is so far from being straightforward that it immediately leads into an endless play of mirrors – if it's the nature of thought to think of itself thinking, there will be a third thought that will think of itself thinking thought, and so on. This small problem, which has never been resolved, suffices on its own to demonstrate the insufficiency of the subject's foundation in the phenomenon of thought as transparent to itself. But this isn't at all what is at issue here.

Once we allow that the subject has knowledge as such of the parasitic phenomenon as such, that is, as subjectively unmotivated, as written into the structure of the mechanism, into the disturbance of the supposed neurological pathways, we cannot avoid the idea that the subject has an endoscopy of what is actually going on within his own mechanisms. This is a necessity imposed on any theory that makes intraorganic phenomena the center of what happens in the subject. Freud attacks this problem more subtly than other authors, but he is equally obliged to admit that the subject is somewhere, at a privileged point where he is able to have an endoscopy of what is going on inside himself.

This idea doesn't surprise anybody when it's a question of more or less delusional endoscopies that the subject has of what is happening inside his stomach or his lungs, but it's a more difficult matter when intracerebral phenomena are concerned. The authors are forced to admit, though usually without being aware of it, that the subject has some endoscopy of what goes on inside the system of nerve fibers.

Take a subject who is the object of a thought-echo. Let's agree with Clérambault that this is the effect of a delay produced by a chronaxic deterioration – one of the two intracerebral messages, one of the two telegrams, as it were, is impeded and arrives after the other, thus as its echo. For this delay to be registered, there must be some privileged reference point at which this can occur, from which the subject notes a possible discordance between one system and another. However the organogenetic or automatizing theory is constructed, there is no escaping the consequence that some such privileged point exists. In a word, one is more of a psychogeneticist than ever.

What is this privileged point if it's not the soul? – except that one is even more idolatry than those who confer the crudest reality on the soul by locating it in a fiber or a system, in what President Schreber designates as the unique fiber attached to the personality. It's what is habitually called the function of synthesis, the nature of a synthesis being to have its point of convergence somewhere – even if ideal, this point exists.

So whether we are organogeneticists or psychogeneticists, we shall always be forced to assume the existence of a unifying entity somewhere. Does that entity suffice to explain the level of psychotic phenomena? The sterility of these sorts of hypotheses is astounding. If psychoanalysis has revealed anything significant, clarifying, illuminating, fruitful, rich, dynamic, it's through disturbing the minuscule psychiatric constructions pursued over the decades with the help of purely functional notions of which the ego, which camouflaged them, necessarily formed the essential hub.

But as for what psychoanalysis has contributed that is new, how do we approach it without again falling into the same rut from a different direction, through multiplying egos, themselves variously camouflaged? The only approach consistent with the Freudian discovery is to raise the issue within the same register in which the phenomenon appears to us, that is, in the register of speech. It's the register of speech that creates all the richness of the phenomenology of psychosis, it's here that we see all its aspects, decompositions, refractions. Verbal hallucination, which is fundamental to it, is precisely one of speech's most problematic phenomena.

47 Is there no way of dwelling on the phenomenon of speech as such? Simply by taking it into consideration, don't we see a primary structure emerge, an essential and obvious structure that enables us to make distinctions that are not mythical, that is, that do not assume that the subject is somewhere?

What is speech? Does the subject speak or does he not? Speech – let's dwell on this fact for a moment.

What distinguishes speech [une parole] from a registering of language? To speak is first of all to speak to others. I have on many occasions brought to the foreground of my teaching this characteristic which at first sight appears simple – speaking to others.

The notion of what a message is has, for some time, been in the foreground of the preoccupations of science. For us, the structure of speech, as I have said to you whenever we have had to use this term in its strict sense here, is that the subject receives his message from the other in an inverted form. Full speech, essential, committed speech, is based on this structure. We have two exemplary forms of this.

The first is fides, speech that gives itself, the You are my woman or the You are my master, which means – You are what is still within my speech, and this I can only affirm by speaking in your place. This comes from you to find the certainty of what I pledge.[8] This speech is speech that commits you. The unity of speech insofar as it founds the position of the two subjects is made apparent here.

If this doesn't seem obvious to you, confirmation by its contrary is, as usual, so much more obvious.

The sign by which the subject-to-subject relation is recognized, and which distinguishes it from the subject-to-object relationship, is the feint, the reverse of fides. You are in the presence of a subject insofar as what he says and does – they're the same thing – can be supposed to have been said and done to deceive you, with all the dialectic that that comprises, up to and including that he should tell the truth so that you believe the contrary. You know the Jewish joke, recounted by Freud, about the character who says – I am going to Cracow. And the other replies – Why are you telling me you are going to Cracow? You are telling me that to make me believe that you are going somewhere else.[9] What the subject tells me is always fundamentally related to a possible feint, in which he sends me, and I receive, the message in an inverted form.

There you have both sides of the structure, foundational speech and lying 48 speech which is deceptive as such.

We have generalized the notion of communication. In the present state of affairs, it's touch and go whether the entire theory of what goes on in living beings will be revised as a function of communication. Read anything by Mr. Norbert Wiener; its implications are huge. Among his many paradoxes he presents this strange myth of transmitting a man by telegraph from Paris to New York by sending exhaustive information on everything that constitutes his individuality. Since there is no limit to the transmission of information, the point-by-point resynthesis, the automatic recreation of his entire true identity at a distant place, is conceivable. Such things are curiously deceptive, and everyone wonders at them. They are a subjective mirage which collapses as soon as one points out that it would be no greater a miracle to telegraph over two centimeters. And we do nothing less when we move ourselves through the same distance. This extraordinary confusion is sufficient indication that the notion of communication has to be treated cautiously.

For my part, within the generalized notion of communication, I state what speech as speaking to the other is. It's making the other speak as such.

We shall, if you like, write that other with a big O.

And why with a big O? No doubt for a delusional reason, as is the case whenever one is obliged to provide signs that are supplementary to what language offers. That delusional reason is the following. You are my woman

[8] "Cela vient de toi pour y trouver la certitude de ce que j'engage."
[9] Jokes and Their Relation to the Unconscious, SE 8:115.

– after all, what do you know about it? You are my master – in point of fact, are you so sure? Precisely what constitutes the foundational value of this speech is that what is aimed at in the message, as well as what is apparent in the feint, is that the other is there as absolute Other. Absolute, that is to say that he is recognized but that he isn't known. Similarly, what constitutes the feint is that ultimately you do not know whether it's a feint or not. It's essentially this unknown in the otherness of the Other that characterizes the speech relation at the level at which speech is spoken to the other.

I am going to keep you at the level of structural description for a while, because it's only here that the problems can be raised. Is this all that distinguishes speech? Perhaps, but surely it has other characteristics – it doesn't speak only to the other, it speaks of the other as an object. And this is what is involved when a subject speaks to you of himself.

49 Take the paranoiac of the other day, the one who used the term galopiner. While she talks to you, you know that she is a subject by virtue of the fact that she tries to take you in. This is what you are expressing in saying that you are simply dealing with what you clinically call a partial delusion. It's precisely to the extent that it took me an hour and a half the other day to make her produce her galopiner, to the extent that during all that time she held me at bay and showed herself to be of sane mind, that she maintains herself at the limit of what can be clinically perceived as a delusion. What you call, in your jargon, the sane part of the personality derives from the fact that she speaks of the other, is capable of making fun of him. It's by virtue of this that she exists as a subject.

Now, there is another level. She is talking about herself, and she happens to say a little bit more than she would have liked to. This is where we perceive that she is deluding. Here she is talking about what is our common object – the other, with a small o. It is indeed still she who is talking, but there is another structure here, which moreover doesn't reveal itself entirely. It's not quite as if she were talking to me about nothing in particular, she is talking to me about something which to her is very interesting, vital, she is talking about something to which she nevertheless continues to be committed – in short, she bears witness.

Let us try to probe a bit the notion of bearing witness. Is bearing witness purely and simply communication, too? Surely not. It's clear however that everything we attach value to as communication is of the order of bearing witness.

Disinterested communication is ultimately only failed testimony, that is, something upon which everybody is agreed. Everyone knows that this is the ideal of the transmission of knowledge. The entire system of thought of the scientific community is based on the possibility of a communication that concludes with an experiment that everybody can agree on. The very institution of the experiment is a function of testimony.

Here we are dealing with another sort of otherness. I can't repeat all I once said about what I have called paranoid knowledge, since I shall also have to take it up again constantly over this year's discourse, but I am going to give you some idea of it.

What I designated thus in my first communication to the group Evolution psychiatrique, which at the time was quite remarkably original, was aimed at the paranoid affinities between all knowledge of objects as such. All human knowledge stems from the dialectic of jealousy, which is a primordial manifestation of communication. It's a matter of an observable generic notion, behavioristically observable. What takes place between two young children 50 involves this fundamental transitivism expressed by the fact that one child who has beaten another can say – The other beat me. It's not that he is lying – he is the other, literally.

This is the basis of the distinction between the human world and the animal world. Human objects are characterized by their neutrality and indefinite proliferation. They are not dependent on the preparation of any instinctual coaptation of the subject, in the way that there is coaptation, housing, of one chemical valency by another. What makes the human world a world covered with objects derives from the fact that the object of human interest is the object of the other's desire.

How is this possible? It's possible because the human ego is the other and because in the beginning the subject is closer to the form of the other than to the emergence of his own tendency. He is originally an inchoate collection of desires – there you have the true sense of the expression fragmented body – and the initial synthesis of the ego is essentially an alter ego, it is alienated. The desiring human subject is constructed around a center which is the other insofar as he gives the subject his unity, and the first encounter with the object is with the object as object of the other's desire.

This defines, within the speech relationship, something that originates somewhere else – this is exactly the distinction between the imaginary and the real. A primitive otherness is included in the object, insofar as primitively it's the object of rivalry and competition. It's of interest only as the object of the other's desire.

The said paranoid knowledge is knowledge founded on the rivalry of jealousy, over the course of the primary identification I have tried to define by means of the mirror stage. This rivalrous and competitive ground for the foundation of the object is precisely what is overcome in speech insofar as this involves a third party. Speech is always a pact, an agreement, people get on with one another, they agree – this is yours, this is mine, this is this, that is that. But the aggressive character of primitive competition leaves its mark on every type of discourse about the small other, about the Other as third party, about the object. It's not for nothing that in Latin testimony is called testis and that one testifies on one's balls. In everything of the order of testimony there is always some commitment by the subject, and a virtual struggle in which the organism is always latent.

This dialectic always carries the possibility that I may be called upon to annul the other, for one simple reason. The beginning of this dialectic being my alienation in the other, there is a moment at which I can be put into the position of being annulled myself because the other doesn't agree. The dialec-51 tic of the unconscious always implies struggle, the impossibility of coexistence with the other, as one of its possibilities.

The master-slave dialectic reappears here. The Phenomenology of Mind probably doesn't exhaust the whole question, but surely its psychological and psychogenetic value can't be misrecognized. It's in a fundamental rivalry, in a primary and essential struggle to the death, that the constitution of the human world as such takes place. Except that at the end one is present when the stakes reappear.

The master has taken the slave's enjoyment from him, he has stolen the object of desire as object of the slave's desire, but at the same time he has lost his own humanity. It was in no way the object of enjoyment that was at issue, but rivalry as such. To whom does he owe his humanity? Solely to the slave's recognition. However, since he doesn't recognize the slave, that recognition literally has no value. As is habitual in the concrete development of things, the one who has triumphed and conquered the enjoyment becomes a complete idiot, incapable of doing anything other than enjoying, while he who has been deprived of it keeps his humanity intact. The slave recognizes the master, and thus he has the possibility of being recognized by him. Over the centuries he will engage in the struggle to be effectively recognized.

This distinction between the Other with a big O, that is, the Other in so far as it's not known, and the other with a small o, that is, the other who is me, the source of all knowledge, is fundamental. It's in this gap, it's in the angle opened up between these two relations, that the entire dialectic of delusion has to be situated. The question is this – firstly, is the subject talking to you? – secondly, what is he talking about?

I am not going to answer the first question. Is it true speech? – at the outset we can't know. On the other hand, what does he talk to you about? About himself no doubt, but first about one object that isn't like any of the others, about an object that is situated in the prolongation of the dual dialectic – he speaks to you about something that has spoken to him.

The very basis of the paranoid structure is the fact that the subject has understood something that he formulates, that something has taken the form of speech and speaks to him. No one, of course, is in any doubt that this is a 52 fantasized being, not even he, for he is always in a position to admit the totally ambiguous character of the source of the utterances that have been addressed to him. The paranoiac bears witness to you concerning the structure of this being that speaks to the subject.

You must already be able to tell the difference in level between alienation as the general form of the imaginary and alienation in psychosis. It's not simply a matter of identification, and of scenery swinging over onto the side of the little other. From the moment the subject speaks, the Other, with a big O, is there. Without this there would be no problem of psychosis. Psychotics would be speaking machines.

It's precisely insofar as he speaks to you that you take his testimony into account. The question is this. What is the structure of this being that speaks to him, and that everybody agrees is fantasmatic? It's precisely the S in the sense in which the analyst understands it, but an S with a question mark. What part in the subject talks? Analysis says it's the unconscious. Naturally, for this question to make sense you have to have already admitted that the unconscious is something that speaks within the subject, beyond the subject, and even when the subject doesn't know it, and that says more about him than he believes. Analysis says that in the psychoses this is what speaks. Is this enough? Absolutely not, for the whole question is how it [ça] speaks and what the structure of paranoid discourse is. Freud gave us an altogether gripping dialectic on this point.

It's based on the utterance [énoncé] of a fundamental tendency that might eventually be recognized in a neurosis, namely – I love him and You love me. There are three ways of negating this, says Freud.[10] He doesn't beat about the bush, he doesn't tell us why the unconscious of psychotics is such a good grammarian and such a bad philologist – from the philologist's viewpoint all this is in fact extremely suspect. Don't think that this works like a high-school grammar book – there are, depending on the language, many ways of saying I love him. Freud doesn't stop there, he says there are three ways, and three types of delusion, and it works.

The first way to negate it is to say – It's not I who love him, it's she, my conjoint, my double. The second is to say – It's not him that I love, it's her. At this level the defense isn't adequate for the paranoid subject, the disguise is inadequate, he isn't safe, projection has to enter into play. The third possibility – I do not love him, I hate him. Here inversion is also inadequate, this at least is what Freud tells us, and the mechanism of projection must also intervene, namely – He hates me. And there we have the delusion of persecution.

53 The high degree of synthesis that this construction contributes is illuminating for us, but you see the questions that remain open. Projection has to intervene as a supplementary mechanism whenever there is no effacement of the I. This isn't totally unacceptable, though we would like more information about it. Furthermore, it's clear that the not, the negation taken in its most categorical form, definitely doesn't have, when applied to these different terms, the same value. But on the whole this construction comes close to something, it works, and it situates things at their true level by tackling them from this angle of, I would say, principal logomachy.

Perhaps what I have said to you this morning will give you some indication that we can rephrase the question differently. I love him – is this a message, an utterance, a testimony, the brute recognition of a fact in its neutralized state?

Take things in terms of a message. In the first case, It's she that loves him, the subject gets another to carry his message. This alienation surely places us on the level of the little other – the ego speaks through the intermediary of the alter ego, which has meanwhile changed sex. We shall restrict ourselves to observing the inverted alienation. In delusions of jealousy, this identification with the other with a reversal of the sign of sexualization is in the foreground.

On the other hand, by analyzing the structure this way, you see that it isn't, in any case, a question of projection in the sense in which it can be integrated into a mechanism of neurosis. This projection consists in effect of imputing one's own infidelities to the other – when one is jealous of one's wife, it's because one has a few little peccadilloes of one's own to reproach oneself with. The same mechanism can't be invoked in the delusion of jealousy, probably psychotic, such as it's presented either in Freud's case or in the register into which I myself have just tried to insert it, where it's the person you are identified with through an inverted alienation, namely your own wife, that you make the messenger of your feelings concerning, not even another man, but, as the clinic shows, a more or less indefinite number of men. The properly paranoid delusion of jealousy is repeatable indefinitely, it re-emerges at every turning point of experience and may implicate fairly well any subject who appears on the horizon, and even ones that don't.

Now, It's not him that I love, it's her. This is another type of alienation, no longer inverted, but diverted. The other addressed in erotomania is very special, since the subject doesn't have any concrete relations with him, so much so that it has been possible to speak in terms of a mystical bond or platonic love. He is very often a distant object with whom the subject is happy to 54 communicate in writing, without even knowing whether what's written will get to its destination. The least that can be said is that there is diverted alienation of the message. The accompanying depersonalization of the other is apparent in that heroic perseverance through every trial, as the erotomaniacs will themselves say. The erotomaniacal delusion is addressed to such a neutralized other that he is inflated to the very dimensions of the world, since the universal interest attached to the adventure, as de Clérambault used to say, is an essential part of it.

In the third case we are dealing with something much closer to negation. It's a converted alienation, in that love has become hatred. The profound deterioration of the entire system of the other, its reduction ratio, the extensive nature of interpretations about the world, shows you here the properly imaginary disturbance at its maximum extension.

The relations with the Other in delusions now call for investigation. Our terms will help us to reply all the better, through making us distinguish between the subject, he who talks, and the other with whom he is caught in the imaginary relation, the center of gravity of his individual ego, and in which there is no speech. These terms will enable us to characterize psychosis and neurosis in a new way.

WHAT RETURNS IN THE REAL PUPPETS OF DELUSION
R. S. I. IN LANGUAGE
THE EROTIZATION OF THE SIGNIFIER

In two articles respectively entitled "The Loss of Reality in Neurosis and Psychosis" and "Neurosis and Psychosis"[1] Freud provides us with interesting information on the question of what distinguishes neurosis from psychosis. I shall try to emphasize what distinguishes them from one another with respect to the disturbances they create in the subject's relations with reality.

It is also an opportunity to recall, in a precise and structured way, what is meant by repression in neurosis.

Freud stresses the extent to which the subject's relations with reality are not the same in neurosis and psychosis. In particular, the clinical characteristic of the psychotic is distinguished by this profoundly perverted relation to reality known as a delusion. For this great difference in organization, or disorganization, there must be, Freud tells us, a deep-seated structural reason. How are we to spell out this difference?

When we speak of neurosis, we ascribe a certain role to flight, to avoidance, in which conflict with reality plays a part. Attempts have been made to designate the function of reality in the onset of neurosis by the notion of traumatism, which is an etiological notion. This is one thing, but another is the moment in a neurosis when a certain rupture with reality occurs in the 56 subject. What is the reality involved? Freud stresses from the outset that the reality sacrificed in neurosis is a part of psychical reality.

We are already entering here upon a very important distinction – reality is not synonymous with external reality. When he triggers his neurosis the subject elides, scotomizes as it has since been said, a part of his psychical reality, or, in another language, a part of his id.[2] This part is forgotten but continues to make itself heard. How? In a manner that all my teaching emphasizes – in a symbolic manner.

[1] SE 19:183–87 and 149–53.

In the first article I mentioned Freud evokes a storehouse that the subject sets aside in reality and in which he preserves resources to be used in constructing the external world – this is where psychosis will borrow its material from. Neurosis, Freud says, is something quite different, for the subject attempts to make the reality that he at one time elided re-emerge by lending it a particular meaning, a secret meaning, which we call symbolic.[3] But Freud does not emphasize this properly. Overall the impressionistic manner in which the term symbolic is used has until now never been made precise in a way that is really consistent with what is at stake.

I point out, in passing, that I don't always have the opportunity to provide the textual references that a number of you would like, because they mustn't interrupt my discourse. Nevertheless I do give you, it seems to me, quotations where necessary.

Many passages in Freud's work show that he felt the need for a complete articulation of the symbolic order, for this is what was at stake for him in neurosis, to which he opposes psychosis, where at some time there has been a hole, a rupture, a rent, a gap, with respect to external reality. In neurosis, inasmuch as reality is not fully rearticulated symbolically into the external world, it is in a second phase that a partial flight from reality, an incapacity to confront this secretly preserved part of reality, occurs in the subject. In psychosis, on the contrary, reality itself initially contains a hole that the world of fantasy will subsequently fill.

Can we be satisfied with so simple a definition, so summary an opposition between neurosis and psychosis? Surely not, and Freud himself indicates, subsequent to his reading of Schreber's text, that it's not enough just to see how symptoms are made. It is also necessary to discover the mechanism of their formation. Let's start with the idea that a hole, a fault, a point of rupture, in the structure of the external world finds itself patched over by psychotic fantasy. How is this to be explained? We have at our disposal the 57 mechanism of projection.

I shall start with that today, insisting upon it in particular because a number of you working on the Freudian texts I've already commented on have said that, in returning to a passage whose importance I've pointed out, you are still hesitant over the meaning to give to a fragment, even though it's very clear, concerning the episodic hallucination in which the paranoid potential-ities of the Wolf Man appear. While what I was stressing when I said that what has been rejected from the symbolic reappears in the real was grasped very well, a discussion arose over the way I translate the patient does not want to know anything about it in the sense of repression.[4] However, to act on the repressed through the mechanism of repression is to know something about it, for repression and the return of the repressed are one and the same thing, expressed elsewhere than in the subject's conscious language. The difficulty for some was their failure to grasp that what is involved is of the order of knowledge [un savoir].

I shall quote you another passage, taken from the Schreber case. While Freud is explaining to us the mechanism of projection as such, which is supposed to explain the reappearance of fantasy in reality, he pauses to observe that we cannot speak here purely and simply of projection. This is all too self-evident if one thinks of the way this mechanism functions, for example, in the delusion of so-called projective jealousy, which consists in imputing to one's spouse infidelities of which one imaginatively feels guilty oneself. The delusion of persecution is quite different and manifests itself through interpretive intuitions in the real. Here are the terms in which Freud expresses himself – It is incorrect to say that the internally suppressed sensation – Verdrängung is a symbolization, and Unterdrückung simply indicates that something has fallen underneath – is once again projected outwards – this is the repressed and the return of the repressed – But instead we must say that what is rejected – you perhaps recall the note of insistence that usage has given this word – returns from without.[5]

There you have a text to add to the ones that I've already quoted in the same vein, and which are pivotal. To be precise, the text Die Verneinung that M. Hyppolite gave us a commentary on has enabled us to articulate with precision that there is a moment that is, one might say, the point of origin of symbolization. Let it be clearly understood that this point of origin is not a point in development but answers to the requirement that symbolization has to have a beginning. Now, at any point in development something may occur 58 that is the contrary of Bejahung – a Verneinung that is in some way primitive, to which Verneinung in its clinical consequences is a sequel. The distinction between the two mechanisms, Verneinung and Bejahung, is absolutely essential.

We should be better off to abandon this term projection. What we are concerned with here has nothing to do with the psychological projection that makes us – when for example it concerns those about whom we have nothing

[4] See above, p. 12, n.10.

[5] "It was incorrect to say that the perception which was suppressed internally is projected outwards; the truth is rather, as we now see, that what was abolished internally returns from without." SE 12:71.

but extremely mixed feelings – always greet everything they do with at least a certain amount of confusion as to their intentions. Projection in psychosis is not that at all; it's the mechanism that makes what has got caught up in the Verwerfung – that is, what has been placed outside the general symbolization structuring the subject – return from without.

What is this three-card trick we are all prey to, this strange juggler's game between the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real? Since we don't know the juggler we can ask the question. I am putting it on this year's agenda. It will enable us to define what is called the relation to reality and at the same time to articulate what the goal of analysis is, without falling into the constant confusions made in analytic theory on this subject. What are we talking about when we talk about adaptation to reality? Nobody knows what reality is, until it has been defined, which is not altogether simple.

To introduce the problem I shall begin from a thoroughly up-to-the-minute element. No one can say that this seminar is merely a commentary of texts, in the sense in which it would involve a pure and simple exegesis – these things are alive for us in our daily practice, in our supervisions, in the way we conduct our interpretation, in the way we deal with resistances.

So I shall borrow an example from my case presentation of last Friday.

Those of you who attend my presentations will recall that I was dealing with two people and one single delusion, what is known as a délire à deux.

It wasn't very easy for me to draw out either daughter or mother. I've reason to think that the daughter had been examined and presented before I became involved with her and that she had seen the role that patients play in a teaching ward a good dozen times. It does not matter whether or not one is delusional, one gets fed up fairly quickly with these sorts of exercises, and 59 she wasn't particularly well disposed.

It was nevertheless possible to bring out certain things, and in particular the following. Paranoid delusion, since she is paranoid, is far from presupposing a character base of pride, mistrust, irritability, psychological rigidity, as people say. At least, alongside the chain of interpretations, difficult to grasp, of which she felt she was the victim, this young girl had, on the contrary, the feeling that a person as good and kind as herself who, into the bargain, was surrounded by the many trials she had undergone, could only benefit from benevolence, from a general sympathy – and indeed the head of her ward, in making his report on her, spoke of her only as a charming woman loved by all.

In a word, after having had all the difficulty in the world tackling the subject, I approached the center of what was manifestly present there. Of course, her basic concern was to prove to me that no element was subject to reticence, while at the same time not allowing the doctor any room for the wrong interpretation, of which she was certain in advance. All the same she confided to me that one day, as she was leaving her home, she had a run-in in the hallway with an ill-mannered sort of chap, which came as no surprise to her, since this shameful married man was the steady lover of one of her neighbors, someone of loose morals.

On passing her – she could not hide this from me, it still weighed upon her chest – he had said a dirty word to her, a dirty word that she was disinclined to repeat to me because, as she put it, it devalued her. Nevertheless, a certain gentleness that I had put into approaching her meant that after five minutes of chat we were on good terms with one another, and on that subject she confessed to me with a conceding laugh that she was not completely innocent in this matter for she herself had said something in passing. This something, which she confessed to me more easily than what she had heard, was this – I've just been to the butcher's.

Naturally, I'm like everybody else, I make the same mistakes as you, I do everything I tell you that you mustn't do. I'm no less in the wrong – even when it works. A true opinion remains no less an opinion from the point of view of science, as Spinoza shows. If you understand, so much the better, keep it to yourself. The important thing is not to understand, but to attain the true. But if you attain it by chance, even if you understand, you don't understand. Naturally, I understand – which proves that we all have a little 60 something in common with delusionals. I have within myself, as you have within yourselves, what there is that is delusional in the normal man.

I've just been to the butcher's – if I am told that there is something there to understand I may well declare that there is a reference to pig. I didn't say Pig, I said Pork.[6]

She agreed entirely. That was what she wanted me to understand. It was perhaps also what she wanted the other to understand. Except that this is precisely what one must not do. What one has to be interested in is the point of knowing why she wanted the other to understand this, precisely, and why she didn't say it to him clearly, but by allusion. If I understand I continue, I don't dwell on it, since I've already understood. This brings out what it is to enter into the patient's game – it is to collaborate in his resistance. The patient's resistance is always your own, and when a resistance succeeds it is because you are in it up to your neck, because you understand. You understand, you are wrong. What it is, precisely, that has to be understood is why there is something there given to be understood. Why did she say, I've just been to the butcher's and not Pig?

[6] That is, in the interview with the woman, he said Pork and not Pig. The charcutier, here translated as butcher, specializes in pork products.

I limited my commentary, because of insufficient time, to pointing out to you that it contained a gem, and showed you the similarity with the discovery that consisted in observing one day that certain patients who complain of auditory hallucinations were manifestly making movements of the throat, of the lips; in other words, they were articulating them themselves. Here, it's not the same, it's similar, and it's even more interesting because it's not the same.

I said – I've just been to the butcher's, and then she blurts it out to us, what did he say? He said – Sow! This is the final word – thread, needle, my soul, my life, things happen thus in our existence.

Let's pause here a moment. There he is, all pleased with himself, you are saying to yourselves. This is what he teaches us – in speech the subject receives his message in an inverted form. Disabuse yourselves, this isn't true. The message in question is not identical with speech, far from it, at least not in the sense in which I describe it to you as the form of mediation where the subject receives his message from the other in an inverted form.

First, who is this character? We have already said he is a married man, the lover of a girl who is herself the friend of our patient and heavily implicated in the desire of which our patient is the victim – she is not its center but, I would say, its main character. Our subject's relations with this couple are ambiguous. They are no doubt persecutory and hostile characters, but they 61 are not grasped in such a terribly litigious style, which surprised those present at the interview. What characterizes this subject's relations with the outside is rather her perplexity – how was it possible, through malicious gossip, no doubt through taking legal action, to get them into hospital? The universal interest bestowed on them has a tendency to be repeated. From this there arise these beginnings of erotomaniacal elements that we observed in the presentation. They aren't properly speaking erotomaniacs, but they're inhabited by the feeling that one is interested in them.

Sow, what is that? It is effectively her message, but is it not rather her message to herself?

At the beginning of everything that was said, there was the intrusion of the said neighbor into the relationship of these isolated women, who had remained closely bound to one another in their existence, who were unable to separate when the younger married, who suddenly fled the dramatic situation that seems to have been created in the marital relations of the latter by the threats of her husband who, according to the medical certificates, wanted nothing less than to slice her up. We get the feeling here that the insult in question – the term insult is quite essential here and has always been stressed in the clinical phenomenology of paranoia – agrees with the process of defense, the pathway of expulsion, to which the two patients felt compelled to proceed in relation to the neighbor who was considered primordially invading. She would always come and knock at their door while they were at their toilet or just as they were dining or reading. Above all, it was a matter of distancing this person who was essentially taken to be intrusive. Things only started to become problematic when this expulsion, this refusal, this rejection, took full effect, I mean when they actually threw her out.

Is this to be located at the level of projection, as a defense mechanism? The entire intimate life of these patients has unfolded outside the masculine element, they have always made the latter into an outsider with whom they have never been in harmony, for them the world is essentially feminine. Is the relation they maintain with persons of their own sex of the projection type, in their supposed necessity to remain themselves, closed in on themselves, as a couple? Is it connected with that homosexual fixation, in the widest sense of the term, that is at the base, as Freud says, of social relations? This would explain how in the isolation of this feminine world in which these two women live they find themselves in a position, not to receive their message from the 62 other, but to speak it to the other. Is insult the mode of defense that is in some way reflected back into their relationship – a relationship which, it's understandable how, was extended to all others as such, whoever they may be, from the moment it was established? This is conceivable and already suggests that it's a matter of the subject's own message, and not of the message received in inverted form.

Should we stop there? Certainly not. This analysis may enable us to understand how the patient feels surrounded by feelings of hostility. But that is not the point. The important thing is that Sow! has been heard really, in the real.

Who is speaking? Since there is a hallucination it's reality that is speaking. This follows from our premises if we accept that reality is made up of sensations and perceptions. There is no ambiguity over this; she didn't say I had the feeling that he answered me – "Sow!" She said – I said, "I've just been to the butcher's," and he said "Sow!" to me.

Either we are satisfied with saying to ourselves – There you are, she's hallucinating, or we try – this may seem to be a senseless enterprise but hasn't the role of psychoanalysts so far been to give themselves over to meaningless enterprises? – to go a little bit further.

And first of all, is it the reality of objects that is at issue? Who normally speaks in reality, for us? Is it reality, exactly, when someone speaks to us? The point of the remarks I made to you last time on the other and the Other, the other with a small o and the Other with a big O, was to get you to notice that when the Other with a big O speaks it is not purely and simply the reality in front of you, namely the individual who is holding forth. The Other is beyond that reality.

In true speech the Other is that before which you make yourself recognized. But you can make yourself recognized by it only because it is recognized first. It has to be recognized for you to be able to make yourself recognized. This supplementary dimension – the reciprocity – is necessary for there to be any value in this speech of which I've given you some typical examples – You are my master or You are my woman, or, equally, mendacious speech which, although the contrary, equally presupposes recognition by an absolute Other, aimed at beyond all you can know, for whom recognition is to be valued only because it is beyond the known. It is through recognizing it that you institute it, and not as a pure and simple element of reality, a pawn, a puppet, but as an irreducible absolute, on whose existence as subject the very value of the speech in which you get yourself recognized depends. 63
Something gets born there.

In saying to someone, You are my woman, you are implicitly saying to her, I am your man, but you are saying to her first, You are my woman, that is, you are establishing her in the position of being recognized by you, by means of which she will be able to recognize you. This speech is therefore always beyond language. And such a commitment, like any other utterance, even a lie, conditions all the discourse that follows, and here, what I understand by discourse includes acts, steps, the contortions of puppets, yourselves included, caught up in the game. Beginning with an utterance a game is instituted, entirely comparable to what happens in Alice in Wonderland when the servants and other characters of the Queen's court start playing cards by dressing themselves up in the cards and themselves becoming the King of Hearts, the Queen of Spades, and the Jack of Diamonds. An utterance commits you to maintaining it through your discourse, or to repudiating it, or to objecting to it, or to conforming to it, to refuting it, but, even more, to complying with many things that are within the rules of the game. And even should the Queen change the rules from one moment to the next, this changes nothing essential – once you have entered the play of symbols, you are always forced to act according to a rule.

In other words, whenever a puppet talks it's not the puppet that talks, but it's someone behind it. The question is what is the function of the character one encounters on this occasion. What we can say is that for the subject it's clearly something real that is speaking. Our patient is not saying that there is someone else behind him who is speaking. She receives her own speech from him, but not inverted, her own speech is in the other who is herself, the little other, her reflection in the mirror, her counterpart. Sow! gives tit for tat, and one no longer knows whether the tit or the tat comes first.

That the utterance is expressed in the real means that it is expressed in the puppet. The Other at issue in this situation is not beyond the partner, it is beyond the subject herself – this is the structure of the allusion, it indicates itself in a beyond of what it says.

Let us try to orientate ourselves by means of this game of four implied by what I said last time.[7]

The small o is the gentleman she encounters in the corridor and there is no big O. It's small o' who says, I've just been to the butcher's. And who is I've just been to the butcher's said of? Of S. Small o said Sow! to her. The person who is speaking to us, and who spoke qua delusional, o', undoubtedly receives 64 somewhere her own message in an inverted form from the small other, and what she says affects the beyond which she herself is as subject and which, by definition, simply because she is a human subject, she can only speak of by allusion.

There are only two ways one can talk about this S, about this subject that we radically are. These are – either truly to address oneself to the Other, the big Other, and to receive from it the message that concerns you in an inverted form – or to indicate its direction, its existence, in the form of an allusion. The reason that the woman is strictly a paranoiac is that for her the cycle contains an exclusion of the big Other. The circuit closes on the two small others who are the puppet opposite her, which speaks, and in which her own message resonates, and herself who, as an ego, is always an other and speaks by allusion.

This is the important thing. She speaks by allusion so well that she doesn't know what she is saying. What does she say? She says – I've just been to the butcher's. Now, who has just been to the butcher's? A quartered pig. She does not know that she is saying this, but she says it nevertheless. That other to whom she is speaking, she says to him about herself – I, the sow, have just been to the butcher's, I am already disjointed, a fragmented body, membra disjecta, delusional, and my world is fragmenting, like me. That's what she's saying. That way of expressing it, however understandable it might appear to us, is nevertheless, to put it mildly, a tiny bit amusing.

There is another thing which concerns temporality. It is clear from the patient's words that we do not know who spoke first. To all appearances it was not our patient, or at least it was not necessarily her. We will never know since we are not going to time dereal [déréel] utterances, but if what I've just sketched out is correct, if the response is the allocution – that is, what the patient actually said – then the I've just been to the butcher's presupposes the response, Sow!

In true speech, on the contrary, the allocution is the response. What responds to speech is in effect the consecration of the Other as my woman or as my master, and so here it's the response that presupposes the allocution. In delusional speech the Other is truly excluded, there is no truth behind, there is so little truth that the subject places none there himself, and in the face of this phenomenon, this ultimately raw phenomenon, his attitude is one of perplexity. It will be a long time before he attempts to restore an order, which we shall call a delusional order, around this. He does not restore it, as is thought, through deduction and construction, but in a way that we shall later see is not unrelated to the primitive phenomenon itself.

The Other being truly excluded, what concerns the subject is actually said 65 by the little other, by shadows of others, or, as Schreber will express himself to designate all human beings he encounters, by fabricated, or improvised men. The small other effectively presents an unreal character, tending towards the unreal.

The translation that I've just given you is not entirely correct, there are resonances in German that I've tried to render with the word foutu, fabricated.[8]

After having looked at speech, we shall now take a quick look at language, to which the triple division of the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real appropriately applies.

Certainly, the care Saussure took to eliminate considerations of motor articulation from his analysis of language clearly shows that he discerns its autonomy.[9] Concrete discourse is real language, and language speaks [le langage, ça parle]. The registers of the symbolic and the imaginary recur in the two other terms in which he expresses the structure of language, namely, the signified and the signifier.

The signifying material, such as I am always telling you it is, for example on this table, in these books, is the symbolic. If artificial languages are stupid it is because they are constructed on the basis of meaning. Someone recently reminded me of the forms of deduction that rule over Esperanto and which are such that once one knows ox one can deduce cow, heifer, vealer, and whatever else one wants to. And I asked him how one says, Death to the bastards![10] – this must be deducible from Long live the king! This alone suffices to refute the existence of artificial languages, which attempt to model themselves on meaning, this as a rule being the reason why they are unused.

And then there is meaning, which always refers to meaning. Of course, the [8] Mem, 4 n.1. The German word is "hingemachte."

[9] See "The Object of Linguistics," Introduction, chap. 3, Course in General Linguistics, 7–17.

[10] "Mort aux vaches!", literally, "Death to the cows!"

signifier may be caught up therein as soon as you give it a meaning, as soon as you create another signifier as signifier, something in this function of meaning. This is why it's possible to speak of language. But the signifier-signified division will always reproduce itself. There's no doubt that meaning is by nature imaginary. Meaning is, like the imaginary, always in the end evanescent, for it is tightly bound to what interests you, that is, to that in which you are ensnared. You would know that hunger and love are the same 66 thing, you would be like any animal, truly motivated. But owing to the existence of the signifier your personal little meaning – which is also absolutely heart-breakingly generic, human all too human – leads you much further. Since there is this damned system of the signifier, such that you have not yet been able to understand either how it came to be there, how it came to exist, what purpose it serves, or where it is leading you, it is what leads you away.

When he speaks, the subject has the entire material of language at his disposal, and this is where concrete discourse begins to be formed. Firstly, there is a synchronic whole, which is language as a simultaneous system of structured groups of opposition, then there is what occurs diachronically, over time, and which is discourse. One cannot but give discourse a certain direction in time, a direction that is defined in a linear manner, M. de Saussure tells us.[11]

I leave the responsibility for that statement with him. Not that I believe it to be false – it is basically true that there is no discourse without a certain temporal order, and consequently without a certain concrete succession, even if it is a virtual one. If I read this page starting from the bottom reading up, backwards, the effect won't be the same as if I read it in the right direction, and in certain cases this may give rise to an extremely serious confusion. But it is not quite exact to say that it is a simple line, it is more probably a set of several lines, a stave. It is in this diachronism that discourse is set up.

The signifier as existing synchronically is sufficiently characterized in delusional talk by a modification I've already pointed out here, namely that certain elements become isolated, laden, take on a value, a particular force of inertia, become charged with meaning, with a meaning and nothing more. Schreber's book is overflowing with them.

Take a word such as Nervenanhang, for example, nerve-contact, a word of the fundamental language. Schreber discerns perfectly well which words have come to him through inspiration, precisely by way of the Nervenanhang, which have been repeated to him in their elective meaning which he does not always understand terribly well. Seelenmord, soul murder, for example, is another of these words, which is problematic for him, but which he knows has a particular sense. Nevertheless, he talks about all this in a discourse that is indeed our own, and his book, it must be said, is remarkably written, clear, and natural. Moreover, he is as coherent as are many philosophical systems of our time, where we constantly see somebody suddenly get stung, at a detour on the path, by a tarantula that makes him regard Bovaryism and duration as 67 the key to the world and reconstruct the entire world around this notion, without one's knowing why it is this one that he has gone and picked out. I do not see how Schreber's system is of any less value than those of philosophers whose general theme I've just profiled. And what Freud remarks at the end of his study is that this character has written some amazing things that resemble what I, Freud, have described.

This book, then, written in ordinary discourse, signals the words that for the subject have taken on such a particular weight. Let's call this erotization, and let's avoid explanations that are too simple. When the signifier finds itself charged thus, the subject is perfectly well aware of it. The moment Schreber employs the term instance to define the various forces articulated in the world he is implicated in – he also has his little instances – he says, Instance, that is mine. The others didn't say it to me, it is my normal discourse.[12]

What happens at the level of meaning? The insult is always a rupture in the system of language, just as words of love are. Whether or not Sow! is charged with obscure meaning, and probably it is, we already have here an indication of this dissociation. This meaning, like all meaning worthy of the name, refers to another meaning. It is indeed what here characterizes the allusion. In saying, I've just been to the butcher's, the patient points out to us that it refers to another meaning. Naturally, it is a bit oblique, she would prefer it was I who understand.

Beware those who say to you – You understand. It is always so as to send you somewhere else than where it is a question of going. That's what she's doing. You understand perfectly well, this means that she herself isn't very sure of the meaning, and that the latter refers not so much to a system of continuous and reconcilable meaning as to meaning as ineffable, to the meaning of her own reality, to her own personal fragmentation.

And then there is the real, the well and truly real articulation, the other's sleight of hand. Real speech, I mean speech that is expressed, appears at another point of the field, not just at any point, but at that of the other, the puppet, as an element of the external world.

The big S whose medium is speech, analysis warns us, is not what a vain people thinks it is.[13] There is the real person who is before you and who takes up space – there is this in the presence of human beings, they take up space, at a pinch you can get ten of you into your office, but not a hundred and fifty [12] Mem, 29 n.19. "Instance" is the French translation of Freud's "Instanz," which SE translates as agency.

[13] Ce n'est pas ce qu'un vain peuple pense, an allusion to Voltaire, Nos prêtres ne sont point ce qu'un vain peuple pense; Notre crédulité fait toute leur science. Voltaire, Oedipe 4, 1.

– there is he whom you see, who manifestly captivates you and is capable of 68 making you jump up and hug him – an ill-considered act of the imaginary order. And then there is the Other whom we were talking about, who is the subject also, but not the reflection of what you see in front of you, and not simply what takes place insofar as you see yourself seeing yourself.

If what I am saying is not true, then Freud said nothing true, for this is what the unconscious means.

There are several possible othernesses, and we shall see how they manifest themselves in a complete delusion like Schreber's. First there are day and night, the sun and the moon, those things that always return to the same place, which Schreber calls the natural world order.[14] There is the otherness of the Other that corresponds to the S, that is, the big Other, the subject who is unknown to us, the Other who is symbolic by nature, the Other one addresses oneself to beyond what one sees. In between there are objects. And then, at the level of the S, there is something that is of the dimension of the imaginary, the ego and the body, whether fragmented or not, but more fragmented than not.

I shall leave you there for today. This analysis of structure begins what I shall speak to you about next time.

We shall try to understand, on the basis of this little picture, what is happening to Schreber, the delusional who has arrived at complete fulfillment and, ultimately, at a perfectly adapted delusion. What is characteristic of Schreber in fact is that he never stopped raving at full bore, but had adapted himself so well that the director of the psychiatric hospital said of him – He is such a nice man.

We are fortunate in having in him a man who communicates his entire delusional system to us, and at a time when it is full-blown. Before we start wondering how he entered psychosis and giving the history of the prepsychotic phase,[15] before we take things up in the sense of their genesis, as everyone always does, which is the source of inexplicable confusions, we shall convey them such as they are given to us in Freud's observation, who only ever had this book, who never saw the patient.

You will see how the different elements of a system are modified when constructed as a function of the coordinates of language. This approach is certainly legitimate, concerning as it does a case that is only given to us through a book, and it is what will enable us to reconstitute its dynamics in an effective way. But we shall start with its dialectics.

PSYCHOSIS IS NOT A SIMPLE FACT OF LANGUAGE

THE DIALECT OF SYMPTOMS

IT REALLY MUST BE RATHER PLEASANT TO BE A WOMAN . . .

GOD AND SCIENCE

SCHREBER'S GOD

The other day at my case presentation we saw a serious case.

It was a clinical case that I had certainly not chosen myself, but it was one that in a way brought the unconscious out into the open, in the difficulty it had in passing into the analytic discourse. It brought it out into the open because, owing to the exceptional circumstances, everything that in another subject would have passed into repression was found in him to be supported by another language, this language of quite limited scope known as a dialect.

As it happens, the Corsican dialect had functioned for this subject in conditions that accentuated even further the function of particularization belonging to all dialects. He had in fact lived in Paris from childhood, an only child of parents extremely closed in upon their own laws, speaking exclusively the Corsican dialect. The perpetual quarreling of these two parental characters, an ambivalent manifestation of their extreme attachment to one another and of the fear of seeing a woman, a foreign object, appear, was carried out quite openly, plunging him directly into their conjugal intimacy. All this in the Corsican dialect. Nothing of what went on in the house was conceived in anything but the Corsican dialect. There were two worlds, that of the elite, of the Corsican dialect, and then that which went on outside. This separation was still present in the subject's life and he recounted to us the difference in his relations with the world between when he was with his mother and when he was out in the street.

What did this result in? This is a most conclusive case. It resulted in two things. The first, apparent when he was questioned, is the difficulty he had in calling to mind anything at all from this former register, that is, in expressing himself in his childhood dialect, the only one he ever spoke with his mother. When I asked him to say something in this dialect, to repeat to me words he might have exchanged with his father, for example – I can't get it out, he replied. Moreover, one could see a neurosis in him, the traces of behavior that enabled us to divine a mechanism that one may call – this is a term I always use cautiously – regressive. In particular, his unusual way of exercising his genitality tended to get confused on the imaginary level with the regressive activity of his excremental functions. But everything that was of the order of what is usually repressed, all the contents that are commonly expressed through the intermediary of neurotic symptoms, was perfectly limpid here, and I had no trouble in getting him to express it in words. Since it was borne by the language of the others, he expressed it in words all that much more easily.

I used the comparison of the censorship of a newspaper that not only has an extremely small circulation but is published in a dialect that is only understood by a minimum number of people. The establishment of a common discourse, of a public discourse I would almost say, is an important factor in the specific functioning of the mechanism of repression. In itself repression stems from the impossibility of granting discourse to a certain past of the subject's speech which is linked, as Freud stressed, to the specific world of his infantile relations. It's precisely this past of speech that continues to function in the primitive language. Now, for this subject, this language is his Corsican dialect in which he was capable of saying the most extraordinary things, of flinging at his father for example – If you don't go away, I shall punch you in the hurt. These things, which could have just as easily been said by a neurotic, having had to construct his neurosis in a different manner, were out in the open here in the register of the other language which was not only dialectal but intrafamilial.

What is repression for a neurotic? It's a language, another language that he manufactures with his symptoms, that is, if he is a hysteric or an obsessional, with the imaginary dialectic of himself and the other. The neurotic symptom acts as a language that enables repression to be expressed. This is precisely what enables us to grasp the fact that repression and the return of the repressed are one and the same thing, the front and back of a single process.

These remarks are not irrelevant to our problem.

What is our method concerning President Schreber?

It's undeniable that he expressed himself in common discourse to explain to us what had happened and was continuing to happen to him at the time he wrote his work. This testimony bears witness to structural transformations that are undoubtedly to be regarded as real, but here the verbal dominates since it's through the intermediary of the subject's written testimony that we have proof of this.

Let's proceed methodically. By setting out from our knowledge of the importance of speech in the structuring of psychoneurotic symptoms we shall make progress in the analysis of this territory, psychosis. We are not saying that psychosis has the same etiology as neurosis. We are not even saying that it is, like neurosis, a pure and simple fact of language – far from it. We are simply remarking that psychosis is very rich with respect to what it can express in discourse. We have proof of this in the work that President Schreber bequeathed us and which Freud's almost fascinated attention has recommended to our attention. On the basis of this testimony, by means of an internal analysis, Freud has shown us how this world was structured. We shall proceed in the same way, setting out from the subject's discourse, which will enable us to approach the constituent mechanisms of psychosis.

Let it be clearly understood that we shall have to proceed methodically, step by step, not leaving out any detail on the pretext that a superficial analogy with a mechanism of neurosis is apparent. In short, we shall do nothing of what is so often done in the literature.

A certain Katan, for example, who has taken a special interest in the Schreber case, takes it for granted that the origin of his psychosis is to be located in his struggle against threatening masturbation provoked by his homosexual erotic investments upon the character who formed the prototype and at the same time the nucleus of his persecutory system, namely, Professor Flechsig.[1] This is supposed to have driven President Schreber so far as to undermine reality, that is to say, to reconstruct, after a short period of twilight of the world,[2] a new, unreal world, in which he didn't have to give in to this masturbation that was thought to be so threatening. Don't we all feel that a mechanism of this kind, while it's true that it enters into play in the neuroses at a certain point of their articulation, would here be having altogether dis- 74 proportionate results?

President Schreber gives a very clear account of the first phases of his psychosis. And when he testifies that between the first psychotic attack, a phase called, not without foundation, prepsychotic, and the progressive establishment of the psychotic phase, at the height of the stabilization of which he wrote his work, he had a fantasy which was expressed in these words, that it really must be rather pleasant to be a woman succumbing to intercourse.[3]

He emphasizes that this thought, which takes him by surprise, has the character of having been imagined, while adding that he greeted it with indignation. There is a sort of moral conflict here. We find ourselves in the presence of a phenomenon whose name nobody ever uses anymore, so that nobody knows how to classify things anymore – it's a preconscious phenomenon. This is the preconscious order at which Freud intervenes in the dynamics of the dream, and to which he attaches so much importance in the Traumdeutung.

One gets the strong impression that this is coming from the ego. The emphasis placed by this It really must be rather pleasant . . . has the character of a seductive thought, which the ego is far from misrecognizing.

In a passage in the Traumdeutung dedicated to dreams of punishment Freud admits that at the same level at which unconscious desires intervene in a dream another mechanism than the one that relies on the conscious-unconscious opposition may be present – The mechanism of dream formation, says Freud, would in general be greatly clarified if instead of the opposition between conscious and unconscious we were to speak of that between the ego and the repressed.[4]

This was written at a time when the notion of the ego was not yet part of Freudian theory, but you still see nevertheless that it was already present in his thought. I will only add that punishment-dreams are not in general subject to the condition that the day's residue shall be of a distressing kind. On the contrary, they occur most easily where the opposite is the case – where the day's residues are thoughts of a satisfying nature but the satisfaction which they express is a forbidden one. The only trace of these thoughts that appears in the manifest dream is their diametric opposite. . . . The essential characteristic of punishment-dreams would thus be that in their case the dream-constructing wish is not an unconscious wish derived from the repressed (from the system Ucs.), but a punitive one reacting against it and belonging to the ego, though at the same time an unconscious (that is to say, preconscious) one.[5]

Anyone who is following the path I am gradually leading you down, by drawing your attention to a mechanism that is distinct from Verneinung and that can be constantly seen emerging in Freud's discourse, will find here, once again, the need to distinguish between something that has been symbolized and something that hasn't.

75 What relation is there between the emergence in the ego – and, let me emphasize, free from conflict – of the thought that it must be rather pleasant to be a woman succumbing to intercourse, and the conception which the delusion, achieving a degree of completion, will blossom into, namely that the man must be the permanent woman of God? There is reason, undoubtedly, to compare the two terms – the initial appearance of this thought that crossed Schreber's mind, who was apparently sane at the time, and the delusion's final state which, before an all-powerful personality with whom he has permanent erotic relations, situates him as a completely feminized being, a woman – this is what he says. The initial thought legitimately appears to us to give a glimpse of the final theme. Nevertheless, we must not neglect the stages, the crises, that have made him pass from such a fleeting thought to such firmly delusional conduct and discourse.

We should not assume that the mechanisms in question are homogeneous with the mechanisms we are usually dealing with in the neuroses, and especially not with that of repression. Of course, to appreciate this one has to begin by understanding what repression means, that is, that it's structured like a linguistic phenomenon.

The question arises whether we have before us a properly psychotic mechanism, one that would be imaginary and that would extend from the first hint of identification with and capture by the feminine image, to the blossoming of a world system in which the subject is completely absorbed in his imagination by a feminine identification.

What I am saying, which is almost too artificial, clearly indicates to you in what direction we have to seek a resolution of our question. We shall lack the means to do it unless we can uncover its traces in the one element we do possess, namely the document itself, the subject's discourse. This is why I introduced you last time to what will orient our investigation, namely the structure of this discourse itself.

I began by distinguishing the three spheres of speech as such. You may recall that within the phenomenon of speech we can integrate the three planes of the symbolic, represented by the signifier, the imaginary, represented by meaning, and the real, which is discourse that has actually taken place in a 76 diachronic dimension.

The subject has at his disposal a whole lot of signifying material which is his language, whether maternal or not, and he uses it to circulate meanings in the real. To be more or less captivated, captured, by a meaning is not the same thing as to express that meaning in a discourse designed to communicate it and reconcile it with other variously received meanings. In this term received lies the driving force of what makes discourse a common discourse, a commonly admitted discourse.

The notion of discourse is fundamental. Even for what we call objectivity, the world objectified by science, discourse is essential, for the world of science – one always loses sight of this – is above all communicable, it's embodied in scientific reports. Even if you were to succeed in carrying out the most amazing experiments, if no one is able to repeat them on the basis of the report you give of them, they will have been to no avail. This is the criterion by which one ascertains that something has not been scientifically received.

When I drew up this triple-entry chart for you, I located the different relations in which we can analyze a delusional's discourse. This diagram is not the diagram of the world. It's the basic condition of any relationship. Vertically, there is the register of the subject, speech, and the order of otherness as such, the Other. The hub of the function of speech is the subjectivity of the Other, that is to say, the fact that the Other is essentially he who is capable, like the subject, of convincing and lying. When I told you that in the Other there must be a sector of entirely real objects, it was understood that this introduction of reality is always a function of speech. For it to be possible to relate anything at all in relation to the subject and the Other to a foundation in the real, somewhere there must be something nondeceptive. The dialectical correlate of the basic structure which makes of the speech of subject to subject speech that may deceive is that there is also something that does not deceive.

This function, you will notice, is fulfilled in various ways according to the cultural region in which the constant function of speech comes to function. You would be wrong to think that the same elements, qualified in the same way, have always fulfilled that function.

Take Aristotle. Everything he says is perfectly communicable, and never-77 theless the position of the nondeceptive element is essentially different for him and for us. Where is this element for us?

Well, whatever minds satisfied with appearances – which is often the case with free-thinkers, and even the most positivist among you, indeed the most liberated from any religious idea – might think, the simple fact that you live at this precise moment in the evolution of human thought does not exonerate you from what was openly and rigorously formulated in Descartes's meditation about God as incapable of deceiving us.[6]

This is so true that so lucid a personality as Einstein, when it was a matter of handling that symbolic order that was his, recalled it – God, he said, is clever, but he is honest.[7] The notion that the real, as difficult as it may be to penetrate, is unable to play tricks on us and will not take us in on purpose, is, though no one really dwells on this, essential to the constitution of the world of science.

Having said this, I admit that the reference to a nondeceiving god, the one accepted principle, is based on results obtained by science. We have in fact never observed anything that would show us a deceiving demon at the heart of nature. But that does not prevent its being a necessary article of faith for the first steps of science and the constitution of experimental science. It need hardly be said that matter does not cheat, that it has no intention of crushing our experiments or blowing up our machines. This sometimes happens, but only when we have made a mistake. It's out of the question that it, matter, should deceive us. This step is not at all obvious. Nothing less than the Judaeo-Christian tradition was required for it to be taken with such assurance.

[6] See Descartes's Fourth Meditation,"Truth and Falsity," in Meditations on First Philosophy.

[7] This is perhaps an allusion to Einstein's remark, "Raffiniert ist der Herrgott aber boshaft ist er nicht," "The good Lord may be tricky but he isn't mean."

The reason that the emergence of science, as we have constituted it with the tenacity, obstinacy, and daring characteristic of its development, took place within this tradition is that it proposed a unique principle at the foundation, not only of the universe, but of the law. It's not simply the universe that was created ex nihilo, but also the law – this is where the entire debate between a certain rationalism and a certain voluntarism is played out, one that bothered and still bothers the theologians. Does the criterion of good and evil depend on what could be called God's whim?

It's the radicality of Judaeo-Christian thought on this point that made possible this decisive step, for which the expression act of faith is not out of place, which consists in supposing that there is something absolutely nondeceptive. That this step should be reduced to this act is an essential point. Just think what would happen, at the current pace of things, if we were to perceive that there is not only a proton, a meson, etc., but also an element we had not reckoned with, one member too many in atomic mechanics, a character who 78 lies. We wouldn't be laughing then.

For Aristotle, things are completely different. What assured him, in nature, of the truthfulness of the Other as real were those things that always return to the same place, namely the celestial spheres. The notion of celestial spheres as what is incorruptible in the world, as being of another, divine, essence, for a long time inhabited Christian thought itself, the medieval Christian tradition, which inherited classical thought. It's not just a question of a Scholastic heritage, for the notion is, it might be said, natural to man, and it's we who are in an unusual position in no longer being preoccupied with what goes on in the celestial sphere. Until a quite recent period what occurred in the heavens was mentally present as an essential reference in every culture, including those whose astronomy indicates the advanced state of their observations and reflections. Our culture is an exception, since it consented, very recently, to follow the Judaeo-Christian position strictly. Until then it had been impossible to pry the thought of the philosophers, like that of the theologians and therefore that of the physicists, away from the idea of the superior essence of the celestial spheres. Measurement is the materialized proof of this – but it's we who say this – in itself, measurement is the proof of what does not deceive.

Our culture is really the only one that has this characteristic – common to us all here, I think, with the exception of some who may have some curiosity for astronomy – this characteristic trait that we never think of the regular return of the stars, or of the planets, or of eclipses, either. For us, this has no importance, we know that these things take place all by themselves. There is a world of difference between what is called, to use a word I don't like, the mentality of people like us – for whom the guarantee of everything that occurs in nature is one simple principle, namely, that nature is incapable of deceiving us, that somewhere there is something that guarantees the truth of reality, which Descartes affirms in the form of his own nondeceptive god – and on the other hand the normal, natural position, the more common position, that which appears in the minds of the very great majority of cultures, which consists in locating the guarantee of reality in the heavens, however one represents them to oneself.

The account I have just sketched out is not unrelated to our subject, for here we are, all of a sudden, in the thick of the first chapter of President Schreber's Memoirs, which treats the system of the stars as the essential, rather unexpected, item in his struggle against masturbation.

What follows is interspersed with readings from Memoirs of My Nervous Illness, chap. 1, pp. 6–12.

According to this theory, each nerve of intellect represents the total mental individuality of a human being and has, as it were, the sum total of memories inscribed upon it. We have here a highly elaborate theory whose position it would not be difficult to encounter, even if it were only as a stage of the discussion, in standard scientific works. Through an unexceptional mechanism of the imagination, we touch on the connection between the notion of souls and that of the permanence of impressions. The basis for the concept of the soul in the demand for the preservation of imaginary impressions is quite apparent here. I would almost say that we have here the basis, I'm not saying the proof, of the belief in the immortality of souls. There is something irrepressible when the subject considers himself – he is incapable of not conceiving not only that he exists but, moreover, that there is an impression that conveys its eternity. Up to this point our delusional is no more deluded than an extremely large sector of humanity, without our saying that he is co-extensive with it.

The reading continues.

We are not far from the Spinozian universe, insofar as it is founded on the co-existence of the attribute of thought and the attribute of extension. A very interesting dimension for situating the imaginary quality of certain stages of philosophical thought.

The reading continues.

We shall see later why Schreber took the notion of God as his starting point. This point is certainly connected with his final discourse, the one in which he systematizes his delusion in order to communicate it to us. You already see him in the grips of this dilemma – who is going to draw more rays to himself, him or this God with whom he maintains his perpetual erotic relationship? Will Schreber win the love of God and thereby place his existence in danger, or will God possess Schreber and then leave him in the lurch? I am describing the problem for you in a humorous manner, but there 80 is nothing funny about it since it's the delusional text of a sick man.

There is a divergence in his experience between God who is for him the lining [l'envers] of the world – and if this one isn't quite the one I was talking about just before, who was linked to a certain conception of an equivalence between God and extension, he is nevertheless all the same the guarantee that extension is not an illusion – and on the other hand this God with whom, in the crudest of experiences, he has relations as if with a living organism, this living God, as he puts it.

While the contradiction between these two terms does become apparent to him, you can well imagine that it does not happen at the level of formal logic. Our patient hasn't got to this stage yet – any more than the rest of us have, moreover. The famous contradictions of formal logic have no more reason to be operant in him than in us, who make the most heterogeneous, or even the most discordant, systems exist simultaneously in our minds, in a simultaneity in which that logic seems completely forgotten, apart from those moments when we are provoked into discussion about, and then become very sensitive to, formal logic – just refer to your own personal experience. There is no logical contradiction, there is a lived, living contradiction, seriously considered and vividly experienced by the subject, between the almost Spinozian God whose shadow, whose imaginary outline, he supports and the God with whom he has this erotic relationship about which he is constantly testifying to him.

The by no means metaphysical question arises of what is really going on in the lived experience of the psychotic. We are not yet in a position to give an answer and perhaps at no time will the question ever have any meaning for us. Our job is to situate structurally the discourse that testifies to the subject's erotic relations with the living God who, through these divine rays and through an entire procession of forms and emanations, also speaks to him, expressing himself in that language, destructured from the point of view of common language, but also restructured on more fundamental relations, which he calls the fundamental language.

The reading continues.

Here we come across the emergence, which is striking in relation to the rest of the discourse, of the most ancient of beliefs – God is the master of the sun and the rain.

81 The reading continues.

We can't fail to note the link between the imaginary relation and the divine rays. And I'm under the impression that there is a literary reference in Freud when, on the subject of repression, he insists upon the fact that there is a double polarity – something is undoubtedly suppressed, repelled, but it's also attracted by what has previously been repressed.[8] In passing, we can't fail to recognize the striking similarity between these dynamics and the sentiment Schreber expressed in stating his experience.

A while ago I pointed out to you how divergent he feels the two demands by the divine presence to be, one that justifies his maintaining the scenery of the external world around himself – you will see how well founded that expression is – and one made by God whom he experiences as the partner of this oscillation of the living force that will become the dimension in which he suffers and palpitates. This gap is resolved for him in these terms– Perhaps the full truth lies (by way of a fourth dimension) in the form of a humanly inconceivable diagonal between these two lines of thought.[9]

He gets himself out of trouble, as is normal in the language of that form of communication too unequal to its object which is known as metaphysics when one has absolutely no idea how to reconcile two terms, freedom and transcendent necessity, for instance. One makes do with saying that somewhere there is a fourth dimension and a diagonal, or one pulls both ends of the chain at once. That dialectic, perfectly obvious in all use of discourse, can't escape you.

[8] See "Case of Paranoia," SE 12:67 and "Repression," SE 14:148. The reference is perhaps to Goethe's poem, "The Fisherman," "Partly she dragged him down, partly he sank." The passage is quoted by Schreber; see Mem, 11 n.5.

[9] Mem, 8.

The reading continues.

Ultimately God only has a complete, authentic relationship with corpses. God doesn't understand anything of living beings, his omnipresence grasps things only from the outside, never from the inside. Here we have propositions that don't appear to be self-evident or demanded by the coherence of the system, such as we ourselves might conceive it in advance.

I shall come back to this point next time, with greater emphasis. But you can already see that the psychotic relation, at its highest degree of development, entails the introduction of the fundamental dialectic of deception into a dimension that is, as it were, transversal in comparison with that of an authentic relationship. The subject can speak to the Other insofar as with 82 him it's a question of faith or feint, but here this permanent exercise of deception, which tends to subvert any order whatever, whether mythical or not, in thought itself, unfolds as a passive phenomenon, as an experience lived through by the subject, in an imaginary dimension that is suffered, which is a fundamental characteristic of the imaginary. This means that the world – as you will see emerge in the subject's discourse – is transformed into what we call a fantasmagoria, but which for him has the utmost certainty in his lived experience. This is the game of deception that he maintains, not with another like himself, but with this primary being, the very guarantor of the real.

Schreber himself remarks perfectly well that his prior categories had far from prepared him for this vivid experience of an infinite God – previously these questions had had no kind of existence for him and, even better than being an atheist, he had been indifferent.

One can say that in this delusion God is essentially the opposite term in relation to the subject's megalomania, but God as he is caught at his own game. Schreber's delusion will in fact reveal that God, through having wanted to harness his forces and turn him into detritus, excrement, carrion, the object of all the exercises of destruction that he has allowed his intermediary mode to bring about, has been caught at his own game. Ultimately God's greatest danger is to love Schreber, that transversally transversed zone, too much.

We shall have to structure the relationship between what guarantees the real in the other, that is, the presence and existence of the stable world of God, and Schreber the subject qua organic reality and fragmented body. We shall see, provided we borrow a number of references from analytic literature, that a major part of his fantasies, of his hallucinations, of his miraculous or marvelous construction, consists of elements in which all sorts of bodily equivalents are clearly recognizable. We shall see, for example, what the hallucination of the little men represents organically. But the pivot of these phenomena is the law, which here lies entirely within the imaginary dimension. I say it's transversal because it's diagonally opposed to the relation of subject to subject, the axis of effective speech.

We shall continue this analysis, which has only just begun, next time.

The following session: The discourse of the desk

I realized that last time you had a bit of difficulty, owing to the difference in potential between my discourse and the reading of President Schreber's nevertheless absorbing writings. This technical difficulty has made me think of relying less on a running commentary on the text in future. I had thought that we could read it from beginning to end and on the way pick out those elements of structure, of organization, where I would like you to make progress. The experience has shown that I shall have to organize things differently. First of all I shall make a choice.

This question of method, combined with the fact that I had not fully decided to give today's seminar, and the fact that only my great affection for you leads me to do so, added to which is the tradition that on the eve of vacations in establishments of secondary education, which is about your level, one gives a small reading, has led me to decide to read you something recent and unpublished, by me, and which is in line with our subject.

This is a paper I gave, or am supposed to have given, at Dr. Hoff's Psychiatric Clinic in Vienna on the theme, The meaning of a return to Freud in psychoanalysis, for them to learn about the Parisian movement and the style, if not the general orientation, of our teaching.

I gave this paper under conditions of improvisation that were the same as here, or even rather more so. The discourse I give here I prepare. There, the subject appeared sufficiently general for me to rely on my ability to adapt to the audience, in such a way that I am going to deliver a written reconstitution, as faithful as possible to the spirit of improvisation and the modulations of this discourse. I was led to elaborate certain passages a little and to add certain considerations that I went on to make in a smaller session that took place afterwards, where I found myself with a second, smaller circle of the analyst technicians who had attended the first lecture. I addressed them on a technical question, that of the meaning of interpretation in general. This was nonetheless a subject of some astonishment on their part, at least at first sight, which proves that there is always room for trying to establish a dialogue.

84 I am going to try, as far as possible, to read this in the spoken tone my text endeavors to reproduce, and which, I hope, will hold your attention better than the reading did last time.

Let me tell you, even if it's only so as to provoke your curiosity, that I had quite a curious adventure in the middle of this discourse – which, since the material is lacking, we won't be able to reproduce here, except in the somewhat simulated fashion in which it is inscribed in the text.

Over there I had a sort of desk in front of me, of better quality than this one, and it was probably at a moment when at least my interest, if not the audience's, was flagging a bit, for the contact is not always as good as I feel it is here with you, the said desk came to my aid, and in a fairly extraordinary way if we compare it with the words we heard recently from one of my old friends at the Sorbonne, who recounted some astonishing things to us last Saturday, namely the metamorphosis of the lacemaker into rhinoceros horns and finally into cauliflowers. Well! this desk began to speak. And I had all the trouble in the world getting the floor back from it.

This element will perhaps introduce a slight imbalance into the composition of my discourse.

Lacan reads the article, published in E, 401-36/114-45 as "The Freudian Thing, Or the Meaning of the Return to Freud in Psychoanalysis."

VERDICHTUNG, VERDRÄNGUNG,
VERNEINUNG, AND VERWERFUNG

It is always a good thing not to let one's horizons close in. This is why today I should like to remind you not only of my general design regarding the Schreber case, but also of the basic purpose of these seminars. Whenever one pursues a certain course step by step for a while, one always ends up with a wall in front of one's nose. But still, if I lead you off into difficult places, perhaps we are a bit more demanding than others. I also think I need to remind you how this course is mapped out.

The plan of this seminar would need to be expressed in various ways that all confirm one another and that all come down to the same thing. First I should tell you that I am here to remind you that our experience should be taken seriously and that being a psychoanalyst does not exempt you from being intelligent and sensitive. The fact that you have been given a number of keys is no excuse for you to use them not to think anymore and to endeavor, as is the general inclination of human beings, to leave everything as it is. There are certain ways of using categories such as the unconscious, the drive, the pre-oedipal relation, and defense that consist in drawing none of the authentic consequences that they imply and considering that this is an affair that concerns others but does not go to the heart of your own relations with the world. It has to be said that though you may be psychoanalysts, this in no way obliges you, unless you give yourselves a bit of a shake, to bear in mind that the world is not quite like everyone imagines it to be, but is caught up in mechanisms you are supposed to be familiar with.

Now, there is no question, either – make no mistake – of my doing the 86 metaphysics of the Freudian discovery and drawing out its consequences for what may be called being, in the widest sense of the term. This is not my intention. This would not be useless, but I think that it can be left to others and that what we are doing here will indicate how it might be approached. Don't get the idea that you are forbidden to stretch your wings a bit in this direction – you will lose nothing in inquiring into the metaphysics of the human condition as it is revealed to us by the Freudian discovery. But still, this is not the main point, for you receive this metaphysics on your head. One can have confidence in things as they are already structured – they are there and you are implicated in them.

It's not for nothing that the Freudian discovery was made in our time, and it's not for nothing that, through a series of extremely muddled accidents, you personally find yourselves its depositaries. The metaphysics in question can be inscribed entirely within man's relation to the symbolic. You are immersed in it to a degree that extends far beyond your experience as technicians and, as I sometimes point out to you, we find traces of it and its presence in all sorts of disciplines and inquiries bordering on psychoanalysis.

You are technicians, but technicians of things that exist within this discovery. Since this technique develops through speech, the world that in your experience you have to move about in is incurved in this perspective. Let us try at least to structure it correctly.

This is the requirement that my little square meets,[1] which goes from the subject to the other and, in a way, here, from the symbolic towards the real, subject, ego, body, and in the contrary sense towards the big Other of intersubjectivity, the Other that you do not apprehend as long as it is a subject, that is, as long as it can lie, the Other that on the contrary one always finds in its place, the Other of the heavenly bodies, or, if you will, the stable system of the world, of the object, and, between the two, speech, with its three stages of the signifier, meaning, and discourse.

This is not a world system, but a system of reference for our own experience – this is how it is structured, and we can situate within it the various phenomenal manifestations with which we have to deal. We shall not understand a thing unless we take this structure seriously.

Of course, this business of taking things seriously itself goes to the heart of the matter. What characterizes a normal subject is precisely that he never 87 takes seriously certain realities that he recognizes exist. You are surrounded by all sorts of realities about which you are in no doubt, some of which are particularly threatening, but you don't take them fully seriously, for you think, along with Paul Claudel's subtitle, that the worst is not always certain,[2] and maintain yourselves in an average, basic – in the sense of relating to the base – state of blissful uncertainty, which makes possible for you a sufficiently relaxed existence. Surely, certainty is the rarest of things for the normal subject. If he questions himself about this matter, he will be aware that certainty emerges in strict correlation to an action he undertakes.

I shall not pursue this any further, as we are not here to give the psychology and phenomenology of those closest to us. We have to attain it, as usual, by means of a detour, via those furthest from us. Today this is Schreber the madman.

If we keep our distance, we shall see that Schreber, in common with other madmen, possesses a feature that you will also find in the most readily observable data – this is why I do case presentations for you. Psychologists, because they don't really keep company with the insane, raise the false problem of why they think their hallucinations are real. Since it is readily seen that nevertheless this doesn't hang together, one therefore exhausts oneself in deliberating on how the belief came about. One should first specify what the belief is, since in point of fact the madman doesn't believe in the reality of his hallucinations.

There are thousands of examples of this, but I shall not go into them today because I want to stay with the text of Schreber the madman. But still, it is within the reach even of people who are not psychiatrists. Chance recently brought me to open Maurice Merleau-Ponty's Phenomenology of Perception at page 334 on the theme of the thing and the natural world. I refer you to it. You will find some excellent remarks on this subject – for example, that nothing is easier to obtain from the subject than the admission that what he can hear nobody else has heard. He says – Yes, all right, so I was the only one who heard it, then.

Reality is not the issue. The subject admits, by means of all the verbally expressed explanatory detours at his disposal, that these phenomena are of another order than the real. He is well aware that their reality is uncertain. 88
He even admits their unreality up to a certain point. But, contrary to the normal subject for whom reality is always in the right place, he is certain of something, which is that what is at issue – ranging from hallucination to interpretation – regards him.

Reality isn't at issue for him, certainty is. Even when he expresses himself along the lines of saying that what he experiences is not of the order of reality, this does not affect his certainty that it concerns him. The certainty is radical. The very nature of what he is certain of can quite easily remain completely ambiguous, covering the entire range from malevolence to benevolence. But it means something unshakable for him.

This constitutes what is called, whether rightly or wrongly, the elementary phenomenon or, as a more developed phenomenon, delusional belief.

You can obtain an example of this by leafing through the admirable summary Freud gave of Schreber's book when he analyzed it. Through Freud you can make contact with it and see its importance.

A central phenomenon in Schreber's delusion, we may even say an initial phenomenon in the conception he formed of the transformation of the world that constitutes his delusion, is what he calls Seelenmord, soul murder. Now, he himself presents this as being totally enigmatic.

To be sure, chapter 3 of the Memoirs, in which he gave reasons for his neuropathy and developed the notion of soul murder, was censored. Still, we know that it contained remarks concerning his family, which would probably have thrown light both on his initial delusion in relation to his father and brother, or to someone else close to him, and on what are commonly called the significant transferential elements. But that censorship is not as regrettable as all that, ultimately. Sometimes too many details prevent the basic formal features from being seen. What is essential is not that, because of the censorship, we should have lost the occasion to understand such and such an affective experience concerning those close to him, but that he, the subject, failed to understand it and yet was able to formulate it.

He characterizes it as a decisive moment in this new dimension that he has attained and described for us in his account of the various relational modes, the prospect of which has gradually unfolded for him. He is certain that soul murder is at the root of something, but it retains the character of an enigma, nevertheless. What on earth could it be to murder a soul? Moreover, it's not as if each and every one of us knows how to differentiate the soul from every-89 thing that is connected to it, but this delusional does, with a degree of certainty that is an essential feature of his testimony.

We must pause at these things and not overlook their distinctive character if we want to understand what is really going on and not simply, with the aid of certain key words or of this opposition between reality and certainty, rid ourselves of the phenomenon of madness.

I must accustom you to finding this delusional certainty wherever it exists. You will then notice for example the extent to which the phenomenon of jealousy is different according to whether it presents itself in a normal or in a delusional subject. There is no need to recall at length what is humorous or even comical in the normal form of jealousy, which, one could say, spontaneously rejects certainty, whatever the reality is. There is the famous story of the jealous husband who pursues his wife to the door of the very bedroom in which she has locked herself with someone else. This contrasts sufficiently with the fact that the delusional exempts himself from any real references. This ought to make you mistrustful of using normal mechanisms such as projection to explain the genesis of a delusional jealousy. Yet it is common to see this extrapolation made. It is enough to read Freud's text on President Schreber to perceive that, though he does not have the time to explore the whole breadth of the question, he shows all the dangers there are in independently bringing projection, the relation between ego and ego, that is, between ego and other, to bear where paranoia is concerned. Despite this warning's being written black on white, the term projection is used without rhyme or reason to explain delusions and their genesis.

I would go even further – the delusional, as he climbs the scale of delusions, becomes increasingly sure of things that he regards as more and more unreal. This is what distinguishes paranoia from dementia praecox. The delusional articulates them with an abundance, a richness, that is precisely one of the most essential clinical features which, while one of the most massive, must nevertheless not be neglected. Moreover, the discursive products characteristic of the register of paranoia usually blossom into literary productions, in the sense in which literary simply means sheets of paper covered with writing. Notice that this fact militates in favor of maintaining a certain unity between those delusions that have been perhaps prematurely isolated as paranoid and the formations known as paraphrenic in classical nosology.

It is, however, important to notice what the madman – including our President Schreber who gives us such a gripping work in its completed, enclosed, 90 full, and finished form – lacks at this point, however much of a writer he might be.

The world he describes for us matches the conception to which he has raised himself after the period of the unexplained symptom of the profound, cruel, and painful disturbance of his existence. According to this conception which, moreover, gives him a certain mastery over his psychosis, he is the female correspondent of God. Henceforth, everything becomes understandable, everything works out, and I would even go so far as to say everything works out for everybody since he plays the role of intermediary between a humanity threatened to the very depths of its existence and this divine power with whom he has such special ties. Everything works out in the Versöhnung, the reconciliation, that positions him as the woman of God. His relationship with God, as he conveys it to us, is rich and complex, and yet we cannot fail to be struck by the fact that the text includes no indication of the slightest presence, the slightest fervor, the slightest real communication, that would give us the idea that there really is a relationship here between two beings.

Without resorting to a comparison with a great mystic, which would be out of place in relation to a text like this, open nevertheless St. John of the Cross at any page you like, if this test appeals to you. He, too, in the experience of the ascent of the soul, presents himself in an attitude of receiving and offering and even speaks of the soul's nuptials with the divine presence. Yet the tone of the two approaches has absolutely nothing in common. I would say that even in the briefest testimony of an authentic religious experience you can see a world of difference. Let us say that the lengthy discourse in which Schreber testifies to what he has finally resolved to acknowledge as the solution of his problem nowhere gives us the feeling of an original experience in which the subject is himself included – his testimony can be said to be truly objectified.

What are these testimonies of delusionals about? Don't say that the madman is someone who does without the other's recognition. Clearly, Schreber wrote this enormous work so that nobody would be unaware of what he experienced and, even, so that when the opportunity arose learned scientists would verify the presence in his body of the feminine nerves that had gradually penetrated him, in order to objectify his own unique relationship with the divine reality. This certainly looks like an effort to be recognized. Since it concerns a published discourse, this raises a question mark as to what the need for recognition might possibly mean to this character of the madman, 91 so isolated by his experience. At first sight what seems distinctive about a madman is the fact that he has no need for recognition. But his self-sufficiency in his own world, the auto-comprehensibility that seems characteristic of it, is not devoid of contradiction.

We could summarize the position we are in with respect to his discourse on first encountering it by saying that while he may be a writer, he is no poet. Schreber doesn't introduce us to a new dimension of experience. There is poetry whenever writing introduces us to a world other than our own and also makes it become our own, making present a being, a certain fundamental relationship. The poetry makes us unable to doubt the authenticity of St. John of the Cross's experience, or Proust's, or Gérard de Nerval's. Poetry is the creation of a subject adopting a new order of symbolic relations to the world. There is nothing like any of this in Schreber's Memoirs.

So what, in the final analysis, are we going to say about the delusional? Is he on his own? This isn't the feeling we get, either, since he is inhabited by all sorts of existences, improbable ones, certainly, but whose meaningful character is in no doubt. This is an initial datum, whose articulation becomes more and more elaborate as his delusion advances. He is raped, manipulated, transformed, spoken in every possible way, and, I should say, chattered. You can read in detail what he says about what he calls the birds of the sky and their chirping. This is clearly what is at issue – he is the seat of an entire aviary of phenomena – and this is the fact that inspired this enormous communication of his, this book of some five hundred pages, which is the result of a lengthy activity of construction that for him was the solution to his internal adventure.

In the beginning, and at a later moment as well, there is doubt over what the meaning refers to, but there is never any doubt for him that it does refer to something. With a subject like Schreber, things go so far that the whole world ends up caught up in this delusion of meaning, in such a way that it can be said that, far from his being alone, there is almost nothing in his surroundings that in some sense isn't him.

On the other hand, everything he brings into being in these meanings is in a certain sense void of him. He phrases it in a thousand different ways, and especially for example when he remarks that God, his imaginary interlocutor, understands nothing about what goes on within, nothing at all about living beings, and that he never has anything to do with anything but shadows or cadavers. Moreover, his whole world has been transformed into a fantasmagoria of shadows of fleeting-improvised-men.

To understand how such a process of construction might occur in a subject, we have, in the light of analytic perspectives, several avenues open to us.

The simplest are the ones we are already familiar with. A category in the foreground today is that of defense, which was introduced into analysis very early on. Delusion is regarded as one of the subject's defenses. Neuroses are explained in the same manner, moreover.

You know how much I insist upon the incomplete and perilous character of this reference, which lends itself to all sorts of hasty and harmful interventions. You also know how difficult it is to rid oneself of it. This concept is so insistent, so tempting, precisely because it touches something objectifiable. The subject defends, well then! we will help him to understand that he does nothing but defend, we will show him what he is defending against. As soon as you enter into that approach you find yourself confronted by numerous dangers – in the first instance, the danger of missing the level at which your intervention must be brought to bear. In point of fact, you must always rigorously differentiate the order within which the defense appears.

Suppose that this defense was obviously within the symbolic order and that you could elucidate it along the lines of an utterance in the complete sense, that is, one that in the subject involves both signifier and signified. If the subject presents you with both the signifier and the signified, then you may intervene by showing him the union of this signifier and this signified. But only if both are present in his discourse. If you do not have them both, if you have the feeling that the subject is defending against something that you yourself see and that he doesn't, if, that is, you clearly see that the subject is aberrant with respect to reality, then the notion of defense is insufficient to enable you to place the subject before reality.

You may recall what I once said about Kris's nice paper on the character haunted by the idea that he was a plagiarist and the accrued guilt.[3] It was in

[3] Ernst Kris, "Ego Psychology and Interpretation in Psychoanalytic Therapy." Lacan elaborated on these remarks about Kris's case in "Réponse au commentaire de Jean Hyppolite sur la Verneinung de Freud," E, 393-99. The case is discussed again in "The Direction of the Treatment and the Principle of its Power," E, 598-602 / 238-40. Finally, the same article was mentioned in "The Function and Field of Speech the name of defense that Kris considered his intervention to be a stroke of genius. For some time now we have been getting nothing but this notion of defense and, as the ego has to struggle on three fronts, that is, against the id, the superego, and the external world, one believes one is authorized to inter-93 vene on any one of these levels. When the subject alludes to the work of one of his colleagues whom he claims he has plagiarized yet again, one takes the liberty of reading the work and, observing that there is nothing there that merits being considered an original idea for the subject to plagiarize, makes this known to him. One considers such an intervention to be part of the analysis. We are fortunately both honest and blind enough to give as proof that our interpretation is well-founded the fact that the subject brings this nice little story along to the next session – on leaving the session he had gone into a restaurant and treated himself to his favorite dish, fresh brains.

One is delighted; there is a response. But what does it mean? It means that the subject has himself understood absolutely nothing of the matter, that he understands nothing of what he brings us, either, so that one fails to see very well where the progress that has been brought about is situated. Kris has pressed the right button. It is not enough to press the right button. The subject quite simply acts out.

I treat acting out as equivalent to a hallucinatory phenomenon of the delusional type that occurs when you symbolize prematurely, when you address something in the order of reality and not within the symbolic register. For an analyst, addressing the question of plagiarism in the symbolic register must first be centered on the idea that plagiarism doesn't exist. There is no symbolic property. This is precisely the question – if the symbolic belongs to everybody, why have things in the symbolic order taken on this emphasis, this weight, for the subject?

This is where the analyst has to wait for the subject to provide him with something before bringing his interpretation to bear. As we are dealing with a grand neurotic who has resisted a certainly non-negligible analytic effort – before going to Kris he had already had an analysis – the likelihood is that the plagiarism is fantasmatic. On the other hand, if you bring the intervention to bear at the level of reality, that is, if you return to the most elementary psychotherapy, what does the subject do? He responds in the clearest of manners at a deeper level of reality. He testifies that something emerges from reality that is obstinate, something that imposes itself upon him, and that nothing one says will in any way change the core of the problem. You show him that he isn't a plagiarist anymore. He shows you what is at stake by making you eat fresh brains. He renews his symptom, and at a point that has no more foundation or existence than the one at which he showed it at the outset. Is there something that he shows? I would go further—I would say that there is nothing at all that he shows, but that something shows itself.

Here we are at the heart of what I shall be trying to demonstrate on the 94 subject of President Schreber this year.

President Schreber reveals to observation certain microscopic things in a dilated form. This is going to enable me to clarify for you what Freud clearly formulated on psychosis, without taking it too far, because in his day the problem had not attained the degree of acuteness or urgency for analytic practice that it has in ours. He says – a crucial sentence that I have already quoted many times – something that has been rejected from within reappears without. I shall come back to this.

I propose putting the problem in the following terms. Prior to all symbolization – this priority is not temporal but logical – there is, as the psychoses demonstrate, a stage at which it is possible for a portion of symbolization not to take place. This initial stage precedes the entire neurotic dialectic, which is due to the fact that neurosis is articulated speech, insofar as the repressed and the return of the repressed are one and the same thing. It can thus happen that something primordial regarding the subject's being does not enter into symbolization and is not repressed, but rejected.

This hasn't been demonstrated. Nor is it a hypothesis. It is a way of phrasing the problem. This first stage doesn't have to be situated anywhere genetically. I am not denying of course that what happens at the level of the first symbolic articulations, the essential appearance of the subject, raises questions for us, but do not allow yourselves to be fascinated by this genetic moment. The young child whom you see playing at making an object disappear and reappear, who is thereby working at apprehending the symbol, will, if you let yourselves be fascinated by him, mask the fact that the symbol is already there, that it is enormous and englobes him from all sides – that language exists, fills libraries to the point of overflowing, and surrounds, guides, and rouses all your actions – the fact that you are engaged, that it can require you to move at any moment and take you somewhere – all this you forget before the child being introduced into the symbolic dimension. So let us place ourselves at the level of the existence of the symbol as such, insofar as we are immersed in it.

In the subject's relationship to the symbol there is the possibility of a prim- 95 itive Verwerfung, that is, that something is not symbolized and is going to appear in the real.

It is essential to introduce the category of the real, it is impossible to neglect it in Freud's texts. I give it this name so as to define a field different from the symbolic. From there alone is it possible to throw light on the psychotic phenomenon and its evolution.

At the level of this pure, primitive Bejahung, which may or may not take place, an initial dichotomy is established – what has been subject to Bejahung, to primitive symbolization, will have various destinies. What has come under the influence of the primitive Verwerfung will have another.

Today I am going to forge ahead and I will light my lamp so that you can see where I am headed. Do not take what I am expounding for you as an arbitrary construction, nor simply as the fruit of adherence to Freud's text, even if it is exactly what we read in this extraordinary text, Die Verneinung, that M. Hyppolite was kind enough two years ago to discuss for us.[4] If I say what I am saying now it is because it is the only way to introduce rigor, coherence, and rationality into what happens in psychosis, and namely in the psychosis in question here, President Schreber's. I shall subsequently show you the difficulties our entire understanding of the case raises and the need for this initial formulation.

In the beginning, then, there is either Bejahung, which is the affirmation of what is, or Verwerfung.

Obviously, it is not enough for the subject to have only selected a part of the text of what there is to say, while thrusting the rest aside, in the hope that at least with the part things will hang together. There are always things that don't hang together. This is an obvious fact, if we do not begin with the idea that inspires all classical, academic psychology, which is that human beings are, as they say, adapted beings, because they are living, and therefore it must all hang together. You are not a psychoanalyst if you accept this. To be a psychoanalyst is simply to open your eyes to the evident fact that nothing malfunctions more than human reality. If you believe that you have a well-adapted, reasonable ego, which knows its way around, how to recognize what is to be done and not to be done, and how to take reality into account, then there is nothing left to do but send you packing. Psychoanalysis, and this it shares with common experience, shows you that nothing is more stupid than human destiny, that is, that one is always being fooled. Even when one does do something successfully, it is precisely not what one wanted to do. There is nothing more disappointed than a gentleman who is supposed to have attained the pinnacle of his wishes. One only need speak with him for three minutes, frankly, as perhaps only the artifice of the psychoanalytic couch permits, to 96 know that in the end all that stuff is just the sort of thing he could not care less about and, furthermore, that he is particularly troubled by all sorts of things. Analysis is about becoming aware of this and taking it into account.

[4] See above, chap. 1, p. 12 n.9.

It is not by accident, because it couldn't be otherwise, that by a bizarre stroke of luck we go through life without meeting anyone but the unhappy. One says to oneself that there must be happy people somewhere. Well then! unless you get that out of your head, you have understood nothing about psychoanalysis. That is what I call taking things seriously. When I told you things had to be taken seriously, it was so that you would take precisely this point seriously, that you never take anything seriously.

So, within Bejahung all sorts of accidents occur. There is no indication that the primitive retrenchment has been done cleanly. Besides, there is a strong chance that in the long term we will know nothing about the motives for it, precisely because it is situated beyond all mechanisms of symbolization. And if someone does know something about this one day, then there is little chance that he will be an analyst. In any case, it is with what remains that the subject constructs himself a world and, above all, that he situates himself within it, that is, that he manages to be more or less what he has admitted that he was—a man when he finds himself to be of masculine sex, or, conversely, a woman.

If I put this in the foreground, it is because analysis strongly emphasizes that this is one of the essential problems. Never forget that nothing touching on the behavior of the human being as subject, or on anything in which he realizes himself, in which he quite simply is, can escape being bound by the laws of speech.

The Freudian discovery teaches us that all natural harmony in man is profoundly disconcerted. It is not just that bisexuality plays an essential role. This bisexuality is not surprising from the biological point of view, given that the means of access to regularization and normalization in man are more complex than and different from what we observe in mammals and in vertebrates in general. Symbolization, in other words the Law, plays an essential role here.

If Freud insisted on the Oedipus complex to the extent of constructing a sociology of totems and taboos, it is obviously because for him the Law is there ab origine. It is therefore out of the question to ask oneself the question of origins—the Law is there precisely from the beginning, it has always been there, and human sexuality must realize itself through it and by means of it. This fundamental law is simply a law of symbolization. This is what the Oedipus complex means.

So, within this, everything imaginable will occur under the three registers 97 of Verdichtung, Verdrängung, and Verneinung.

Verdichtung is simply the law of misunderstanding [malentendu], owing to which we survive or, even, owing to which we can, if we are a man, for example, completely satisfy our opposite tendencies by occupying a feminine position in a symbolic relation, while perfectly well remaining a man equipped with one's virility on both the imaginary and the real planes. This function which, with greater or lesser intensity, is a role of femininity, may thus find the means to satisfy itself in this essential receptivity that is one of the fundamental existing roles. This is not metaphorical – we do indeed receive something in receiving speech. Participating in speech relations may have several senses at once, and one of the meanings involved might be just that of obtaining satisfaction in the feminine position, as such essential to our being.

Verdrängung, repression, is not the law of misunderstanding, it is what happens when things don't hang together at the level of a symbolic chain. Each symbolic chain we are linked to comprises an internal coherence, which means that we can be forced at any given moment to render what we have received to someone else. Now, it sometimes happens that we are unable to do this on all levels at once – in other words, we find the law intolerable. Not that it is intolerable in itself, but the position we are in comprises a sacrifice that proves to be impossible at the level of meaning. So we repress some of our own acts, discourse, or behavior. But the chain nevertheless continues to run on beneath the surface, express its demands, and assert its claims – and this it does through the intermediary of the neurotic symptom. This is where repression is at the base of neurosis.

As for Verneinung, this belongs to the order of discourse and concerns what we are capable of bringing to the light of day in an articulated form. The so-called reality principle intervenes strictly at this level. We have gone over at different moments of our commentary the three or four places in his work where Freud expresses this most clearly. It concerns the attribution, not of the value of symbols, Bejahung, but of the value of existence. Freud gives, with a profundity a thousand times in advance of what was being said in his day, the following characteristic feature of this level, which he situates in his vocabulary as that of the judgment of existence – it always concerns the refinding of an object.

All human apprehension of reality is subject to this primordial condition –
98 the subject seeks the object of his desire, but nothing leads him to it. Reality, inasmuch as it is supported by desire, is initially hallucinated. The Freudian theory of the birth of the world of objects, of reality as it is expressed, for example, at the end of Die Traumdeutung and restated whenever essentially it is in question, implies that the subject remains suspended at the point of what makes his fundamental object the object of his essential satisfaction.[5]

This is the part of Freud's work, of Freudian thought, that is often returned to in all the developments that are currently taking place on pre-oedipal relations, which ultimately consist in saying that the subject always seeks to satisfy the primitive maternal relation. In other words, whereas Freud introduced the dialectic of two inseparable principles that cannot be thought one without the other, the pleasure principle and the reality principle, one of them, the pleasure principle, is selected and emphasized through the claim that it dominates and englobes the reality principle.

[5] See the last section of The Interpretation of Dreams, "The Unconscious and Consciousness—Reality," SE 7:610.

But this reality principle is basically misrecognized. It expresses precisely this – the subject does not have to find the object of his desire, he is not led, channeled there, by the natural rails of a more or less pre-established instinctual and, moreover, more or less stumbling, adaptation, such as we see in the animal kingdom. He must on the contrary refind the object, whose emergence is fundamentally hallucinated. Of course, he never does refind it, and this is precisely what the reality principle consists in. The subject never refinds, Freud writes, anything but another object that answers more or less satisfactorily to the needs in question. He never finds anything but a distinct object since he must by definition refind something that he has on loan. This is the essential point that the introduction of the reality principle into the Freudian dialectic hinges on.

What has to be understood, because this is given in clinical experience, is that something else appears in the real than what the subject experiences and seeks, something other than what the subject is led towards by that apparatus of reflection, mastery, and research that is his ego, with all its fundamental alienations, something else that can appear either in the sporadic form of that hallucination that is emphasized in the case of the Wolf Man, or, in a much more extensive fashion, as what takes place in the case of President Schreber.

What is the psychotic phenomenon? It is the emergence in reality of an enormous meaning that has the appearance of being nothing at all—in so far as it cannot be tied to anything, since it has never entered into the system of symbolization—but under certain conditions it can threaten the entire edifice.

In the case of President Schreber there is obviously a meaning that concerns the subject, but it is rejected and merely sketches itself most indistinctly on his horizon and in his ethics, while its re-emergence occasions the psychotic invasion. You will see the extent to which what determines it is different from what determines the neurotic invasion – these are strictly opposite conditions. In President Schreber's case this rejected meaning is closely related to the primitive bisexuality I was speaking about just before. In no way has President Schreber ever integrated any type of feminine form – we shall try to see this in the text.

It is difficult to see how it could be purely and simply the suppression of a given tendency, the rejection or repression of some more or less transferential drive he would have felt toward Dr. Flechsig, that led President Schreber to construct his enormous delusion. There really must be something more proportionate to the result involved.

I point out to you in advance that this involves the feminine function in its essential symbolic meaning and that we can refind it only at the level of procreation. You will see why. We are not saying emasculation or feminization or fantasy of pregnancy, for this extends to procreation. Here we have what appears to him at a high point in his existence, and not at all at a moment of deficit, in the form of an irruption in the real of something that he has never known, a sudden emergence of a total strangeness that will progressively bring on a radical submersion of all his categories to the point of forcing him into a veritable reshaping of his world.

May we speak of a process of compensation, or even of cure, as some people would not hesitate to do, on the pretext that when his delusion stabilizes the subject presents a calmer state than at its appearance? Is he cured or 100 not? It is a question worth raising, but I think it can only be wrong to speak of a cure here.

What happens, then, when what is not symbolized reappears in the real? It wouldn't be useless here to bring forward the term defense. Clearly, what appears does so in the register of meaning, in the register of a meaning that comes from nowhere, and which refers to nothing, but is an essential meaning, one that concerns the subject. What intervenes whenever there is a conflict of orders, namely repression, is set in motion at this point. But why doesn't repression work here, that is, why isn't what happens when a neurosis is involved the end result?

Before we can know why, we must study the how. I shall focus on what creates the structural difference between neurosis and psychosis.

When a drive, let's say a feminine or pacifying one, appears in a subject for whom the drive has already been brought into play at different points of his previous symbolization, in his infantile neurosis for example, it manages to express itself in a certain number of symptoms. Thus what is repressed nevertheless expresses itself, repression and the return of the repressed being one and the same thing. The subject has the possibility, within repression, of getting by when something new happens. Compromises are made. This is what characterizes neurosis; it is both the most obvious thing in the world and the thing one doesn't want to see.

Verwerfung is not at the same level as Verneinung. When, at the beginning of a psychosis, the nonsymbolized reappears in the real, there are responses made from the side of the mechanism of Verneinung, but they prove inadequate.

What is the beginning of a psychosis? Does a psychosis, like a neurosis, have a prehistory? Is there, or is there not, an infantile psychosis? I am not saying that we shall answer this question, but at least we shall raise it.

It looks very much as if psychosis has no prehistory. However, it so happens that when, in exceptional circumstances that will have to be spelled out, something that has not been primitively symbolized appears in the external world the subject finds himself absolutely unequipped, incapable of making Verneinung succeed in respect of the event. What then occurs has the characteristic of being totally excluded from the symbolizing compromise of neurosis and, through a veritable chain reaction at the level of the imaginary, is translated into another register, that is, into the opposite diagonal of our little magic square.

For want of being able in any way to re-establish his pact with the other, for want of being able to make any symbolic mediation whatsoever between 101 what is new and himself, the subject moves into another mode of mediation, completely different from the former, and substitutes for symbolic mediation a profusion, an imaginary proliferation, into which the central signal of a possible mediation is introduced in a deformed and profoundly asymbolic fashion.

The signifier itself undergoes profound modifications that will give this particular quality to those intuitions that are most significant for the subject. President Schreber's fundamental language in fact indicates that the signifier is still required within this imaginary world.

The subject's relationship to the world is a mirror relation. The subject's world will essentially consist of the relationship with that being who is the other for him, namely God himself. Something of man's relation to woman is allegedly realized here. But on the contrary you will see, when we come to study this delusion in detail, that these two characters, that is, God, with all that he implies, the universe, the celestial sphere, and on the other hand Schreber himself, literally decomposed into a multitude of imaginary beings with their toing-and-froing and their various transfixions, are two strictly alternating structures. They develop in a way that is very interesting for us and that is permanently elided, veiled, domesticated in the life of a normal man—namely, the dialectic of the fragmented body in relation to the imaginary universe, which is subjacent to a normal structure.

The outstanding interest in studying Schreber's delusion is that it enables us to improve our grasp of the imaginary dialectic. If it is manifestly distinct from everything we can assume about an instinctual, natural relation, it is because of a generic structure we originally described, which is the mirror stage. This structure makes man's imaginary world something decomposed in advance. Here we find it in its advanced state, and that is a part of our interest in the analysis of delusions as such. As analysts have always emphasized, delusions show us the play of fantasies in a highly advanced state of duality. The two characters that the world is reduced to for President Schreber are constructed in relation to one another; they offer one another their inverted image.

The important thing is to see in what way this answers to the indirectly formulated demand to integrate what has emerged in the real, which for the subject represents something of himself that he has never symbolized. A requirement of the symbolic order, through being unable to be integrated into what has already been put into play in the dialectical movement on which 102 the subject has lived, brings about a serial disintegration, a removal of the woof from the tapestry, which is known as a delusion. A delusion is not necessarily unrelated to normal discourse and the subject is well able to convey it to us, to his own satisfaction, within a world in which communication is not entirely broken off.

Next time we shall continue our examination at the point where Verwerfung and Verdrängung intersect with Verneinung.

WHAT IS CALLED THE FATHER
THE FRAGMENTATION OF IDENTITY

My intention was to penetrate today into the essence of madness, and I thought that was mad. I was reassured by the thought that what we are undertaking is not so isolated and hazardous.

The work isn't easy, however. Why not? Because by a singular piece of fate all human undertakings, particularly the difficult ones, always tend, by virtue of this mysterious thing called laziness, to lose ground. To assess this one only has to reread Freud's text on President Schreber without prejudice and with an eye and an understanding cleansed of all the noise that we hear around analytic concepts.

It is an absolutely extraordinary text, but it only puts us on the path to the enigma. The entire explanation he gives of the delusion links up with the notion of narcissism, which is certainly not elucidated for Freud, at least not at the time he writes on Schreber.

People today act as if narcissism were something that was self-explanatory – before extending to external objects, there is a stage at which the subject takes his own body as object. The term narcissism does, it is true, have a meaning in this dimension. Does this mean, though, that the term narcissism is used only in this sense? President Schreber's autobiography, in the way Freud used it to support this notion, shows us, however, that what was repugnant to the said President's narcissism was the adoption of a feminine position towards his father, which involved castration. Here is someone who is supposed to be better off obtaining satisfaction in a relation founded on a delusion of grandeur, since castration can no longer affect him once his partner has become God. 104

In short, Freud's schema could be summed up thus, in line with the formulas for paranoia he gives in this same text – I do not love him, I love God, and reciprocally – God loves me.

I pointed out to you last time that this is perhaps not totally satisfactory, any more than Freud's formulas themselves are, as illuminating as they may be. The double reversal, I do not love him, I hate him, he hates me, undoubtedly gives us a clue to the mechanism of persecution. The problem is entirely one of this he. In effect, this he is multiplied, neutralized, emptied, or so it seems, of subjectivity. The persecutory phenomenon takes on the character of indefinitely repeated signs, and the persecutor, to the extent that he is its support, is no longer anything more than the shadow of the persecutory object.

This is no less true of the god in question in the blossoming of President Schreber's delusion. I pointed out to you in passing how far removed – it's so obvious that it's almost too silly to mention – Schreber's relationship with God is from anything that occurs in mystical experience. As detailed as it is, the description of this unique partner called God nevertheless leaves us perplexed as to his nature.
